21 As touching the Saintes, which being dead in the flesh doe liue in Christ, if we give any prayer at all to them, let vs not dreamed that they themselves haue any other way of asking, than Christ which onely is the way, or that their prayers be acceptable to God in any other name. Therefore Sith the Scripture calleth vs backe from all to Christ onely: Sith the heavenly fathers will is to gather together all in him: it was a point of too much dulnesse, I will not say madnesse, so to desire to make for our selves an entrie by them, that we should be led away from him without whom even they themselves have no entrie open. But, that this hath beene vitiually done in certaine ages past, and that it is at this day, done wherefoever Papistie reigneth, who can deny? Their merites are from time to time thrut in, to obtaine the good will of God: and for the most part, Christ being passed ouer, God is prayed to by their names. Is not this, I beseech you, to convey away to them the office of that onely intercession, which we haue affirmed to belong to Christ alone? Againe, what Angell or Deuill euer receiued to any man any onely fyllable of this their intercession which these men faine? For in the Scripture is nothing of it. What is the reason therefore of inuenting it? Truely when the witte of man so seeketh for it selfe succour, wherewith we are not certified by the word of God, it plainly bewrayeth his owne dissruffulnesse. If we appeale to all their confidences that are delited with the intercession of fainetes, we shall finde that the same commeth from no other ground, but because they are greued with carefulnesse, as though Christ were in this behalfe either too weake or too rigorous. By which doucesfulnesse first they dishonour Christ, and robbe him of the title of only Mediator, which as it is given him of the Father for a singular pretogatue, so ought ought not also to bee conceiued away to any other. And in this verie doing they darken the glorie of his birth, they make voide his crosse, finally whatsouer he hath done or suffered they spoyle and defraude of the due prayse thereof: for all tend to this end that he may be indece and bee accompanied the onely Mediator. And therewith they cast away the goodnesse of God, which gave himselfe to be their Father. For he is not their father,yeas they acknowledge Christ to be their brother. Which they vterly denie vnlesse they thinke that he beeareth a brotherly affection toward them, than which tere can nothing bee more kinde or tender. Wherefore the Scripture offereeth only him to vs, sendeth vs to him, and tayeth vs in him. Hee (faith Ambrose) is our mouth, by which we speake to the Father: our eye,by which we see the Father; our right hand,by which wee offer vs to the father,otherwise than by whose intercession neither we nor all the Saints haue any thing with God. If they aunswere that the common prayers which they make, in Churches, are ended w this conclusion adjoyned, Through Christ our lord: this is a trifling shift: because the intercession of Christ is no leffe pro-phaned when it is mingled with the prayers and merites of dead men, than if it were vterly omitted and onely dead men were in our mouth. Againe, in all their Letanies,Hymnes, and Proses, where no honour is left vngiuen to dead saintes, there is no mention of Christ.

22. But their foolish dulness proceeded so farre,that here we haue the nature of Superstition expressed, which when it hath once shaken off the brildle, is wont to make no end of running attra. For after that men once begun to looke to the intercession of Saints, by little and little there was giuen to every one his speciall doing, that according to the dieretsie of busines, som-time one and sometime an other should be called vpon to bee intercessor: then they to themselves euerie one his peculiar Saint, into whose faith they committed themselves as it were to the keeping of safeguarding Gods. And not onely (wherewith the prophet in the olde time reprocheth Israel) Gods were set vp according to the number of Cities, but even to the number of persons. But fith the Saintes referre their desiers to the onely will of God, & beholde it and reft vpon it: he thinketh foolishly, and flesilly,yea and flan-derously of them, which assigneth to them any other prayer, than whereby they pray for the comming of the kingdom of God: from which that is most farre distant which they faie to them, that euerie one is with private affection more, partially bent to his owne worshippers. At length many absteined not from horrible sacrilege, in calling newe vpon them not as helpers but as principal rulers of their saluation. Loi whereunto foolish men do fall when they wander out of their true standing, that is, the worde of God. I speake not of the groffer monstrositie of vngodlinesse, wherein although they be abominable to God, Angels, and men, they are not yet ashamed nor wearie of them. They falling downe before the image or picture of Barbara, Catherine, and such other, doe mumble Pater noster, Our father. This madnes the Pastors do so not care to heale or restraine, that being allured with the sweete faavour of gaine they allowe it with rejoicing at it. But although they turne from themselfes the blame of so hainous an offence, yet by what coulour will they defende this that Loy or Medard are prayed unto
Cap. 20. Of the manner how to receive unto, to looke downe vpon and helpe their servantes from heauen: that the holy Virgin is prayed vnto, to commaunde her sonne to do that which they aske? In the olde time it was forbidden in the Councell at Carthage, that at the aclar no direct prayer shoulde bee made to Saintes. And it is likely that when the holy men could not altogether suppresse the force of ye naughtie custome, yet they added at leaft this restraint that the publike prayers shoulde not bee corrupted with this forme: Saint Peter pray for vs. But howe much further hath their deutelish importunacie ranged, which sticke not to giue away to deade men that which properly belonged onely to God and Christ?

23 But whereas they trauel to bring to passe that such intercession may seeme to bee grounded vpon the authentique of Scripture, therein they labor in vaine. We read oftentimes (say they) of the prayers of Angels: and not that onely: but it is saide that the prayers of the faithfull are by their handes caried into the sight of God. But if they lye to compare holy men departed out of this present life, to Angels: they shoule proue that they are musing spirits, to whom is committed the ministrie to looke to our safetie, to whom the charge is giuen to keepe vs in all our wayes, to go about vs, to admonith and counsell vs, to watch for vs: all which things are giuen to Angels, but not to them. How wrongfully they wrap vp dead holy men with Angels, appeareth largely by so many diuerse offices, wherby the scripture putteth difference betwenee some and other some. No man dare execute the office of an advocate before an earthly judge, vnlesse he be admitted, from whence then haue wormes so great libertie, to thrust vnto God those for patrones to whom it is not read that the office is enjoyned? Gods will was to appoint the Angels to looke vnto our safetie, wherefore they doe both frequented holy assemblies, and the Church is a stage to them, wherein they wonder at the diuerse and manifold wisdome of God. Who so conuey away to other that which is peculiar to them, verily they confound and peruerse the order set by God, which ought to haue ben inuiolable. With like handomnesse they proceede in alleaging other testimonies. God saide to Jeremie: If Moses and Samuel should stand before me, my foule is not to this people. How (say they) could he haue spoken thus of dead men, vnlesse he knew that they made intercession for the living? But I on the contrary side gather thus, that fith it thereby appeareth that neither Moses nor Samuel made intercession for the people of Israel, there was then no intercession at all of dead men. For which of the saintes is to be thought to be careful for the safetie of the people when Moses ceaseth, which in this behalfe farre passed all other when he liued? But if they follow such slight sutteties, to say that the deade make intercessi-on for the living, because the Lorde faide, If they shoulde make intercessi-on: I wil much more colorable reacon in this manner: In the extreme neces-sitie of the people Moses made not intercession, of whom it is saide, he shal make intercession. Therefore it is likely that none other maketh intercessi-on, sith they are al so farre from the gentlenesse, goodnes, and fatherly carefulnesse of Moses. This forfooth they get with cauilling, that they bee wounded wth the same weapons, wherewith they thought them felues gayly fensed. But it is verie fonde that a simple sentence should so bee wrested, because the the Lord pronounceth only that he will not spare the offences of the people, although they had scene Moses to be their patron, or Samuel, to whose prayers he had shewed him flefe fo tender. Which senfe is most clearly gathered out of a like place of Ezechiel. If (faith the Lorde) these three men were in the citie, Noe, Daniel, and Iob, they shall not deliuer their fonnes and daughters in their righteousnes: but they shall deliuer onely their owne foules. Where it is no doubt that he meant if two of them should happen to reuine againe, for the third was then alive, namly Daniel, who (as it is known) did in the first florishing of his youth thewe an incomparable example of godlinesse: let vs then leave them whom the Scripture plainly sheweth to haue ended their course. Therefore Paul, when he spake of Dauid, teacheth not that he doth with praieres helpe his posterity, but only that he serued his owne time.

24 They answere againe: shall we then take from them all prayer of charity, which in the whole course of their life breathed nothing but charity & mercie? Verily as I will not curiously search what they doe, or what they muse vpon: so it is not likely, that they are caried about hither & thither with desire & particular requestes: but rather that they do with a stayed & vnmoued will, long for the kingdom of God, which standeth no lefse in the destruction of the wicked than in the salvation of the godly. If this be true, it is no dout that their charity is conteined in the communion of the body of Christ, & extendeth no further, than the nature of that communion beareth. But nowe though I graunt that they pray in this manner for vs, yet they doe not therefore depart from their owne quietnesse, to be diversely drawn into earthly cares: and much lefse must wee therefore by and by call vpon them. Neither doth it thereby followe that they must doe, because men which live in earth may commend one an other in their praieres. For this doing serveth for nourishing of charity among them, when they doe as it were parte and mutually take vpon them their necessitie among themselves. And this they doe by the commaundement of the Lorde, and are not without a promise, which two things, haue alway the chiefe place in praier. All such considerations are farre from the dead, whom when the Lord hath enuied from our companie, he hath left to vs no enterchange of doinges with them, nor to them with vs, so farre as we may gather by coniecutures. But if any man allege, that it is impossible but that they must kepe the fame charitie toward vs, as they be ioyned in one Faith with vs: yet who hath ruedeled that they haue so long cares to reach to our voyces? and so piercing eyes to watch our necessities? They prate in their shadowes I wot not what of the brightnesse of the countenance of God extending his beames vpon them, in which as in a mirror they may from on hie behold the matters of mé beneath. But to affirme that, specially with such boldnesse as they dare, what is it else but to goe about by the drunken dreames of our owne braine, without his worde to pearce & breake into the hidden judgements of God, and to tread ye Scripture vnder feete which fo oft pronounceth that the wisdome of the flesh is enemie to the wisdome of God, which wholly condenceth the vanity of our natural wit, which willth all our reaion to be thrown downe, and the only will of God to be looked vnto of vs.

The other testimonies of Scripture which they bring to defend this their lie, they most naughtily wrest. But Jacob (saith they) praieth that his name and the name of his Fathers Abraham & Isaac were called upon over his posteritie. First let vs see what forme of calling upon this is among the Israelites. For they call not upon their Fathers, to help them but they befeech God to remember his servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Therefore their example maketh nothing for them y speake to the Saints themselfes. But because those blocks (such is their dulnes) neither understand what it is to call upon the name of Jacob, nor why it is to be called upon: it is no marueil ifin the very forme also they so childishly stumble. This maner of speach is not seldome found in the Scriptures. For Elias sayeth that the name of the men is called upon over the women, when they haue them as their husbands under whose charge & defence they live. Therefore the calling upon of the name of Abraham upon the Israelites, standeth in this when they coney their pedigree from him, & do with solemn memorie honor him for their author & parent. Neither doth Jacob this because he is careful for the enlarging of the renome of his name: but for as much as he knewe that y whole blessednesse of his posteritie consisteth in the inheritance of the covenante which God had made with him: he willeth that y which he seeth should be the chiefe of all good things to them, that they be accounted in his kinred:
For, that is nothing else but to coney to them the succession of the covenant. They againe when they bring such remembrance into their prayers, do not flee to the intercessions of dead men: but do put the Lord in mind of his covenante, wherby the most kinde father hath promised: he wil be farable & beneficial to them for Abrahams, Isaacs, & Jacobs sake. How little the holy ones did otherwise leane upon the merites of their father, y common saying of the Church in the Prophet teiftith, Thou art our Father, & Abraham knewe vs not, & Israel was ignorant of vs. Thou Lord art our Father & our redeemer. And when they say thus, they add therewithall, Returne O Lord for thy servants sake: yet thinking upon no interceffion, but bending their mind to the benefite of the covenante. But nowe sith wee haue the Lord Iesus, in whose hand the eternall covenante of mercie is not onely made but also confirmed to vs: whose name should we rather vs in our priers? And because these good masters will haue the Patriarches to be by these wordes made intercessors, I would faine knowe of them why in so great a route Abraham the Father of the Church hath no place at all among them.
Out of what sincke they fetch their advocates, it is not unkownen. Let them answere me, how ftr it is y Abraham, whom God preferred above all other, & whom he advanced to the heift degree of honor, should be neglected and suppresst. Verily when it was euident that such vs was unkownen to the old Church, they thought good for hiding of the newnesse to speake nothing of the olde Fathers: as though the diuerfitie of names excused the new and forged maner. But whereas some object that God is prayed vnto, to have mercie on the people for Davids sake, it doth so nothing at all make for defence of their error, that it is a most strong proue for the confutation thereof. For if we consider what person David did beare: he is seuered from all the assembly of the Saints, that God should establish the covenante which he hath made made in his hand. So both the covenant is rather considered than the man; and under a figure the only intercession of Christ is affirmed. For it is certain that that which belonged only to David, in so much as he was the image of Christ, accordeth not with any other.

26 But this forsooth moueth some, that it is often times read that the prayers of Saints have been heard. Why so? Even because they prayed. They trusted in the (faith the Prophet) and they were sauc'd; they cried, and they were not confounded. Therefore left us also pray as they did, yee may be heard as they were. But these men, otherwise than they ought, do wrongfully reason, that none shall be heard but they that have once beene heard.

How much better doth James say? Elia's (faith his) was a man like to vs: and he prayed with prayer; it should not raine, & it rained not upon the earth in three yeres & fixe moneths. Againe he prayed, & the heauen gaue raine, & the earth gaue her fruite. What? doth he gather any singular prerogation of Elia', to which we ought to flee? No. But he teacheth what is the continual strength of godly & pure prayer, to exhort vs likewise to pray. For wee do negligently construe the readiness & gentleness of God in hearing them, vntelese we be by such experiences confirmed into a more sure affiance of his promises, in which he promiseth that his care shall be inclined not to one, or two, nor yet to a fewe, but to all, yee call upon his name. And so much lesse excusable is this foolishnes, because they seeme as it were of set purpose to despise so many admonitions of Scripture. David was oft delitered by the power of God, as it should draw his power to himself, yee should be delitered by his help? He himself affirmed the rather otherwise: The righteous loke for me, till thou render to me. Againe, The righteous shall see, & they shall rejoice, & trust in the Lord. Behold, this poore man hath cried to God, & he hath answered him. There be in the psalms many such prayers, in which to crave that which he requireth, he moneth God by this manner, that the righteous be not made ashamed, but many by his example be raised vp to hope well. Let vs now be contented with this one example. Therefore every holy one shall pray to thee in his time. Which place I have so much the more willingly rehearsed, because the spirit babblers which doe let out to hire the service of their waged tongue have not beene ashamed to allege it to proove the intercession of the dead. As though David meant any thing else, than to shewe the fruite that shal come of the mercifulnes and gentlenes of god, when he shall be heard. And in this kinde wee must learne, that the experience of the grace of God, as well to our selves as other, is no flender helpe to conforme the credite of his promises. I leave unhearded many places, where David setteth before himselfe the benefits of God for matter of confidence, because the readers of the Psalmes shal commonly find them without seeking. This selfe same thing had Jacob before taught by his own example: I am unworthy of all thy mercies, and of the truth which thou hast performed to thy seruant. I with my sate haue paied over this Jordan, & now I come forth with two bands. Hee alacageth in deede the promise, but not alone: but he also ioyneth the effect, that he may the more cou ragiously in time to come trust that God will be the same toward him. For he is not like to mortall men, which are wearie of their liberalitie, or whose .

Q. q 2 abilitia
abilitie is wafted: but he is to be wcyed by his owne nature, as Davuid wisely doth where he faith, Thou haft redeemed me, O God, that speakest trueth. After that he hath giuen to God the praifes of his salvation, he addeth: he is a true speaker: because such he were continually like himself, there could not be gathered of his benefites a sufficiently strong reason of affiance & calling vpon him. But when we knowe that so ofte as he helpeth vs, he theweth an example and proofe of his goodnes, we neede not to feare that our hope shalbe put to shame or disappoynt vs.

27 Let this be the summe. Wheras the Scripture setteth out this vnto vs for the chiefest point in the worshipping of God, (as refusing all sacrifices, he requireth of vs this dutie of godlinesse) prayer is not without manifest sacriledge directed to other. Wherfore also it is said in the Psalm. If we stretch forth our hands to a strange God, shall not God require these things? Again, wheras GOD will not be called vpon, but of Faith, and expressly coman-eth praiers to be framed according to the rule of his word: finally whereas Faith founded vpon the word, is the mother of right prayer: so soone as wee sweare from the world, our prayer must needs be corrupted. But it is already shewed, if the whole Scripture be sought, this honor is therein chalenged to God only. As touching the office of interceffion, we have also shewed it is peculiar to Christ, and there is no prayer acceptable to God, but which that mediator halloweth. And though faithfull do one for an other other praiers to God for their brethren, we have shewed that this abateth nothing from the only interceffion of Christ: because they altogether standing vpon it do commend both theselues and other to God. Moreover we have taught that this is vnslyly drawn to dead men, to whom we never read it hath bin coman-ded that they should pray for vs. The Scripture doth oftentimes exhort vs to mutuell doings of this dutie one for another: but of dead men there is not so much as one syllable: yea and James joyning these two thinges togethers, that we should confesse our selues among our selues, and mutually pray one for an other, doth secretly exclude dead men. Therefore to condemne this errour, this one reason sufficeth that the beginning of praying rightely, springeth out of Faith, and that Faith commeth of the hearing of the worde of God, where is no mention of the sained interceffion, because superstitition hath rashly gotten to it selfe patrons which were not giuen them of God. For whereas the Scripture is full of many formes of praier, there is no example founde of this patronship, without which in the papacy they beleue ther is no praier. Moreover it is certaine that this superstition hath grown of dishonestnes either because they were not content with Christ to be their interceffour, or have altogether robbed him of his praife. And this later point is easily proved by their shamelesnes: because they have no other stronger argument to prove. if we have neede of the interceffion of Saints, than when they object they are vnworthy of familiar accele to God. Which we in deed grant to be most true: but therupote we gather they leave nothing to Christ, which esteeme his interceffion nothing worth, vselsesse there be adiowed George, Hypolite, or such other visors.

28 But although prayer properly signifieth only wishes and petitions: yet there is so great affinitie betweene petition & thanksgiving, that they may be fitly fitly comprehended both under one name. For, these special sorts which Paul rehearseth, fall under the first part of this division. With asking & craving we pour forth our desires before God, requiring as well those things that seem to spread abroad his glory and set forth his name, as the benefits are profitable to our vfe. With giving of thankes, we doe with due praise magnifie his good doings toward vs, acknowledging to be received of his liberaltie whatsoever good things do come to vs. Therefore David comprehended these two partes together, saying: Call upon mee in the day of necessity: I will deliver thee, & thou shalt glorifie me. The Scripture not in vain commandeth vs to vs both. For we have said in another place, our necessities is so great, & the experience it self crieth out: we are on every side pinched & pressed with so many & so great difficulties, alhaue cause enough why they should both sigh to God, & in humble wise call upon him. For though they be free from adversitie, yet the guiltines of their wicked doings, & their innumerable assaults of tentations ought to pricke forward the most holy to aske remedy. But in the sacrifice of praise & thanksgiving there can be no interruption without hainous sinne, forasmuch as God ceseoth not to heape upon divers men divers benefits to drudge vs though we be slack and flowe, to thankfulness. Finally so great and so plenteous largesse of his benefits doth in a manner ouerwhelme vs: there are so many and so great miracles of his seene on every side which way soever thou turne thee, wee never want ground and matter of praise & thanksgiving. And, that these things may be somewhat plainer declared: fish all our hopes and wealth stand in God (which we haue before sufficiently proved) that neither we nor all our things can be in prosperitie but by his blessing: we must continually commit our selues and all our things to him. Then whatsoever we purpose, we speake, or do, let vs purpose, speake, & do under his hand & will, finally under the hope of his help. For all are pronounced accurset of God, which devise or determine any purposes upon trust of themselves or of any other, which without his will, & without calling upon him do enterpris or attempt to begin any thing. And whereas we haue divers times alreadie said, that he is duly honored when he is acknowledged the author of all good things: the upon followeth that all those things are so to be receiued at his hande, that we yield continual thanks for them: & that there is no other right way for vs to vs his benefits, which flow & proceed from his liberaltie to no other end, but yee should be continually buffetted in confessing his praise & giving of thankes. For Paul, when he testifieth that they are sanctified by the word & prayer, doth therewithal signifie that they are not holy & cleanse to vs without the word & prayer, understanding by word, faith by figure. Therefore David faith very well, when hauing receiued y liberaltie of the Lord, he declareth that there is giuen him into his mouth a new song: whereby verily he signifieth that it is a malitious silence, if wee passe over any of his benefits wote praise; fith he so oft gueue vs matter to say good of him, as he doth good to vs. As also Esay settynge out the singular grace of God, exhorteth the faithful to a new & vnwonted song. In which sense David faith in another place, Lorde open thou my lippes, & my mouth shall shewe forth thy praise. Likewise Ezechias and Ionas testifie that this shalbe to them the end of their
of their deliverance, to celebrate the goodnes of God with songs in his temple. This same lawe David prescribeth to all the godly. What shall I repay to the Lord, that he hath bestowed upon me? I will take the cup of salvation, and will call upon the name of the Lord. And the same lawe the Church followeth in another Psalm, Saue vs our God, that we may confess to thy name and glory in thy praise. Again, he hath looked vnto the prayer of the solitary, and he hath not despised their prayers. This shall be written to the generation that shall follow, and the people created shall praise the Lord, that they may declare his name in him and his praise in Hierusalem. Yea so oft as the faithfull beseech God to doe for his names sake as they proffesse themselves unworthy to obtaine any thing in their owne name, so they bind themselves to give thanks, and they promise that this shall be to them the right vse of the bountefulnes of God that they shall be publishers of it. So Osea speaking of the redemption to come of his Church, faith: Take away iniquitie O God, and lift vp good: and we will pay the values of lippes. And the benefits of God do not onely claim to themselues the praise of the tongue, but also do naturally procure loue. I have loued (faith David) because the Lord hath heard the voice of my prayer. Again, in another place, rehearsing the helps which he had felt, he faith: I will loue thee O God my strength. Neither shall the praises ever please God, which shall not flowe out of this sweetenes of loue. Yea and also we must holde fast this sayeing of Paul, that all prayers are wrongfull and faultie to which is not adioyned giving of thanks. For thus he faith, in all prayer and beseeching with thanksgiving let your petitions, be known with God. For, ifth terrors, tediousnes, impatience, bitternelle of griefe, & feare do move many in praying to murmure, he commandeth that our affections be so tempered, that the faithfull ere they have obtained that which they desire, should neverthelkes cherefully blesse God. If this knot ought to have place in things in a maner contrarie, with so much more holy band dowth God binde vs to sing his praises, so oft as he maketh vs to enjoy our requestes. But as wee have taught that our prayers are hallowed by the intercession of Christ, which otherwise should be vncleane: so the Apostle, where he commandeth vs to offer a sacrifice of praise by Christ, putteth in mindes we have not a mouth cleane enough to praise the name of God, vnlesse the priesthood of Christ become the meane. Whereupon we gather that men haue beene monstrously bewitched in the papacie, where the greater part marueileth of Christ is called an advocate. This is the cause why Paul commandeth both to pray and to give thanks without ceasing: namely for that he willeth that with so great continuing as may be, at every time in every place, in all matters and busineses, the payers of all men shoulde be lifted vp to God, which may both looke for all things at his hand & yeld to him the praise of all things, as he offreteth vs continually matter to praise and pray.

29 But this continual diligence of praying, although it specially concerneth the proper and private prayers of every man, yet somewhat also pertaineth to the publike prayers of the Church. But those can neither be continual, nor ought otherwise to be done than according to the politicke order, that shal by common consent be agreed upon among all. I grant the same in deedes.
The grace of Christ.  Lib. 3.  293 deede. For therefore certaine hours are set & appointed, as indifferent with God, so necessary for the vses of men, that the commoditie of all men may be proided for, & all things(according to the sayings of paul) may be comly and orderly done in the Church. But this maketh nothing to the contra-ary but that every Church ought both from time to time to shewe vp it selfe to often vs of prayers, end when it is admonished by any greater necessitie, to be feruent with more earnest endeuer. As for perseverance which hath a great affinity with continuall diligence, there shall be a fitte place to speake of it about the ende. Nowe these make nothing for the much babling which Christe willed that we should be forbidden. For he forbiddeth not to continue long, nor oft, nor with much affection in praiers, but that wee shoulde not trust that we may wring any thing out of God, by dulling his cares with much babbling talke, as if he were to be perswaded after the manner of men.

For we knowe that Hypocrites,because they doe not consider that they have to doe with God, doe no lease make a pompous shewe in their prayer's than in a triumph. For, the Pharifee which thanked God that hee was not like to other men, without doubt rejoyned at him selfe in the eyes of men, as if hee would by prayer secke to get a fame of holinesse. Hereupon came that much babling, which at this day vp one a like cause is vsed in the papacy: while some do vainely spend the time in repeating the same prayer's, and other some doe set out them selues among the people with a long heape of wordes. Sith this babling childishly mocketh God, it is no maruell that it is forbidden out of the Church, to the ende that nothing should there be vsed but earnest and proceeding from the bottome of the heart. Of a necer kinde and like to this corruption is there an other, which Christe condemneth with this, namely that hypocrites for boastinge fake doe secke to haue many witnesse, and doe rather occupy the market place to pray in, than their prayers shoulde want the praié of the worlde. But whereas we have already shewed that this is the marke that prayar shooteth at, that our minde may be carried vpwarde to God, both to confession of praise and to craving of helpe: thereby we may understande that the chiefe dutie thereof do stande in the minde and the heart, or rather that praiery itselfe is properly an affection of the inward heart, which is poured forth & laid open before God the searcher of hearts. Wherefore(as it is already sayde) the heauenly schoolemaster, when he minded to set out the best rule of praying, commanded vs to goe into our chamber, and there the doore being shut to pray to our Father which is in secret, that our Father which is in secret may heare vs. For when he hath drawn them away from the example of hypocrites, which with ambitious boasting shew of prayers sought the favour of men, he therewith addeth what is better, namely to enter into our chamber, and there to pray the doore being shutte. In which words(as I expound them) he willed vs to secke solitary being, which may helpe vs to defende and to enter throughly with our whole thought into our heart, promising to the affections of our heart that God shalbe necer vs whose temples our bodies ought to be. For hee meant not to deny but that it is expedient alfo to pray in other places: but he sheweth that prayer is a certaine secret thing, which both is chiefly placed in the soule, & requireth the quiet herof far from all troubles of cares. Not without cause therefore the Lorde himself also, when he was disposed to apply himself more earnestly to prayer, conueded himself into some solitary place far from the troublesome company of men: but to teach us by his example that these helps are not to be despised, by which our mind being too slippery of its self is more bent to earnest applying of prayer. But in the mean time even as he in the midst of the multitude of men, abstained not from praying; if occasion at any time so served: so should we in all places where need stand, lift vp pure hands.

Of the manner how to receive

Finally thus it is to be holden, that whosoever refuseth to pray in the holy assembly of the godly, he knoweth not what it is to pray apart, or in solitary nes, or at home. Againe, that he that neglecteth to pray alone or privately how diligently doth he haunt publicke assemblies, doth there make but vain prayers: because he giueth more to the opinion of men than to the secret judgment of God. In the mean time, that the common prayers of the Church should not growe into contempt, God in olde time garnished them with glorious titles, specially where he called the temple the house of prayer. For, by this saying he both taught: that the chiefe parte of the worshipping of him is the duty of prayer: and that to the end that the faithful should with one consent exercise themselves in it, the temple was set vp as a standard for them.

There was also added a notable promise: There abideth for thee, O God, praise in Sion: & to thee the vow shalbe paiued. By which words the Prophet telleth vs, that the prayers of the Church are neuer void: because the Lorde alway ministreth to his people matter to sing vp vnpon ioye. But although the shadowes of the lawe are sealed: yet because the Lorde will was by this ceremony to nourish among vs also the vnity of faith, it is no doubt that the same promise belongeth to vs, which both Christ hath established with his owne mouth, and Paul teacheth that it is of force for euer.

30 Now as the Lorde by his word commanded the faithful to vs common prayers: so there must be common temples appointed for the vsing of them: where who so refuse to communicate their prayer with the people of God, there is no cause why they should abuse this pretence, that they enter into their chamber that they may obey the commandement of the Lorde. For he that promiseth that he will do what soever two or three shall ask being gathered together in his name, testifieth that he despiseth not prayers openly made: so that boasting and seeking of glorious men are absent, so that vnfained and true affection be present which dwelleth in the secret of the heart. If this be the right vse of temples (as truly it is) we must againe beware that neither (as they haue begun in certayne ages past to be accounted) we take them for the proper dwelling places of God from whence he may more neere bend his care vnto vs: nor faine to them I wot not what secret holiness, which may make our prayer more holy before God. For filth we our selues be the true temples of God we must pray in our selues as we will call vpon GOD in his owne holy temple. As for that groffenesse, let vs which have a commandement to call vpon the Lorde in Spirete and truth without difference of place, leave it to the Iewes or the Gentiles. There was in deede a temple in old time by the commandement of God for offering of prayers and sacrifices: but that was at such time as the truth lay hid figured vnder such shadowes, which being nowe liuely expressed vnto vs doth not suffer vs to sticke in any matemateriall temple. Neither was the temple given to the Iewes themselves with this condition, that they should incloue the presence of God, within the walles thereof, but whereby they might bee exercised to beholde the image of the true temple. Therefore they, which in any part thought that God dwelleth in temples made with hands, were sharply rebuked of Esay and Stephen.

31 Here moreover it is more than evident, that neither voyce nor song, if they be vfed in prayer, haue any force, or doe any whit profite before God, vnlesse they proceede from the deepe affection of the heart. But rather they provoke his wrath against vs, if they come onely from the lippes and out of the throat: forasmuch as that is to abuse his holy name, and to make a mockerie of his majestie: as wee gather out of the words of Esay, which although they extende further, yet pertaine also to reprooue this fault. This people (faith he) commeth neere to me w their mouth, and honoreth me with their lippes: but their hearte is farre from mee: and they haue feared me with the commandement and doctrine of men. Therefore beholde 1 will make in this people a miracle great and to be wondered at. For, wisdome shal perish from their wise men, and the prudence of the Elders shal vanish away. Neither yet doe wee here condemne voyce or singing, but rather doe hily commende them, so that they accompanie the affection of the minde. For so they exercise the minde and holde it intentiue in thinking vpon God: which as it is slipperie and rolling, easilly slacketh and is diuerysely drawen vnlesse it be stayed with diuercse helps. Moreover whereas the glory of God ought after a certaine manner to shine in all the partes of our bodie, especially behoueth that the tongue bee applied and auowed to this seruice both in singing and in speaking which is properly created to shewe foorth and display the praisie of God: but the cheefe vfe of the tongue is in publike prayers, which are made in the assemblie of the godly: which tende to this ende, that we may all with one common voyce, and as it were with one mouth together glorifie God whom we worshippe with one Spirite and one faith: and that openly, that all men mutually, euerie one of his brother, may receive the confession of Faith, to the example whereof they may bee both allured and stirred.

32 As for the vfe of singing in Churches (that I may touch this also by the way) it is certayne that it is not onely most auncient: but that it was also in vfe among the Apostles, we may gather by these words of Paul, I will sing in Spirite, I will sing also in minde. Againe to the Colossians, Teaching and admonishing you, mutually in hymnes, Psalmes, and spirittual fonges, singing with grace in your heartes to the Lorde. For in the first place he teacheth that wee should sing with voyce and heart: in the other he commendeth spirittual fonges, wherewith the Godly doe mutually edifie themselves. Yet that it was not vnioerall, Augustine testifieth, which reporteth that in the time of Ambrose the Church of Millain first began to sing, when while Victina the mother of Valentinian cruelly raged against the true faith, the people more vsed watchinges than they were wont: and that afterwarde the other western Churches followed. For he had a little before saide that this manner came from the Easterne Churches. Hee telleth also in his second be booke of Retractions that it was in his time recoucyd in Africa. One Hilarie (faith he) a ruler did in every place wheresoever he could, with malicious blaming tale at the manner which then began to bee at Carthage, that the hymnes at the alter should be pronounced out of the booke of Psalms, either before the oblation, or when that which had ben offered was distributed to the people. Him I answered at the commaundement of my brethren. And truely if long be tempered to that grauitie which becommeth the presence of God and Angels, it both procureth dignitie and grace to the holy actions, and much auaileth to stirre vp the minde to true affection, and ferventnes of praying. But we must diligently beware that our cares bee not more heedfully bent to the note, than our minde to the spiritual sense of the worde. With which perill Auguftine in a certain place sayth that he was so moued, that hee sometime wished that the manner which Athanasius kept should be stablished, which commanded that the reader should found his words with so small a bowing of his voice, that it should be liker to one ye readeth than to one that singeth. But when he remembered howe much profite he himselfe had receiued by singing, he inclined to the other side. Therefore vsing this moderation, there is no doubt that it is a most holy and profitable ordinance. As on the other side what songs so euer are framed onely to sweatenesse and delight of the cares, they both become not the majestic of the Church, and can not but biele displease God.

33 Whereby it also plainly appeareth that common prayers are to be spoken not in Greeke among Latine men, not in Latine among Frenchmen or Englishmen (as it hath heretofore beene where commonly done) but in y peoples mother tongue, which commonly may be understand of the whole assemblie: forasmuch as it ought to bee done to the edifying of the whole Church, which receive no fruitie at all of a sound not understand. But they which have no regard neither of charitie nor of humanitie, should at leaft have bene somewhat moued with the authorite of Paul, whose wordes are nothing doubtfull. If thou bleffe (faith he) in spiritt, howe shall he that filleth the place of an vlearned man anfwere Amen to thy blesing, &th knoweth not what thou sayest? For thou indeede givest thanks, but the other is not edified. Who therefore can sufficiently wonder at the vnbridled licentiousnes of the Papistes, which, the Apostle so openly crying out against it, fear not to roare cut in a strange tongue most babbling prayers, in which they themselves sometime vnderstande not one syllable, nor woulde have other folkes to understand it? But Paul teacheth that we ought to doe otherwise. How then? I will pray (faith he) with spiritt, I will pray also with mind: I will sing with spiritt: I will sing also with minde: signifying by the name of spiritt, the singular gift of tongues, which many being endued with, abused it, when they fecured it from the mind, that is, from understanding. But this we must altogether thinke, that it is by no meane possible, neither in publique nor in private prayer, but that the tongue without the heart must highly displease God. Moreouer we must thinke that the mind ought to be kindled with ferventnes of thought, that it may far surmount all that the tongue may express with vterrance. Finally that the tongue is not necessarie at all for private prayer, but so farre as the inwarde feeling euer is not able to suffice to enkindle it self, or the vehemence of inkindling violently carie the work of the tongue with it. For though very good prayers sometime be without voice, yet oftentimes bettereth, that when the affection of the minde is fervent, both the tongue breaketh forth into voyce, and the other members into gesturing without excefffull swewe. Hereupon came the muttering of Hanna, & such a like thing at the holy ones alway feele in themselves when they burst out into broken & vnperfect voices. As for gesture of the body which are wont to be used in prayer (as kneeling & vncouring of the head) they are exercises by which we endeavoure to rise vp to a greater vccercing of God.

34 Nowe we must learne not only a more certaine rule, but also the verie forme of praying: namely the same, which the heavenly father hath taught vs by his beloued soone: wherein we may acknowledge his vnmeasurable goodness and kindneffe. For besides this hee warnedeth and exhorteth vs to feck him in all our necessitie (as children are wont to fly to their fathers defence, so oft as they be troubled with any distress) because hee sawe that he did not sufficiently perceiue this, howe slender our povertrie was, what were meete to bee asked, and what were for our profite: he provided also for this our ignorance, and what our capacitie wanted, he supplied and furnishid of his owne. For he hath prescribed to vs a forme wherein he hath as in a Table set out what focuer we may desire of him, what focuer vayleth for our profite, and what focuer is necessarie to ask. Of which his gentlenesse we receive a great fruite of comfort that we understande that wee ask no inconvenient thing, no vnseeming or vnfit thing, finally nothing that is not accepteable to him, sixt we aske in a maner after his owne mouth. When Plato saw the follie of men in making requestes to God, which beeing granted, it many times befell much to their owne hurt: he pronounced that this is the best maner of praying taken out of the olde Poete, King Jupiter giuen vnto vs y best things both when we aske them, and when we doe not aske them, but commaund euil thinges to be away from vs euyn when we aske them. And verily the heathen man is wise in this, that he judgeth howe perillous it is to aske of the Lord that which our owne desire moueth vs: and therewithall he bewrayeth our vnhappy case, that we can not once open our mouths before God without danger, vnlesse the Spirit doe instruct vs to a righte rule of praying. And in somuch greater estimation this pricelie is worthie to bee had of vs, sixt the onely begotten Sonne of GOD ministreth words into our mouth which may deliuer our mind from all doubting.

35 This whether you call it forme or rule of praying is made of fice petitiós. For the cause why I agree not to them that diuide it into feuen parts, is this, that by putting in this aduerfitary word (But) it seemeth that the Evangelist ment to joyn these two peeces together, as if he had said: Suffer vs not to be oppressed with tentation, but rather help our wekenesse, and deliver vs, that we faint not. The olde writers also thinke on our side, so ye nowe that which is in Matthew added in the feuenth place, is by way of declaratiōn to be joyned to the fice petitiō. But although the whole praiēr is such that in euery part of it regarde is specially to be had of the glorie of God, yet the three first petitiōs are peculiarly appointed to Gods glorie, which alone we ought ought in them to look into without any respecte (as they say) of our owne profit. The other three have care of vs, and are properly assigned to ask tho' things that are for our profit. And when we pray the name of God be hallowed; because God will procure whether he be loved and honoured of vs freely or for hope of reward, we must then thinke nothing of our owne commoditie, but his glorie must be set before vs, which alone we must beholde with fixed eyes; and no otherwise ought wee to bee minded in the other prayers of this sorte. And eu'en this turns to our great profit, that when it is sanctified as wee pray, it is also likewise made our sanctification. But our eyes (as it is saide) must winke and after a certaine manner bee blinde at such profite, so as they may not hence looke at it: that if all hope of our private benefit were cut off, yet we should not ceasa to wish & pray for this sanctification and other things which pertaine to the glorie of God. As it is seen in the examples of Moses and Paul, to whom it was not greeuous to turne away their mindes and eyes from themselves, & with vehement and inflamed zeale to with their owne destruction, that thought it were with their owne losse they might auaunce the glorie and kingdome of God. On the other side when we pray that our dayly breade bee given vs: although we wishte that which is for our owne commoditie, yet here also we ought cheefely to seeke the glorie of God, so that wee should not aske it vnlesse it might turne to his glorie. Nowe let vs come to the declaring of the prayer it selfe.

36 First in the verie entrie wee meete with this which wee saide before that all prayer ought none otherwise to be offered of vs to God than in the name of Christ, as it can by no other name be made acceptable vnto him. For since we call him father, truely wee alleadge for vs the name of Christ. For by what boldnesse might any man call God, Father? who should burst forth into so great rashnesse, to take to himselfe the honour of the Sonne of God, vnlesse we were adopted the children of grace in Christ? Which being the true Sonne, is given of him to vs to be our brother; that that which he hath proper by nature, may by the benefit of adoption be made ours, if we doe with sure faith embrace so great bountfulness. As John faith, that power is giuen to them which beleue in his name of the onely begotten Son of God, that they also may be made the children of God. Therefore he both calleth himselfe our Father, and will be so called of vs, by this sweetnesse of name delivering vs from all distrust, & there can no where be founde any greater affection of love than in a father. Therefore thee coulde by no surer example testifye his vnmeasurable deare loue toward vs than by this that wee are named the sones of God. But his loue is so much greater & more excellent toward vs than all loue of our parents, as hee passeth all men in goodnesse and mercie: that if all the fathers that are in the earth, hauing shaken off all feeling of fatherly naturalnesse, woulde forfake their children, yet thee will never sayle vs, because he can not deny himselfe. For wee have his promise, If you beeing euill can give good gifts to your children,
The grace of Christ. Lib. 3. 298

howe much more can your Father which is in heaven? Againe in the Prophet, Can a mother forget her children? Though she forget them,yet I will not forget thee. If we be his children: then as a child can not giue him selfe into the tuition of a stranger & forcin man, vnlesse he copleine either of the cruelty or povertie of his father:so we can not seeke succours from els where that from him alone, vnlesse we reproch him with povertie and want of ability, or with cruelty or too extreeme rigoroufnesse.

37 Neither let vs alleage that we are worthily made fearefull with confe-ience of sinnes, which may make a Father be heuer fo mercefull and kinde, daily to be displeased. For if among men the fonne can with no better advocate pleade his caufe to his father, and by no better meane get and recover his fauour being lost, than if he himfelfe humbly and lowly, acknowledging his fault, do befeech his fathers mercy (for then the fatherly bowels can not hide themfelves but muft be moued at fuch prayers ) what fhall that father of mercies do, and the God of all comfortes:shall not he rather heare the teares and gronings of his children intreating for themfelves (specially fith hee doeth call and exhorte vs to do fo) than any other interceffions whatfoever they be to the succour whereof they doe fo fearefull ye fce, not without fome fhew of defpire, because they diftrufte of the kindenes and mercefullnesse of their father? This ouerflowing plenty of fatherly kindenes he depainteth and feteth out vnto vs in the parable, where the Father louingly embraceth the fonne that had estranged himfelfe from him, that had riotoufly wafted his fhubfance, that had euery way grievously offended agaength him: and he cariethe not till he do with wordes craue pardon, but he himfelfe preuenteth him, knoweth him a farre off returning, of his owne will goeth to meete him, com-forteth him and receueth him into fauour. For, setting out in a man this example of fo great gentlenesse, he minded to teach vs how much more plentiful kindenes we ought to looke for at his hande, who is not onely a Father, but also the belt and moft mercefull of all Fathers,howfoever we bee vnkinde, rebellious and naughty children: for that yet we caft our felues vpone his mercy. And that he might make it to be more assuredly beleued,that he is fuch a Father to vs, if we bee Christians: he willed not onely to be called Father, but alfo by express name Our Father: as if we might thus talk with him, O Father which haft fo great naturall kindenesse toward thy children, fo great easinesse to pardon , wee thy children call to thee and pray to thee, being affured and fully perfwaded, that thou bearest no other affection to vs than fatherly, howfoever we bee vnworthy of fuch a Father. But because the small capacities of our heart conceiue not fo great vnmeasurablenesse of fauour, not onely Christ is to vs a pledge and carneth of our adoption, but also he giueth to the Spirit for witneffe of the fame adoption, through whom we may with a free and lowd voyce cry Abba, Father. So oft therefore as any delay fhall withfand vs, let vs remember to aske of him,that correcting our feare-fulness he will set before vs that Spirit of couragiousnes to be our guid to pray boldely.

38 Whereas we are not fo taught that euery one should feuerallly cal him his owne father, but rather that we should all in common together call him Our Father: thereby we are put in minde, how great affiction of brotherly love
loue ought to be among vs, which are altogether by one same right of mercy and liberalitie, the children of such a Father. For we all have one common Father, from whom cometh whatsoever good thing may betide vnto vs: there ought to be nothing feuerall among vs, which we are not readie with great cheerefulnessse of minde to communicate one to an other, so much as neede requireth. Nowe if we bee so desirous, as we ought to be, to reach our hand and help one to an other, there is nothing wherein we may more profit our brethren, than to commend them to the care and prudence of the most good Father, who being well pleased and favoring, nothing at all can be wanted. And verily even this same we owe to our Father. For as he ye truely & hauithly loueth any Father of househould, doth also embrace his whole househould, with loue and good will: likewise what loue and affection wee beare to this heavenly Father, we must shew toward his people, his househould and his inheritance, which he hath so honored, that he hath called it the fulnesse of his onely begotten Sonne. Let a Chrustian man therefore frame his praiers by this rul, that they be common, and may comprehend all them that be brethren in Christ with him: and not onely those whom he presently feareth and knoweth to be such, but all men that live vpon earth: of whom, what God hath determined, it is out of our knowledge: sauing that it is no lesse godly then natural to with the best to them, & hope the best of them. Howbeit we ought with a certain singular affection to bare a special inclination to them of the househole of faith, whom the Apostle hath in euery thing peculiarly commended vnto vs. In a summe, All our praiers ought to bee so made, that they haue respect to that community which our Lord hath established in his kingdom and his house.

39 Yet this withstandeth not, but that wee may specially pray both for our selues and for certaine other: so that yet our minde depart not from hauing an eyc to this community, nor once swarte from it, but apply all things vnto it. For though they be singularly spoken in forme, yet because they are directed to that marke, they cease not to be common. All this may be easily vnderstooode by a like example. The commandement of God is generall, to reliefe the neede of all poore: and yet they obey this commandement which to this end doe helpe their pouerity whom they knowe or see to be in deede, although they passe ouer many whom they see to be presst with no leesse necessitie: either because they can not knowe all, or be not able to helpe al. After this manner they also do not against the will of God, which hauing regard vnto & thinking vpon this common fellowship of the Church, do make such particular praiers, by which they do with a common mind in particular words, commend to God themselfes or other, whose necessitie God willed to bee more nererly known to them, Howbeit all things are not like in praiers and in bestowing of goods. For, the liberalitie of givinge cannot be vfe but toward them whose neede we have perceiued: but with praiers we may helpe euyn them which are most strange & most vnknowe to vs, by how great a space of groud focuer they be distant from vs. This is done by the general forme of praiers, wherein all the children of God are contained, among whom they alfo are. Hereto we may apply y which Paul exhortheth the faithfull of his time, y they lift vp euery where pure hands without strife: because when he warneth the y strife:

40 It is added, that he is in heaven. Whereupon it is not by and by to be gathered that he is bound fast inclosed and copaied with the circle of heaven, as within certaine barres. For Salomon also confesth that the heavens of heavens can not containe him. And he himselfe faith by the Prophet that heaven is his state, and the earth his footstool. Whereby verily he signifies that he is not limited in any certaine coast, but is spread abroad throughout all things. But because our minde (such is the grovnenesse of it) could not otherwise conceive his unspeakable glorie, it is signified to vs by heavens, than which there can nothing come under our sight more ample or fuller of maeftie. Sith therefore wherefoever our senses comprehend any thing, there they vfe to fasten it. God is set out of all place, that when we will seek him, we should be raised vp above all sense both of body & soule. Again by this manner of speaking he is lifted vp above all chance of corruption & change; finally it is signified that he comprehendeth and containeth his whole world and governeth it with his power. Wherefore this is all one as if he had been called of infinite greatnes or height, of incomprehensible subfaction, of vnmeasurable power, of everlastig immortalitie. But while we have this, we must lift vp our minde hier when God is spoken of, that we dreame not any earthly or fleshly thing of him, yet we measure him not by our final proportions, nor draw his will to the rule of our affections. And therewithall is to be raised vp our affiance in him, by whose prouidence and power wee vnderstand heaven and earth to be governed. Let this be the summe, that vnder the name of Father is set before vs that God which hath in his owne image appeared to vs, that he may be called vpovn with assured faith: & that familiar name of Father is not onely applied to stablish affiance, but also availth to holde fast our mindes, they be not drawn to doubtful or fained Gods, but should from ony begotten sonne clime vp to only father of Angels & of the Church: then, because his feare is placed in heaven, we are by the government of the world put in mind, not without cause wee come to him which with present care commeth of his owne will to meete vs. Who so come to God (faith the Apostle) they must first beleue there is a God: then that he is a rewariner to al them that seke him. Both these things Christ affirmeth to be proper to his father, that our faith may be staiwed in them: then, that we may be certainly perswaded he is not careless of our safetie: because he vouchsuffeth even to vs to extend his prouidence, With which introduction Paul prepareth vs to pray rightly. For before that he biddeth our petitions to be opened before God he faith thus, Be ye careful for nothing, the Lord is at hand. Whereby appeareth that they doubtfullie & with perplexity tosse their prayers in their mind which have not this well rooted in them, that the eye of God is vpon the righteous.

41 The first Petition is, That the name of God be hallowed, the need whereof is signified with our great shame. For what is more shamefull than the glory of God should be partly by our unthankfulness, partly by our maliciousneses darkened: and (so much as in it lieth) by our boldnesse and furious stubbornesse, utterly blotted out? Though all the wicked wouldst burst themselves.
Cap. 20. Of the manner how to receive themselves with their wilfulness full of sacrilege; yet the holiness of the name of God gloriously shineth. And notwithstanding all the Prophets cried out, As thy name O God, so is thy praise into all the ends of the earth. For wherefoever the name of God is known, it cannot but that his strength, power, goodness, wisdom, righteousness, mercy, and truth must shine forth themselves, which may draw us into admiration of him, and stirre us vp to publish his praise. Sith therefore the holiness of God is so shamefully taken from him in earth, if we bee not able to rescue it, wee bee at the least commanded to take care of it in our prayers. The summe is, that we wishe the honour to be givn to God which he is worthie to haue; that men never speake or thinke of him without most his reverence: whereas contrary the vnholie abusing, which hath alway bene too common in the worlde, as at this day also it rangeth abroad. And hereupon commeth the necessitie of this petition, which if there liued in vs any godlines, though it were but a little, ought to haue beeene superfluous. But if the name of God haue his holiness sake, when being sauuered from all other, it breatheth out nothing but glorie, here we are commanded not onlye to pray that God will deliever that holy name from all contempte and dishonour, but also that he will subdue all mankinde to the reverence of it. Now whereas God discloseth himselfe to vs, partly by doctrine, and partly by works, hee is no other wise sanctified of vs, than if we give to him in both behalves that which is his, and to embrace whatsoever shall come from him: and that his seuerie haue no lesse praise among vs than his mercifullnesse, forasmuch as hee hath in the manifolde diueritie of his works imprinted marks of his glorie which may worthlie drawe out of all tongues a confession of his praye. So shall it come to passe that the Scripture shall haue full authoritie with vs, and that no successe shall hinder the blessing which God deseruent in the whole course of the goyerning of the worlde. Againe the petition also tendeth to this purpose, that all vnholinesse which defileth this holy name, may be destroyed and taken away: that whatsoever things do darken and diminish this sanctifying, as well flanders as mockings, may be driuen away: and when God suddely all sacrileses, his glory may thereby more and more shine abroad.

43 The seconde petition is, that The kingdome of God may come: which although it conteyne no newe thing, is yet not without cause seuered from the first, because if we consider our owne drowines in a thing greatest of all other, it is profitable that the thing which ought of it selfe to haue beeene most well known, be with many wordes oft beaten into vs. Therefore after that we haue beeene commanded to pray to God to bring into subiection, and at length vterly to destroye whatsoever spoteth his holy name: nowe is added a like and in a manner the fame request, that his kingdome come. But although we haue already set forth the definition of his kingdome, yet nowe breefly rehearse, that God reigneth when men as well with forfaking of themselves as with despising of the world and of the earthly life, doe so yeeld themselves to his righteousness, that they aspire to the heavenly life. Therefore there are two parts of this kingdome: one, that God correct with the power of his Spiritual corrupt desires of the flesh, which which do by multitudes make warre against him: the other, that he frame all our senses to the obedience of his government. Therefore none doe keepe right order in this prayer, but they which beginne at themselves, that is to say, that they be cleansd from all corruptions which trouble the quiet state of the kingdom of God, and infect the purenesse thereof. Now because the worde of God is like a kingly scepter, wee are here commanded to pray that he will subdue the mindes and heartes of all men to willing obedience of it. Which is done, when with the secret instinct of his Spirite he vtereth the effectuall force of his worde, that it may be auaunced in such degree as it is worthie. Afterward we must come downe to the wicked which do obstinatly and with desperate rage reftit his authoritie. God therefore setteth vp his kingdom by humbling the whole world: but that in divers maners; because he tameth the wantonnesses of some, and of other some he breaketh the vaunted pride. This is daily to be wished that it be done, that it may please God to gather to himselfe Churches out of all the coastes of the worlde, to enlarge and encreaseth them in number, to enrich them with his giftes, to stablilish right order in them: on the other side to overthowe all the enemics of pure doctrine and religion, to scatter abroad their counsels, to caft downe their enterprisfes. Whereby appeareth that the endeuour of daily proceeding is not in vaine commanded vs: because the matters of men are nearer in so good case, that filthinesse being shaken away and cleansd, full purenesse florisheth and is in liuely force. But the fulnesse of it is differed unto the last comming of Christ, when Paul teacheth that God shall be all in all. And so this prayer ought to withdrawe vs from all the corrupt ones of the world, which do feuer vs from God that his kingdom should not flouris in vs, and also to kindle our endeuour to mortifie the flesh, finally to instruct vs to the bearing of the crosse: forasmuch as God will in this wife haue his kingdom spread abroad. Neither ought we to take it miscontentedly that the outward man be destroyed, so that the inward man be renewed. For this is the nature of the kingdom of God, when wee submit our selves to the righteousnesse thereof, to make vs partakers of his gloire. This is done when brightly setting forth his light and trueth, with alway newe encreaseth, whereby the darknesse and lies of Satan and his kingdom, may vanish away, be destroyed and perish, he defendeth them that be his, with the help of his Spirite, directeth them to vpriughthesse, and strengtheneth them to continuance: but overthroweth the wicked conspiracies of his enemics, shaketh abroad their treasons and deceites, preventeth their malice, and beareth downe their stubbornnesse, till at length he kill Antichrist with the Spirite of his mouth and destroy all vngodlinesse with the brightnesse of his comming.

43 The third petition is, That the will of God be done in earth as it is in heaven. Which although it hangeth upon his kingdom, and cannot be seuered from it, is not in vaine added seuerally, for our grossenesse, which doeth not easilly or by andby conceiue what it is that GOD reigneth in the worlde. It shall therefore be no absurditie if this be taken by way of plainer exposition: that God shall then be king in the worlde when all things shall submit themselves to his will. Nowe here is not meant of his secrete will, whereby he governeth all things & directeth them to their ende. For though Satan & men are troubleously carried against him, yet he can by his incomprehensible counsel not only turne aside their violent motions, but also drive them into order that he may do by them that which he hath purposed. But here is spoken of an other will of God, namely that, whereunto aunswrtheth willing obedience: and therefore the heauen is by name compared with the earth: because the Angels, as it is said in the Psalm,do willingly obey God & are diligently bent to doe his commandements. Wee are therefore commanded to with that as in heauen nothing is done but by the becke of God, & the Angels are quietly framed to all uprightness: so the earth, all stubbornneffe & peruerseffe being quenched, may be subject to such government.

And when we require this, we renounce the desires of our owne flesh: because whosoever doth not resigne and yeld his affections to God, he doth as much as in him lieth set himselfe against him, forasmuch as nothing cometh out of vs but faultie. And we are againe by this prayer framed to the forsaking of our selues,that God may govern vs after his will: & not that only, but that he may also create in vs newe minides & newe hearts, our old being brought to nought: that we may feel in our selues none other motion of desire than a mere content with his will: summarily that we may will nothing of our selues, but that his Spirite may governe our heartes, by whom inwardly teaching vs we may learne to hate those things that please him, & to hate those things that displease him. Whereupon this also followeth, that whatsoever affections fight against his will, he may make them vaine and void. Loce here be the first three chief points of this prayer, in asking whereof wee ought to have the onely glory of God before our eyes, leaving the respect of our selues, and having no regard to any of our owne profit, which although it come hereof largely vnto vs, yet we ought not here to seeke it.

But albeit all these things, though we neither thinke of them, nor with them, nor aske them, must sooner the lesse come to passe in their due time, yet wee must with them and require them. And this to doe is no small profit for our travaile, that we may so testifie and professe our selues to be the seruauntes and children of God, as much as in vs lieth endeavouring and beeing truly and throughly given to set forth his honour, which is due to him beeing both a Lorde and a Father. Who therefore doe not with affition and zeal of avouning the glory of God, pray that the name of God be hallowed, that his kingdom come, that his will be done: they are not to be accounted among the children and seruauntes of God: and as all these things shalbe done against their wills, so they shall turne to their confusion and destruction.

Now followeth the second parte of the prayer, in which wee come downe to our owne commodities: not that bidding fare well to the glory of God (which as Paul witnesseth, is to be regarded euen in meate & drinke) wee should seeke only what is profitable for our selues: but wee haue alreadie given warning that there is this difference, that God peculiarly claiming three petitions to himselfe doeth drawe vs to himselfe wholy, that he may in this wise prove our godlineffe. Then he graunteth vs also to have an eye to our owne commodities, but with this condition, that wee ask nothing nothing for our felues but to this end that whatsoever benefits he becometh upon vs, they may set forth his glory: forasmuch as nothing is more rightfull than that we live and die to him. But in this petition we ask of God generally all things which the use of the body needeth under the elements of this world, not only wherewith we may be fed and clothed, but also whatsoever he foresayeth to be profitable for vs, that we may eat our bred in peace. By which prayer briefly we yeelde our selues into his care, and commit all to his providence, that he may feed, cherish, and preferue vs. For the most good Father didst not so to receive as to make our body into his faithfull sauegarde and keeping, to exercize our Faith in these small things, when we looke for all thinges at his handes euene to a crumme of bread and a droppe of water. For whereas it is come to passe I wote not howe by our iniquitie, that we be moued and vexed with greater care of the flesh than of the soule: many which dare trust to God for their soule, are yet carefull for their flesh, are yet in doubt what they shall eate, and wherewith they shalbe clothed: and if they have not plentie of wine, wheate, and oyle aforehande, they tremble for feare. So much more doe we esteeme the shadow of this life which lasteth but a moment, than that everlasting immortalitie. But who so trusting to God haue once cast away that carefullnesse for the provision of the flesh, doe also by and by looke for salvation and everlastinge life at his hand, which are greater thinges. It is therefore no small exercize of Faith, to hope for those thinges of God, which otherwise doe so much holde vs in care and we haue not finallly profited, when we haue put of this vnbelieuynge which flicketh fast within the bones almost of all men. As for that which some doe here teach of tran substantiall bread, it seemeth but finallly to agree with the meaning of Christ: yea but if we did not euene in this fraile life giue to God the office of a nourishing Father, our prayer shoulde be vnperfect. The reasone which they bring is too much prophane: that it is not meete that the children of God, which ought to be spiritual, shoulde not only cast their minde to earthly cares, but also wrappe GOD there in with them. As though his blessing and fatherly favour doth not also appeare in the suftenance of our life, or as though it were written in vaine that godlinessse hath promises not onely of the life to come, but also of this present life. But although the foregoynesesse of sinnes is of much greater value than the sustenances of the body, yet Christ hath set the inferior thing in the first place, to the entente to life vs vp by degrees to the other two petitions which do properly belong to the heauenly life, wherein he had regard to our grossenesse. We are commanded to ask Our breade, that we should be contente with the quanticie which our heauenly Father vouchsafeth to giue to vs; & shoulde not seke for gaine by vnlawfull craftye meanes. In the meanesse time we must learne that it is made Oures by title of gifte, because neither our diligence, nor our travaile, nor our handes (as it is sayde in Mofes) doe by themselves get vs anie thing, vnlesse the blessing of God be present: yea the plenty of bread should nothing at all profitte vs, vnlesse it were by God turned into nourishment. And therefore this liberalitie of GOD is no lesse necessary for the riche than for the poore: because having their cellers and their barnes full, they should yet fainte for drinefle and emprinefle; vnleffe they did by his grace enjoy their bred. The worde This day, or Every day as it is in the other Euangelift, and also the adjective Daily, do bridle the too much greediness of frail things, wherewith we are wont to burne out of measure, and wherunto are ioyned other evils: fis if we have plentiful abundance, we do gloriously powre it out uppon pleasure, delites, boasting, and other kindes of riotous exccfe. Therefore we are commaunded to aske only so much as is enough for our necessity, & as it were from day to day, with this affiance, that when our heavenly Father hath fedde vs this day, he will also not faile vs to morrowe. Therefore how great plenty of thinges foever do flow vnto vs, yea when our barnes be stuffed and our cellers full: yet wee ought alway to aske our daily bread: because we must certainly beleue that all sub stance is nothing, but in somuch as the Lorde doth by pouring out of his blessing with continuall encrease make it fruitefull: & that the very same substance that is in our hand, is not our owne, but inomuch as he doth euerie houre giue vs a portion and graunt vs the vfe of it. This whereas the pride of men doth most hardely suffer itselfe to be perswaded: the Lorde testifieth that he hath shewed a singular example thereof for all ages, when he fed his people with Manna in the wilderneffe, to teach vs that man liueth not in breade onely, but rather in the worde that commeth out of his mouth. Whereby is declared, that it is his power alone by which our life and strengths are susteined, although he do minifter it vnto vs vnder bodily instrumentes. As he is wont alfo to teach vs by the contrary example, when hee fo oft as hee will, breaketh the strength and (as he calleth it) the staffe of breade, that men eating may pine with hunger, and drinking may be dried vp with thirst. But whofo not being contented with daily bread, but with vnbrided greediness are gaping for endless store, or who so being full with their abundance, and carelesse by reason of the happe of their riches, doe neuerthelesse sue to GOD with this prayer, they doe nothing else but mocke him. For, the firste sort of such men aske that which they would not obtaine, yea that which they moft of all abhorre, that is, to haue onely dayly bread, and so much as in them lieth they dissemblingly hide from GOD, the affection of their couetousnesse: whereas true prayer ought to powre out before him the very whole minde itselfe, and whatsoever inwardly lieth hidden. But the other sorte doe aske that which they looke not for at his hande, namely that which they thinke that they haue with themselves. In this that it is called Ours the bountifulnes of God (as we haue fayde) to much more appeareth, which makeeth that ours that is by no right due to vs. Yet that exposition is not to be rejected which I haue also touched, that by our bread is meant that which is earned with rightful & harmelesse travaile, and not gotten with deceites and extor tions: because that is alway other mens which we get to our selves with any ill doing. Whereas we pray that it be giuen vs, thereby is signified that it is the only and free gift of God, from whence foever it come to vs, yea when it shall most of all seeme to be gotten by our owne policy and travaile, and earned with our owne handes: forasmuch as it commeth to passe by his only blessing that our labours prosper well.

45 Nowe followeth, Forgiue vs our dettes; in which petition and the nexte next following, Christ hath briefly contained whatsoever maketh for the heavenly life: as in these two partes about standeth the spiritual covenant which God hath made for the salvation of his Church, I will write my laws in their hearts, and I will be mercifull to their iniquities. Here Christ beginneth the forgivingnesse of sinnes: after this, he will by and by adioyne the second grace, that God defend vs with the power of his Spirit, & sustain vs with his help, that we may stand vnouercome against all tentations. And sinnes he calleth dettes, because we are detbound to pay the penaltie of them, & were by no means able to satisfy it, vnlesse we were acquired by this forgivingnesse. Which pardon is of his free mercie, when he himselfe liberally wipeth out these dettes, taking no payement of vs, but with his owne mercie satisfying himselfe in Christ, which once given himselfe for recompence. Therefore whofoeuer that God shall be satisfied by their owne or other mennes merites, and that with such satisfactions the forgivingnesse of sinnes is recompensd and redeemed, they have no parte of communicating of this free forgivingnesse: and when they call upon God in this manner, they doe nothing but subscribe to their owne accusation, yea, and seal their owne condemnation with their owne witnesse. For they confess them selues dettes, vnlesse they be acquired by the benefit of forgivingnesse, which yet they do not receive, but rather refuse, when they thrust vs into God their owne merites and satisfactions. For, so they do not beseech his mercie, but do appeale to his judgement. As for them that dreame of a perfection in themselves, which taketh away neede to crave pardon, let them haue such disciples whom the itching of their cares diueth to errors: so that it be certaine that so many disciples as they get, are taken away from Christ: forasmuch as he instructing all to confess their giltinesse, receiueth none but sinners: nor for that he cherisheth sinnes with flattering, but because he knew that the faithfull are never throughly vncovered of the vices of their flesh, but that they alway remaine subject to the judgement of God. It is in deed to be wished, yea, and to be earnestly endeavoured, that we having performed all the partes of our dutie may truely reioyce before God that we are clean from all spot: but forasmuch as it pleaseth God by little and little to make againe his image in vs, that there alway remaineth some infection in our flesh, the remedie ought not to have bene despised. If Christ by the authoritie giuen to him of his Father, commandeth vs throughout the whole course of our life, to flee to craving of pardon of our giltinesse: who shalbe able to suffer these new masters, which go about with this imagined ghost of perfect innocencie to dasel the eyes of the simple, to make them to trust they may be made free from al fault: Which, as John witnesseth, is nothing else but to make God a liar. And withall one worketh these lewd men by cancelling one article do teare in sunder & by y meane do weaken from the very foundation the whole covenant of God, wherein we have shewed your salvation is contained: so as they be not only robbers of God, because they frequete those things so contyned, but also wicked and cruel because they otherwhome poore soules with dispaire: and turneour to themselves and others, that be like them, because they bring themselves into a soilefulnesse directly contrarie to the mercie of God. But whereas some obiect, that... in wishing the coming of the kingdom of God, wee doe also ask the putting away of sinne: that is too childish, because in the first table of this prayer is set forth unto vs most hie perfection, but in this part is set forth our weakness. So these two things do fisty agree together, that in a spring toward the marke we despise not the remedies which our necessities requireth. Finally, we pray that we may be forgien as wee our felues do forgive our detters, that is, as we do forgive and pardon all of whomsoever wee have beene in any thing offended, either vnjustly handled in deede, or reprochfully vfed in word. Not that it lieth in vs to pardon the giltenesse of the fault & offence which pertaineth to God alone: but this is our forgiving, of our owne willingnesse to lay away out of our mind wrath, hatred, and desire of reuenge-ment, and with voluntary forgetfulness to truede under foote the remembrance of injuries. Wherefore we may not aske forgivingenesse of sinnes at the hande of God, if wee do not also forgive their offences toward vs which either do or haue done vs wrong. But if wee keepe any hatreds in our hearts, and purpose any reuengementes and imagine by what occasion wee may hurt, yea, and if wee doe not endeavour to come into fauour againe with our enemies, and to descreue well of them with all kind of friendly doinges, & to winne them vnsto vs: we do by this prayer beseech God that he doe not forgive vs. For we require that he graunt to vs the same forgivingenesse which we graunt to other. But this is to pray that he graunt it not to vs, vnlesse wee graunt it to them. Whoso therefore be such, what doe they obtaine by their prayer but a more grieuous judgement? Last of all it is to be noted, this condition y he forgive vs as we forgive our detters, is not herefore added for y we descreue his forgivingenesse by the forgivingenesse which we graunt to other, as if that cause of forgivingenesse to vs were there expresse: but by this worde partly the Lords will was to comfort the weakeffesse of our Faith, for he added this as a signe whereby we may be assured that he hath as surely graunted to vs forgivingenesse of our sinnes, as we surely know in our conscience that we haue graunted the fame to other, if our mind be voide and cleansed of all hatred, enuiue and reuengement, and partly by this as it were by a marke, hee wipeth them out of the number of his children that they may not bee bolde to call vpon him as their Father, which being headlong hafty to reuenge, & hardly entreated to pardon, doe vse stifflie continuing enmities, and do cherish in themselves the same displeasure toward other which they pray to be turned from themselves. Which is also in Luke expresse spoken in the words of Chrift.

46 The six petition (as we haue said) answereth to the promise of engraving the lawe of God in our heartes. But because we do not without continuall warrefare and harde and great triuings obey to God, wee doe here pray to be furnished with such weapons and defended with such succor, that wee may be able to get the victorious: whereby wee are warned that wee stand in neede not onely of the grace of the Spirit, which may soften, bow, and direct our heartes to the obedience of God, but also of his helpe, whereby bee may make vs invincible against both all the traiterous entrapings and violent conflicts of Satan. But now of tentations there are many and divers forces. For, both the perverse thoughtes of minde provoking vs to trespasing against the law, which either our owne lust doth minister into, or the diuell flirreth vp, are tentations: and also those things which of their owne nature are not euill, yet by the craft of the deuill are made tentations, when they are so set before our eyes, by the occasion of them we be drawn away or doe swaunte from God. And these tentations are either on the right hande or on the left.  On the right hand, as riches, power, honours, which commonly doe with their glittering and shew of good so daill the sight of men, and catche them with the baited hooke of their flatteringes, their being entrapped with such deceites, or dronke with such sweetenesse, they may forget their God. On the left hand, as pouerie, reproches, despisings, troubles, and such other: that they being grieved with the bitterness & hardnes thereof may be vitterly discouraged, cast away faith and hope, and finally be altogether estranged from God. To these tentations of both fortes, which fight with vs either being kindled in vs by our owne lust, or being set against vs by the craft of Satan, we pray to our heauenly Father that he suffer vs not to yeele. But rather that he vpholde vs and raffe vs vp with his hande, that being strong by his strength, wee may flande fast against all the assaults of the malicious enemie, whatsoever thoughts he put into our minde: then, that whatsoever is set before vs on either side, we may turne it to good, that we neither be puffed vp with prosperitie, nor throwen downe with aduersitie. Neither yet doe we here require that wee may feele no tentations at all, with which we have great neede to be stirred vp, pricked, and pinched, least by too much rest wee growe dull. For not in vaine did David wishe to be tempted: and not without caufe the Lorde dayly tempteth his elect, chastising them by shame, pouerie, trouble, and other kindes of crosse. But God tempteth after one manner, and Satan after an other: Satan, to destroye, damne, confounde, and throwe downe headlong: but God, that by prouing them that he his may haue a triall of their vntainednesse, and by exercitinge they may confirme their strength, to mortifie, purge by fire, and seare their flesh, which vnlesse it were in this wise restraiwed, woulde vxe wanton and would wildeely outrage above measure. Moreover Satan affai- leth men vnarmed and vnready, that hee may oppresse them vware: God euin with temptinge worketh the effect, that they which be his may patient- ly beare whatsoever he sendeth vpun them. By the name of the Euill, whether we understande the Deuill or sinne, it maketh little matter. Satan in deede himselfe is the enemie that lieth in waite for our life: but with sinne he is armed to destroy vs. This therefore is our request, that we may not be overcomne or overwhelmed with any tentations, but may by the power of the Lorde stande strong against all contrary powers wherewith we are affai- led: which is, not to yelde vs vanquished to tentations, that being receiued into his keeping & charge, and being faine by his protection we may endure vno- overcomne: our sinne, death, the gates of hell, and the whole kingdom of the deuill: which is to be deliuered from euill. Where it is also to be diligently marked, that it is aboue our strength to matche with the deuill to create a warrier, and to beare his force and violence. Otherwise we should but vainly or as it were in mockage ask that which we had already in our felues. Surely, they which prepare them to such a battle with truist of themselves, doe.

not sufficiently understande with how fierce and wel armed an enemie they have to doe. Nowe wee pray to be deliuered from his power, as out of the mouth of a mad and raging Lyon, wheras we should be terme in pieces with his teeth and paws, and swallowed with his thrones, vnlesse the Lorde do: deliuer vs out of the middles of death: yet therewithall knowing this that if the Lorde shall stande by vs, and fight for vs when we are overthrown, we shall in his strength the:we strength. Let other trust as they lift to their owne abilities and strengthes of free will, which they thinke that they haue of them selues; but let it suffice vs that we stande and are strong by the only strength of God. But this prayer containeth more than at the first sight it beareth in it. For if the Spirit of God be our strength to fight out our combate with Satan, we shall not be able to get the victorie vntill we being filled with that Spirit shall haue put off all the weaknesses of our flesh. When therefore we pray to be deliuered from Satan and the Deuill, wee pray to be from time to time enriched with newe increases of the grace of God, till being fully stuffed with them we may triumph over all euill. It seemeth harde and rough to some, that we craue of God that he leade vs not into tentation, forasmuch as it is contrary to his nature to tempt, as James wittnesseth. But this question is already partly assailed, where we saide that our owne lust is properly the cause of all the tentations wherewith wee are overcome, and therefore worthy beareth the blame thereof. Neither doth James mean any thing else, but that the faultes are without cause and wrongfully layed vpon God, which we are druen to impute to our felues, because we knowe our selues in our conscience gilty of them. But this withstandeth not but that God may when it pleaseth him make vs bonde to Satan, cast vs away into a reprobae sense, and to filthy lustes, and so leade vs into tentation by his judgement which is righteous in deede but yet oftentimes secret: forasmuch as y'cause of it is often hid from men, which is yet certainly known with him. Whereupon is gathered that this is no vnfit maner of speaking, if we be perswaded that he doth not without cause so oft threaten, that whiche the reprobae shalbe striken with blindnessesse and hardning of heartes, these shalbe sure tokens of his vengeance.

47 These three petitions, wherewith we do peculiarly commend vs and our things to God, do evidently shewe this which we haue before saied, that the prayers of Christians ought to be common and to tende to the common edifying of the Church, and to the encrease of the communion of the faithfull. For there doth not every man pray to haue any thing privately given, but all in common to gether do pray for Our bread, for forgivennesse of sins, that we may not be led into tentation, that we may be deliuered from euill. There is furthermore adiogned a cause why we haue both so great boldenesse to ask, and so great trust to obtaine: which although it be not in the lateine copies, yet it agreeth more sittly in this place than that it should seeme worthy to be omitted, namely that his is the kingdom, and the power and the gloire for euerr. This is the perfect and quiet rest of our soule. For if our prayers were to be commended to God by their owne worthinesse, who should be so bolde, as once to open his mouth before him? Now howsoeuer we be most miserable, howsoever most vnworthis of all men, howsoever voyde of all commendation: yet we shall never want cause to pray, & never be destitute of confidence: forasmuch as our father cannot have his kingdom, power, and glory taken away from him. At the end is added Amen, whereby is expressed our ferventness of desire to obtain those things that we have asked of God, and our hope is confirmed that all such things are already obtained, and that surely be given vs because they are promised of God, which can not deceive. And this agreeth with that manner of prayer which we have here before rehearsed, Doe it Lorde for thy names sake, not for our sake or our righteousness: whereby the holy ones do not only express the end of their praiers, but also confess that they are unworthy to obtain vnlesse God fetch the cause from himselfe, and that their trust to speed commeth of the onely nature of God.

48 Thus haue wee whatsoeuer we ought yea or in any wise may aske of God, set forth in this forme & as it were a rule of praying taught by the best scholemaster Christe, whom the Lorde hath set ouer vs to be our teacher, and whom alone he hath willed to harkened vs to. For he hath alway hath beene his eternall wifedome, and being made man is given to men the Angell of great counsell. And this prayer is in all pointes, so fully perfect, that whatsoeuer forceine or strange thing is added which can not be referred to it, it is vngodly and unworthy to be allowed of God. For in this summe he hath set forth, what is meeete for him, what is pleasing to him, what is necessary for vs: finally what he will grant. Wherefore who so dare go further, and to ask any thing of God beside these, first they will adde of their owne to the wifedome of God (which can not be done without mad blasphemie) then they holde not themselfes under the will of G O D, but defipifying it doe with greedinesse wander further: finally they shall neuer obtaine any thing, forasmuch as they pray without faith. And there is no doute that all such praiers are made without faith, because here wanteth the word of G O D, vpon which vnlesse faith be grounded, it can in no wise stand. But they which forsaking the maitsters rule, do followe their owne desires, are not onely without the wordes of God, but also so much as they be able with their whole endeouer, are against it. Therefore Tertullian no lesse fitly than truly hath called this a lawfull prayer, secretly signifying that all other are lawlesse and vnlawfull.

49 We would not haue these things so taken as though we were so bound with this forme of prayer, that we may not change a worde or a syllable. For there are eche where read many prayers in the Scriptures, farre differing from this in worde, yet written by the same Spirit, and which are at this day profitable to be vfed of vs. Many are continually put into mouthes of the faithfull by the same Spirit, which in likenesse of worde doe not so much agree. This onely is our meaning in so teaching, that no man shoulde seeke, looke for, or ask any other thing at all than that which is summarily comprehended in this prayer, & which though it most differ in words yet differeth not in sense. Like as it is certaine that all the prayers which are founde in the Scriptures, & which do come out of godly hearts, are applied to this, so verily none can any where be found, which may match, much leesse passe, the perfection of this praiere. Here is nothing left out, that might be thought upon to the praises of God, nothing that ought to come into the mind of man for his owne profits: and the same so fully that all hope is worthily taken away from all men to attempt to make any better. In a summe, let vs remember that this is the doctrine of the wisdom of God, which hath taught what he willed, and willed what was needfull.

50 But although we haue aboute sayd, that we ought alway to breath upward with mindes lifted vp to God, and pray without ceasing; yet forasmuch as such is our weakenesse, as needeth to be vp holden with many helpes: such is our dulness, as needeth to be pricked forwarde with many spurreys: it is good that every one of us appoint to himselfe privately certain houres which may not passe away without prayer, and which may haue the whole affections of our minde throughly busied to that purpose: as, when wee rife in the morning, before that we goe to our dayes worke, when wee fitte downe to meate, when we haue beme fedde by the blessing of God, when we take vs to rest. Only let this not be a superstitious observing of houres, by which, as paying a taske to God, we may thinke our selues discharged for the other houres: but a training of our weakenesse, whereby it may so be exercised and from time to time stirred vp. Specially we ought carefully to looke that so oft as either wee our selues are in distresse, or wee see other to be in distresse with any hardnesse of a doubtfull, we rumpe straight way to him, not with feet but with hearts: then, that we suffer not any prosperitie of our owne or other mens, to passe but that we tellifie that we acknowledge it to be his with prayle and thanksgiving. Finally, this is diligently to be observed in all prayer, that we go not about to binde God to certaine circumstances, nor to appoint to him, what he shall doe, at what time, in what place, and in what maner: as by this prayer we are taught to make to him no lawe, nor to appoint to him any condition, but to leave to his will that those things which he will doe, he may doe in what maner, at what time, & in what place it pleaseth him. Wherefore ere wee make any prayer for our selues, we first pray that his will be done: where wee doe already submittest our will to his: with which when it is restrained as with a bridde put vp apon it, it may not presume to bring GOD into rule, but make him the judge and gouernour of all her desires.

51 If we do with mindes framed to this obedience, suffer our selues to be ruled with the laws of Gods Providence, we shall easily learne to continue in prayer, and with longing desires patiently to waite for the Lorde: being assured that although he appeare not, yet hee is alway present with vs, and will when he seeth his time declare howe not deseares he gaine to the prayer, which in the eyes of men seemed to be despised. And this shall be a most present comfort, that we faint not & fall downe by despaire, if at any time God doe not answere at our first requestes. Like as they are wont to do, which while they are caried with their sodaine heate, doe fo call apon GOD, that if hee come not to them at their first brunter and bring them present helpe, they by and by imagine him to be angry and hatefully bent an against them, and casting away all hope of obtaining do cease to call apon him. But rather differing our hope with a well tempered euennesse of minde, let vs goe forward in that perseverance which is so much commended to vs in Scriptures.
For in the Psalms we may oftentimes see how David and other faithful men, when they seeme in a manner wearied with praying, did beat the air, because they throw away their words to God that heard them not, yet they cease not from praying: because the word of God hath not his full authoritie maintained, vnlesse the credite thereof be set above all successes of things. Moreover let vs not tempt God and provoke him against vs being wearied with our importunacie, which many vs to doe, which do nothing but indent with God vpon a certaine condition, and bind him to the lawes of their covenant, as though he were seruant to their desires: which if hee doe not presently obey, they disdain, they chafe, they carpe against him, they murmure, they turmoile. Therefore to such oftentimes in his furor he being angrie grauntevth that, which to other in his mercie he being favorabe denyeth. An example hereof are the children of Israel, for whom it had bene better not to have bene heard of the Lord, than with flesh to bare vp his wrath.

52 But if yet at length after long looking for it our sense do not perceiue what we have prevailed with praying, and feelth no fruite thereof: yet our faith shall assure vs of that, which can not be perceiued by sense, namely vs wee have obteined that which was expedient for vs, forasmuch as the Lord doeth so oft and so certainly take vppon him that he will have care of our greaces, after that they have bene once laide in his bosome. And so he will make vs to possesse aboundance in pouerie, comfort in affliction. For howsoere all other things doe faile vs, yet God will neuer faile vs, which sufficeth the waiting and patience of them that be his to be disappointed. Hee alone shall suffice vs in needes of all things, forasmuch as hee conteyneth in himselfe all good things, which hee shall one day disclose vnto vs at the day of judgement when hee shall plainly shewe vs for the kingdoms. Beside this although God grant to vs, yet hee doeth not alway answer vs according to the expresse forme of our request, but holding vs after outwarde seeming in suspence, yet by a meane vnknowen he sheweth vs our prayers were not vain. This is meant by the words of John, if we know that he heareth vs when we ask any thing of him, we knowe that wee haue the petitions which we ask of him. This feemeth a weake superfluousneffe of wordes: but it is a singularly profitable declaration, namely that God euene when hee doeth not follow our desires, is yet gentle and favorable to our prayers, that the hope which resteth vpon his worde doth not disappoynt vs. But with this patience the faithfull doe so farre neede to bee sustayned, that they should not long stande vnlesse they did stay vpon it. For the Lord doth by no light trialls prove vs as bee his, and not tenderly doeth exercise them, but oftentimes driueth them into the greates extremities, and when they are driuen thither hee suffereth them long to sticke fast in the mire, ere hee giue them any taste of his sweetenesse: and, as Hanna sayeth, he layeth, and quickeneth: hee leadeth downe to the helles, and bringeth backe againe: What could they heere do but bee discouraged, and falle headlong into depayre: vnlesse when they are in diſtresse and defolate and alreadie halfe deade, this thought did rayse them vp, that God doeth looke vpon them, and that there shall be at hande an ende of their euilles: But how holde backe and restraine vs from all rashneffe. For wee shall knowe that so soone as we be gone out of the boundes of the worlde, we runne out of thy way, and in darkneffe, in which race wee must needs oftentimes stray, slippe, and stumble. First therefore let vs see before our eyes, that to correct any other knowledge of Predestination than that which is set forth by the worde of God, is a point of no lesse madnesse than if a man have a will to go by an unpalatible way, or to see in darkneffe. Neither let vs bee ashamed, to be ignorant of somwhat in it wherein there is some learned ignorance. But rather let vs willingly abstain from the searching of that knowledge, where- of the exceeding counting is both foolish & perilous, yea & deadly. But if the wantonneffe of wit provoke vs, it shall be profitable alway to set this against it, whereby it may bee beaten backe, that as too much of honie is not good, so searching of glory doth not turne us to glory to the curious. For there is good caufe why wee should be frayed away from that boldnes, which can do nothing but throw vs downe headlong into ruine.

3 There be other which when they have a will to remedie this evil, do command all mention of Predestination to bee in a manner buried, at the least they teach men to flee from every manner of questioning thereof as from a rock. Although the moderation of these men be herein worthily to be praised that they judge that mysteries should be tasted of with such sobrietie: yet because they descende too much beneath the meanes, they little presume to wit of man, which doth not lightly suffer it selfe to be restrained. Therefore in this behalf also we may keepe a right end, we must return to the word of the Lord, in which we have a sure rule of understanding. For, the Scripture is the schoole of the holy Ghost, in which as nothing is left out which is both necessary and profitable to be knowne, so nothing is taught but that which is behoefull to learne. Whatsoever therefore is written in the Scripture concerning Predestination, wee must beware that wee debarre not the faithful from it, lest we should seem either cuniously to defraud them of the benefits of their God, or to blame & accuse the holy Ghost who hath published those things, which it is in any wise profitable to be suppressed. Let vs (I say) give leave to a Christian man, to open his minde and his cares to all the sayings of God which are directed to him, so that it be done with this temperance, that so soon as the Lorde hath closed his holy mouth, he may also foreclose to himselfe all the way to enquire further. This shall be the best bond of sobrietie, if not only in learning we alway followe the Lorde going before vs, but also when he maketh an ende of teaching, we cease to will to learne. Neither is the danger which they feare of so great importance, that we ought therefore to turne away our minds from the oracles of God. Notable is the sayings of Salomon, that the glory of God is to conceal a worde. But fis both godlineffe and common reason teacheth that this is not generally meant of euerie thing, we must seake a difference, least brutish ignorance should please vs under colour of modestie and sobrietie. That difference is in fewe words plainly set out by Moses. To the Lorde our God (faith he) belong his secretes: but to vs and to our children hee hath disclosed these things. For we see how he commendeth to the people the study of the doctrine of the law, only by reason of the decree of God, because it plea. pleased God to publish it: and how he witholdeth the people within those bounds, by this only reason, because it is not lawful for mortal men to thrust themselves into the secretes of God.

4 Prophanemen (I grant) do in the matter of Predestination sodainly catch holde of somewhat which they may carpe, or caull, or barke, or scoffe at. But if their waywardnes do fray vs away from it, the chiefe articles of the faith must be kept secrete, of which there is almost none which they or such as they do be leauing untouched with blasphemie. A frowarde wit will no lesse proudly outrage when heareth that in the essence of God there are three persons, than if he heare that God foresaw what sould become of man when he created him. Neither will they absteine from lauging, when they shall understand that there is little more than five thousand yeares passed since the creation of the world: for they will aske why the power of God was so long idle and a sleepe. Finally there can be nothing brought forth, which they will not scoffe at. For the refraining of these sacrileges, must wee hold our peace of the Godheads of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost: or must we passe over in silence the creation of the world: Yea but the the truth of god is both in this behalfe and every where mightier than that it neede to feare the euill speaking of the wicked: as Augustine strongly maineteyneth in his work of the good of Perseuerance. For we see this fals Apofteres could not by deifying and flandering the true doctrine of Paul, make him to be a shamefull of it. But whereas they say this whole disputacion is perilous also for godly minds, because it maketh against exhortations, because it thaketh faith, because it troublith the heart it selfe: this is vaine. Augustine sticketh not to confesse that for these causes he was wont to be blamed, for that hee did too freely preach Predestination: but as he had in readiness wherewithall, he largely confutereth them. But we, because manie and diverse absurdities are thref into this place, had rather to refere every one to be wiped away in place of it. One ly this I desire generally to obteine of them, that those things which the Lord hath laid vp in secret, we may not search: those things which he hath brought openly abroad, we may not neglect: lest either on one part we be condemned of vaine curiosity, or on the other part of vnthankfulness. For, this also is verie well said of Augustine, that wee may safely follow the scripture, which as with a motherly pace goeth strappingly, leaft it should for sake our weakenes. But whoe are so ware and so fearfull that they would haue Predestination to be buried, leaft it should trouble weake soules: with what colour, I beseech you, will they couer their arroganct, when they indi¬rectly accuse God of foolish vnaduisednesse, as though hee foresaw not the danger, which they thinke themselves to have wisely met with? Whoseoeuer therefore travelleth to bring the doctrine of Predestination into misliking, he openly faith euill of God: as though somewhat had vnaduisedly slipped from him which is hurtful to the Church.

5 Predestination whereby God adopteth some into the hope of life, and judgeth some to eternal death, no man that would be accompted godly dare simply deny: But they wrap it vp with many caullations, specially they which make for knowledge the cause of it. We indeed doe say that they be both in God, but wee say that the one is wrongfullie made subiecte to the other.
When we give foreknowledge to God, we mean that all things always have beene and perpetually doe remaine vnder his eyes, so that to his knowledge there is nothing to come or past, but all things are present, and so present that hee dooth not imagine onely by conceived formes (as those things are present to vs, whereof our minde holdeth faft the remembrance) but hee truly beholdeth and seeth them as fet before him. And this foreknowledge extendeth to the whole compasse of the world and to all creatures. Predestination we call the eternal decree of God, whereby he had it determined with himselfe what he willed to become of every man. For all are not created to like estate: but to some eternall life, and to some eternall damnation is foreappointed. Therefore as every man is created to the one or other end, so we say that he is predestinate either to life or to death. But that predestination God hath not onely testified in every seuerall person, but hath shewed an example thereof in the whole issue of Abraham, whereby might plainly appeare that it lieth in his will what shall be the estate of every nation. When the Hicst divided the nations, and seuered the children of Adam, his parte was the people of Israel, the corde of his inheritance. The separation is before the eyes of all men: in the person of Abraham as in a dric stocke one people is peculiarly chosen, all other being refused: but the cause appeareth not, sauing that Moses, to cut off all occasion of glorying from posteritie, teacheth that they excell onely by the free loue of God. For hee assigneth this to be the cause of their deliverance, for that God loued the Fathers, & chose their feede after them. More plainly in an other Chapter: He was pleased in you to chose you, not because you pased other nations in number, but because hee loued you. The same admonition is often repeated with him, Beholde, to the Lorde thy God belongeth the heaven, the earth, and whatsoever things are in it: and hee hath pleased himselfe onely in your Fathers, and hath loued them, and hath chosen you your feede. Againe in an other place sanctification is commaund ed them, because they are chosen to bee a peculiar people. And againe in an other place, Loue is affirmed to bee the cause of protection. Which also the faithful doe declare with one voice, saying: He hath chosen for vs our inheritance, the glory of Iacob, whom he hath loued. For they doe all impute to free loue al the gifts wherewith they were garnished of God: not only because they knew that they themselues had obtained them by no deseruings, but also that even the holy Patriarch was not endued with such vertue, that he could purchase to himselfe and his posteritie so great a prerogative of honour. And, the more strongly to tread down al pride, he vpbraied them, that they haue deserued no such thing, forasmuch, as they are a stubborne and heard necked people. And oftentimes the Prophets doe hatefully and as by way of reproche cast the Iewes in the teeth with this election, because they had howly departed from it. Whatsoever it be, now let the come forth which will bind the election of God either to worthinesse of men, or to the merits of workes. When they see one nation to bee preferred before all other, and when they hear that God was led with respect to be more favorably bent to a few and vnoble, yea and froward and disobedient men: will they quarrell with him, because his will was to shewe such an example of mercy? But they shall neither with their prating voices hin-hinder his work, not with throwing stones of taunts into heaven shall hit or hurt his righteousness, but rather they fall back upon their own heads. Moreover the Israelites are called back to this principle of the free covenant, when either thanks are to be given to God, or their hope to be raised up against the time to come. He made vs, & not we our selves (faith the Prophet) his people & the sheep of his pastures. The negative is not superfluous, which is added to exclude vs, that they may knowe that of all the good things wherein they excel, God is not only the author, but fetched the cause thereof from himselfe, because there was nothing in them worthie of so great honor. Also he biddeth them to be contented with the meere good pleasure of God, in these words. The seede of Abraham are his seruantes, the children of Iacob his elect. And after he hath rehearsed the continuall benefits of God as fruires of the election, at length he concludeth, y he delect so liberally because he remembred his covenant. With which doctrine agreeth the song of the whole Church, Thy right hand & the light of thy countenance gave the land to our Fathers, because thou wast pleased in them. But it is to be noted, that where mention is made of the land, it is a visible signe of the secret steering wherein the adoption is contained. To the same thankfulness Dauud in another place exhorteth the people, saying, Blessed is the nation whose God the Lord is, the people which he hath chosen for an inheritance to himselfe. And Samuel encourageth them to good hope, saying, The Lorde will not forsake you, for his owne great names sake, because it pleased him to create you for a people to himselfe. Likewise Dauud when his faith is affailed, armeth himselfe to fight, saying, Blessed is he whom thou hast chosen, he shall dwell in thy courts. But forasmuch as the election hidden in God was stablised as well by the first deliverance as by the second, and other meane benefits: in Esay the word of Election is transferred to this. God shall have mercie on Iacob, and he shall yet choose out of Israel: because he signifying the time to come, faith that the gathering together of the remnant of the people which he seemed to have forsaken, shall be a signe of the stable and firđfaft election, which once seemed to have beene fallen away. When also it is said in another place, I have chosen thee & haue not cast thee away: he setteth out the continuall course of the notable liberalitie of his fatherly good wil. And yet more plainly the Angel faith in Zacharie, God shall yet choose Jerusalem: as though in hardly chastening it, he had rejected it: or as though the exile were an interrupting of the election: which yet remaineth inviolable, although the signes thereof do not alway appeare.

6 There is to be added a second degree more narrowly restrained, or in which was scene a more speciall grace of God: when of the same kinted of Abraham God refused some, & other som by nourishing them in the church he shewed that he retained among his children. Ishael had at the beginning obtained egall degree with his brother Izaac, because the spiritual covenant had beene no leffe sealed in him by the signe of Circumcision. He is cut off, and then, Esau: at the last an innumerable multitude and almost Ishael. In Izaac was the seede called: the fame calling endured in Iacob. A like example God shewed in reiecting Saul: which thing is also gloriously set forth. in the Psalm, He hath put backe the tribe of Ioseph, & the tribe of Ephraim he hath not chosen, but he hath chosen the tribe of Iuda. Which the holy historic dueste times repeate, that the wonderful secret of the grace may the better appeare in this change. Izaum, Esau, and such other, (I graunt) fell from the adoption by their owne fault & giltnes: because there was a condition adioyned, they should faithfully kepe the covenant of God, which they falsely brake. But this was yet a singular benefit of God, that he vouchefaed to preferre them above the other Gentiles: as it is said in the Psalm, He hath not so done to other nations, nor hath opened his judgements to them. But here I haue not without cause saide, there be two degrees to bee noted, because now in the chooing of the whole nation God shewed he is in his owne meere liberalitie bound to no lawes: but he is free, so that egall portion of grace is not to be required at his hand: the vnequalitie whereof sheweth that it is truely of free gift. Therefore Malachie affirmeth the vnthankfulness of Izaum, because they beeing not onely chosen out of all mankinde, but also seuered out of a holy house to be a peculiar people, doe vnsfaithfully and wickedly despise God so beneficiall a Father. Was not Esau the brother of Iacob? (faith he) and yet Iacob I loued, but Esau I hated. For, God taketh it for confessed, that when either of them was borne of a holy Father, and successor of the covenauent, finally a branch of the holy roote: nowe the children of Iacob were more than commonly bond, which were taken into that dignitie. But when Esau the first begotten being refused, their Father which was by nature inferior was made the heire, he proueth them doublely vnthankfull, and complaineth that they were not holde with that double bond.

7 Although it be alreadie sufficently euident, that God doth by his secret counsell freely choose whomse he will, reiecting other, yet his free election is hitherto but halfe shewed, till we come to all particular persons, to whomse God not only offereth salvation, but so assigneth it, that the certainty of the effect thereof is not in suspence or doutfull. For these are accounted in that onely seede, whereof Paul maketh mention. For although the adoption was left in the hand of Abraham, yet because many of his posteritie were cut off as rotten members: that the election may be effectuall and truely stedfast, we must needs ascend to the head, in whomse the heavenly Father hath bound together his elect one with another, and hath knit them to himselfe with a knot impossible to be loosed. So in the adoption of the kinred of Abraham, shined the liberall favour of God, which he denied to other men: yet in the members of Christ, appeareth a much more excellent strength of grace, because they being grafted into their head do never fall away from salvation. Therefore Paul doth fitly reason out of the place of Malachi which I euen now allleged: that where God with making a covenauent of eternall life calleth any people to himselfe, there is in part a speciall manner of election, that he doth not choose all effectually with common grace. Whereas it is said, I haue loued Iacob, this pertinneth to the whole issue of the Patriarch, which the Prophet there setteth in comparison against his posteritie of Esau. Yet this withstandeth not but y in the perf6 of one man was set forth to vs an example of the election, which cannot slippe away, but must come to the market that it tendeth to. These Paul doth not vainly note be called remnants: because experience teacheth that of a great multitude many slide and vanish away; so that oftentimes there remaineth but a small portion. But why the general election of a people is not alway firme and sted-fast, there is a reason offering it selfe in readinesse: because with whom God covenanteth he doth not by and by give to them the Spirit of regeneration, by the power whereof they may continue in the covenant to the ende: but the outwared changing without the inwared effectualnesse of grace, which might be of force to hold them in, is a certaine mean thing betwixtene the forfaking of whole mankinde, and the election of a small number of the godly. The whole people of Israel was called the inheritance of GOD, of whom yet there were many strangers. But because God had not for nothing made covenant with them that he would be their Father and redeemer, hee rather hath respect to his owne free favour than to the unfaithfull falling away of many: by whom also his truth was not abolished: because where he refered any remnant, it appeared that his calling was without repentance.
For whereas God did from time to time choose vnto himselfe a Church rather out of the children of Abraham, than out of the prophane nations, hee had regard to his covenant, which being broken of the whole multitude he restrained to a fewe, that it should not utterly fall away. Finally the common adoption of the seed of Abraham was a certaine visible image of a greater benefite, which God hath youched to grant to fewe out of many.
This is howe why Paul so diligently puttheth difference betwixt children of Abraham according to the flesh, and his spiritual children which were called after the example of Isaac. Not that it was a vaine and unjustfull thing simply to be child of Abraham (which might not be sayde without dishonour of the covenant) but because the unchangeable counsel of God, whereby he hath predestinate whom he would, is by it selfe effectuall one ly to this latter force vnto salvation. But I warne the readers that they bring not a foreconceited judgement on either side, till it appeare by the places of Scripture brought forth what is to be thought. That therefore which the Scripture ecleerely sheweth, we say God by eternall and unchangeable counsell hath once appointed whom in time to come he would take to sal-uation, and on the other side whom hee would condemn to destruction.
This counsell as touching the elect, wee say to bee grounded vpon his free merzie without any respect of the worthinesse of man: but whom hee ap-pointeth to damnation, to them by his just in deed and irreprehensible, but also incomprehensible judgement, the entry of life is foreclosed. Now in the elect we see vocation, to be the testimony of Election: and the justification to be another signe of the manifest shewing of it, till they come to glory wherein is the fulfilling of it. But as by vocation and election God maketh his elect: so by shutting out the reprobate either from the knowledge of his name or from the sanctification of his Spirit, he doth as it were by these marks open what judgement abideth for them. I will here passe over many fained inventions, which foolish men have forged to over throwe predestination. For they neede no confutation, which so soone as they are brought forth, do largly bewray their owne falsenesse. I will tary onely vpon those, which either are in controversie among the learned, or which may bring any hardinesse to the simple, or which vngodlines with faire seeming how pretedeth, to scoffe at the righteounesse of God.

The xxii. Chapter.
A confirmation of this doctrine by testimonies of the Scripture.

All these things which we haue set are not without controversie among many, specially the free election of the faithfull: which yet can not bee weakened. For the common forte doth thinke that GOD, as he fore-seth that euery mans deservings shalbe, so maketh difference betweene men: that therefore whome he foreknoweth that they shall be not unworthy of his grace, them he adopteth into place of children: and whose natures hee cleepe that they will bee bent to wickednesse and vngodlinesse, them he appointeth to the damnation of death. So by cloaking it with the veile of foreknowledge they doe not onely darken election, but faile that it hath beginning from elsewhere. And this opinion received of the common forte is not the opinion of the common forte alone: for in all ages it hath had great maintaineers. Which I doe plainly confesse, to the entent that no man shoulde trust that it shal much hurt our cause if their names be objected against vs. For, the truth of GOD herein is more certaine, than that it may be shaken: more cleare, than that it may bee darkened with the authoritie of men. But some other neither exercisid in the Scripture, nor worthy of any voyce, doe raile at this doctrine with greater malitio-ounesse, than that their frowarde pride ought to be sufferd. Because GOD choosid some after his owne will, leauing other some, they picke a quarell against him. But if the thing it selfe be known for true, what shall they prevalc with brawling against God? We teach nothing but that which is approved by experience, that it was alway at libertie for GOD to bestow his grace to whom he will. I will not enquire whereby the posteritie of Abraham excelled other, but by that vouchsafting, whereof there is founde no cause elsewhere than in GOD. Lette them amsure why thy be men rather than oxen or asses. When it was in the hande of GOD to make them dogges, he fashioned them after his owne image. Will they giue leaue to bruitt beastes to quarre with God for their estate, as though the difference were vnrighteous? Truly it is no more righteuous, they should enjoy the prerogatue which they have obtened by no deservidges, than for GOD diuerely to deale abroad his beneftes according to the measure of his own judgement. If they skippe over to persons, where the iniquitie is more hatefull to them, at the leaft at the example of Christ, they ought to be afraid to prate so boldly of so hie a mystery. He is conceiued of the seede of David, a mortal man: by what vertues will they say that he deferred to be in the very wombe made the heade of Angelles, the onely begotten sonne of GOD, the image and glory of the Father, the light, righteounesse, and salvation of the worlde? This thing Augustine wisely noted, that in the very heade of the Church is a most cleere mirror of free election, leaft it should trouble vs in the members: and that he was not by righteously living made the sonne of God, but ye he had so great honour freely given him, that he might after. De ver. Apo. warde make other partakers of his gifts. Here if any man ask why other were not the same that he was; or why all we are so farre distant from him, why al we be corrupt & he purenes: such a man shall bewray not only his mad ness, but therewithall also his shamefnesse. But if they go forward to labor to take from God the free power to chofe & refuse, let them also take away that which is given to Chrift. Now it is worth the trauaile to confider what the Scripture pronounceth of every one. Paul verily, when he teacheth that we were chosen in Chrift, take away all respect of our owne worthinesse.
For it is all one as if he had said: because in the whole seed of Adam the heavenly father found nothing worthie of his election, he turned his eyes unto his Chrift, to choose as it were members out of his body them where he would take into the fellowship of life. Let this reason then be of forse among the faithful, that we were therefore adopted in Chrift into the heavenly inheritance, because in our felues we were not able to receive so great excellencie. Which also be touched in another place, when he exhorteth Col.1.12.
Coloffians to giuing of thanks, for this that they were by God made fit to be partakers of the eftate of the holy. If election goe before this grace of god that we be made fit to obtaine the glory of the life to come: what shall God himselfe now finde in vs whereby he may be moud to elect vs? My meaning shall yet be more openly expresed by another saying of his. He hath chosen vs (faith he) are the foundations of the world were laid, according to good Eph.1.4. pleasure of his will, that we might be holy, and vnspotted, and vnreprovable in his fight: where he setteth the good pleasure of God against all our def-tureings whatsoever they be.

2 That the proffe may be more strong, it is worth the labour to note all the partes of that place, which being coupled togethre do leave no doubt.
Where he nameth the elect, it is no dout that he speakesth to the faithfull, as exhorteth he also by and by afterward affirmeth. Wherefore they doe with too sole a gloue abuse that name, which wrest it to the age wherein the Gospel was first published. Where he faith that they were electe before the beginning of the world, he taketh away all respect of worthines. For, what reason of difference is there betwene them which yet were not, and those which afterwarde should in Adam be egall? Now if they be elect in Chrift, it followeth that not oney man is seuered without himselfe, but also one of them from another, forasmuch as we see that not all are the members of Christes.
That which is added, that they were elect that they might be holy, plainly confuteth the errour which deriue the election from foreknowledge, foras such as Paul cryeth out against it and sayeth that whatsoever vertue appeareth in men, it is the effect of election. Now if a hier caufe be sought, Paul an-swereth, that God hath so predestinate, yea and that according to the good pleasure of his will. In which wordes he ouerthroweth whatsoever means of their election men do imagine in themselves. For he also teacheth that whatsoever things God giueth toward the spiritual life, they flowe out of this one fountaine, because GOD hath choen whome he would, and ere they were borne he had seuerally laid vp for them the grace which he vouche-ued to giue them.
But wherefoever this pleasure of God reigneth, there no works come to be considered. He doth not here in decide pursue the comparison of contraries, but it is to be understanded such as he himselvse declareth. He hath called vs (faith he) with a holy calling, nor according to our works, but according to his purpose and the grace which is giuen of Christ before the times of the world. And we have alreadie shewed that all doubt is taken away in this which followeth, that we might be holy and vs spotted. For if thou say, because he foreseaw that we should be holy, therefore he chose vs, thou shalt pervert the order of Paul. Thus therefore thou maist falsely gather. If he chose vs we might be holy: then he chose vs, not because he foresaw we would be such. For these two things are contrarie the one to the other: that the godly haue it of election that they be holy, and that they come to it by meanes of works. Neither is their canvallation here any thing worth to which they commonly flee, that the Lord doth not render the grace of election to any workes going before, but yet granteth it to works to come. For when it is said that the faithfull were chosen, that they might be holy: therewithall is signified that the holiness which was to come in them tooke beginning at election. And how shall this saying agree together, that those things which are derived from election gauie cause to election? The same thing which he said he feemeth afterward to confirm more strongly, where he faith, According to the purpose of his will which he had purposed in himselfe. For, to say that God purposed in himselfe, is as much in effect as if it had bene said, that without himselfe he considered nothing whereof hee had any regard in decreeing. Therefore he byandby addeth, the whole summe of our election tendeth to this end, y the we should be to the praise of the grace of God. Truly the grace of God deserueth not to be praised alone in our election, y neither our election be free. But free it shall not be, if God in electing his, do consider what shall be the works of every one. Therefore we find that that which Christ saied to his disciples, hath place vnversally among all the faithfull, Ye haue not chosen me, but I haue chosen you. Where hee not onely excluded defeuunges past, but also signifieth that they had nothing in themselves why they should be chosen, if hee had not prevented them with his mercy. Like as this saying of Paul is also to be understood: Who first gauie to him, & shal receive recompence? For he meaneth to shewe that y goodness of God so preuenteth men, that it findeth nothing in them neither past nor to come, whereby he may be wonne to be favourable to them.

Now to the Romanes, where he fetcheth this question further of, & followeth it more largely, he denieth that all they are Israelites, which are shifred of Israel: because although by right of inheritance they were all blessed, yet the succession did not equally passe to them all. The beginning of this disputation proceeded of the pride & deceitful glorying of the Jewish people. For when they claimed to themselues the name of the Church, they would have the credit of the Gospel to hang upon their wills: the Papistes at this day would gladly with this shined colour thrust themselues into the place of God. Paul, although he granteth the offspring of Abraham is holy by reason of the covenant, yet affirmeth y the most part of them are strangers in it: & not only because they swarue out of kind, so that of lawfull children they they become bastarde, but because the especiall election of God standeth above & reigneth in the highest place, which alone maketh the adoption thereof sure. If their own godlinesse stablished some in the hope of salvation, and their own falling away alone disherited other some: Paul verily shouldde both boldly and unconveniently lift vp the readers euen to the secreete election. Now if the will of God (the cause whereof neither appeareth nor is to be sought without himselfe) maketh the one sort differing from the other, so not all the children of Israel be true Israelites, it is vainly staine they every mans estate hath beginning in himselfe. Then he further followeth the matter vnder the example of Iacob & Esau. For when they both were the fonnes of Abraham, both together enclosed in one mothers womb, it was a monsterlike change that the honor of first birth was removed to Iacob, by which change Paul affirmeth that there was testified the election of one, and the reprobation of the other. The originall & cause of it is enquired, which the teachers of foreknowledge will haue to be set out in the vertues, & vices of men. For this is an eafie short way with them, that God chused in the person of Iacob, that he chooseth the worthie of his grace: and in the person of Esau, he refuseth them whom he foreseth to be vnworthie. Thus they say boldly: But what faith Paul? when they were not yet borne, & had not done any good or euill, that according to election the purpose of God might abide, not of worke, but of him that calleth, it is said: The elder shall serue the younger: as it is written, Iacob haue loued, but Esau haue hated. If foreknowledge were of any force in this difference of the brethren, then verily mention were vnfruitfully made of the time. Let vs graunt that Iacob was chosen, because he had worthines gotten by worke to come: to what purpose should Paul say that he was not yet borne? And this nowe should be vnaduisedly added, that he had ye done no good: because this shalbe a readie answere, that nothing is hidden from God, & that so the godlines of Iacob was present before him. If worke do win grace, they should then worthily haue had their price before that Iacob was borne as if he had been grown to ful age. But the Apostle goeth forward in vndoing this knot, and teacheth that the adoption of Iacob was not made of worke, but of the calling of God. In worke he enterlacet the time to come or time past: & then he directly setteth them against the calling of God, meaning by stablishing of one expressly to overthrow the other: as if he had said that it is to be considered what hath pleased God, not what men haue brought of themselues. Last of all it is certaine that by the words of Election & Purpose, all causes whatsoever men are wont to faine elsewhere than in the secret counsell of god, are quite removed from this matter.

5 What colour will they bring to darken these things, who in election affigne some place to worke either past or to come? For this is ytterly to mocke out that which the Apostle affirmeth, that the difference of the brethren hangeht not vpon any consideration of worke, but uppon the mere calling of God, because it was put betweene them when they were not yet borne. Neither had he bene ignorant of this their suttletie, if it had had any soundnes in it; but because he very wel knew, y God can foresee no goodnes in man, but y which he hath first determined by the benefit of his election to glue him: he fleeth not to that vnorderly order, to set good workes before the cause of themselues. Thus haue we by the wordes of the Apoſtle that the falutation of the faithfull is founded vpon the will of the onely election of God: and that the same favoure is not gotten by workes, but commeth of free calling. We haue also as it were an image of that thing set before vs. Esau & Iacob are brethren, offering both of the fame parents, enclofed yet both in one wombe, not yet brought out into the worlde: In them all things are egall,yet of them the judgement of God is diuere. For he taketh the one & forfeathe the other. There was nothing but the onely first birth, by right whereof the one excelled the other. But this also being passed over, y thing is giuen to the yonger which is denied to the elder. Yea, and in other also God seemeth alway as of fet purpose to haue defiſped first birth, to cut off from the fleth all matter of glorying. Refusing Iſmael, he cast his minde to Iſaac. Plucking backe Manaffe, he more honored Ephraim.

6 If any man interrupt me with saying that we must not by these inferior & smal benefits determine of the summe of the life to come, that hee which hath bin aduanced to the honor of first birth, should therefore be reckoned to be adopted into the inheritance of heaven: (for there bee some which spare not Paul himself,as though in aleging these testimonies he had wrested the Scripture to a strange sense:) I answere as I haue don herebefore, y the Apoſtle neither slipped by vnaduſednes,nor wilfully abused the testimonies of the Scripture. But he faw(which they cannot abide to confider) y God minded by an earthly signe to declare the spiritual election of Iacob, which otherwise was hidden in his inaccessible throne. For vineſſe we refer the first birth granted to him vnto the world to come, it should be a vaine & fond forme of blessing whereby he obtained nothing but manifold miseries, difcommodities,grieſſe full banishment, and many bitterness of sorrow and cares. Therefore when Paul faw without douteing,that God by outward blessing testified the blessing which he had in his kingdom prepared spirituall and never decaying for his feren: he doubted not for proofe of this spiritual blessing,to fetch an argument from that outward blessing. This also we must remember that to the land of Canaan was adiſned the pledge of the heauenly dwelling:so that it ought not at all to be doubted that Iacob was graced with the Angels into the body of Christ, that he might bee partaker of the fame life. Iacob therefore is chosen, when Esau is rejected: and by the predeſtination of God is made diſſere from him from whom hee differed not in any desueringes. If you ask a caufe, the Apoſtle rendreth this because it is said to Mofes, I wil haue mercke vpon whom I wil haue mercke:and I wil vouchsafe to graunt mercy to whom I souer I wil vouchsafe to graunt mercy. And what, I beſeech you, meaneth this? Verily, the Lorde himselfe most plainly pronounceth y men haue in themselues no caufe why he should do good to them, but he fette them the caufe from his owne mercie only: & therefore y the faluation of his is his owne worke. When God seteth thy faluation in himselfe alone, why wilt thou descende to thy selfe? When he appointeth to thee his mercke alone, why wilt thou runne to thine owne desueringes: When he holdeth thy thought wholly in his mercifulnes alone, why wilt thou turne part to the beholding of thine owne worke? Therfore

we must needs come to that leffer people, which Paul in an other place said to haue beene foreknown to God: not in such sort as these men imagine, to foreknowe out of an idle watchtoure the thinges that he worketh not: but in such sense as it is oft reade. For truely when Peter faith in Luke, Christ was by the determined counsell & foreknowledge of God appointed to death: he doth not bring God as a looker on but the author of our salvation. So the same Peter also, where he sayth that the faithfull to whom he wrote were chozen according to the foreknowledge of God, properly expresseth that secret Predestination whereby God hath marked for his children whom he would. And this word Purpose, which he joyneth for a due word, expressing all one thing, forasmuch as it doth euery where signifies a steadfast determination as they commonly call it, undoubtedlie teacheth that God when he is author of our salvation goeth not out of himselfe. In which sense he sayth in the same Chapter that Christ was the lambe foreknowne before the creation of the worlde. For what is more fonde or tripling, than to say that God from on hie did stande looking whence salvation should come to mankinde? Therefor in Paul the foreknownen people is asmuch as a small portion mingled with the multitude which fallitly pretendeth his name of God. In an other place also Paul to beate down their boasting which being but covered with a visor, do take vpon them selues the chief preeminence among the godly before the word, sayth that God knoweth who be his. Finally by that saying Paul pointeth vnto vs two sortes of people: the one, of the whole kinred of Abraham: the other, seuerally choosen out of it, and which being laid vp vnder the eyes of God, is hidden from the sight of men. And it is no doubt that he tooke this out of Moses, which affirmeth God will bee mercifull to whom he will (although he there speake of the elect people, whose estate in outward seeming was equall) as if he should haue sayd, in the common adoption is included with him a speciall grace toward som, as it were a more holy treasure: and that the common couenaunt withstandeth not but that the same small number may be exempt in degree: and he willing to make himselfe the tree dispofer and ruluer of this thing, precifely denieth that he will be mercifull to one rather than to another, for any other reason, but for that it so pleaseth him: because when mercy cometh to him that seeketh it, though he in deede suffer not a deniell, yet he either preuenteth or partly getteh to himselfe the favoure whereof God claimeth to himselfe the praise.

7 Now let the souereigne judge & master pronounce of the whol matter. When he saw so great hardnes in his hearers, that he did in a maner waft his wordes without fruite among the multitude: to remedy this offence, he cryeth out, Whatsoever my Father giueth me, it shall come to me. For this is the will of my Father, that whatsoever my Father hath giuen me, I shall not loose any thing of it. Note that the beginning is taken at the Fathers giueth, that we may be delivered into the faithful keeping and defence of Christes. Here some man peradventure will turne a circle about, and will take exception, sayeing that they onely are accounted in the proper possession of the Father, whose yelding hath beene voluntarie by faith. But Christ standeth onely vpon that pointe, that although the fallinges away of great multitudes doe shake the whole worlde, yet the counsell of God shall be stedfast and yea rather, them which were strangers he made his owne by drawing them to him. There is a greater clearenesse in the words of Christ, that can by shifting be covered with any darkenesse. No man (sayth he) can come to mee, vnlesse my Father drawe him. But who so hath heard and learned of my Father, he commeth to mee. If all generally without difference should bow their knee before Christ, then the election were common: but nowe in the fewnesse of the believers appeareth a manifest diuersitie. Therefore after that Christ had affirmed that the disciples which were given him, were the peculiar spoies of God the Father, within a little after he added, I pray not for the world, but for those whom thou hast given me, because they are thine. Whereby is proved that the whole world belongeth not to the Creator of it, sauing that grace delivereth a few from the wrath of God, and from eternal death, which otherwise should have perished; but the world it selfe is left in his owne destruction to which it was appointed. In the meane time although Christ put himselfe betweene, yet he claimeth to himselfe the power of choosing in common with the Father. I speake not (sayth he) of all: I know whom I haue chosen. If any man asketh from whence he hath chosen them, he answereth in an other place, Out of the world, which he excludeth out of his prayers when he commendeth his disciples to his Father. This is to be holde, that when he affirmeth he knoweth whom he hath chose, there is signified some speciall sorte in the generall kinde of men; then, the same speciall sort is made to differ not by the qualitie of their owne vertues, but by the heavenly decree. Whereupon followeth that many excel by their owne force or diligence, when Christ maketh himselfe the author of election. For when in an other place he reckoneth Judas among the elect, whereas he was a deluall, this is referred onely to the office of Apostle: shiue which although it be a cleere mirror of the favour of God (as Paul so oftentimes acknowledgeth in his owne person,) yet it containeth not in it selfe the hope of eternall salvation. Judas therefore, when he did unfaithfully bare the office of an Apostle, might bee worse than the deluall: but of those whom Christ hath once graffed into his body, he will suffer none to perish: because in preferring their salvation he will performe that which he hath promised, that is, he will stretch forth that power of God which is greater than all. For wheras he saith in another place. Father, of those whom thou haue given me, I haue lost none but the sonne of perdition: although it be an absurde speche by figure, yet it hath no doubtfull meaning. The summe is that God maketh them his children by free adoption whom he will have to be his children: and that the inward caufe thereof is in himselfe: because he is content with his owne secret good pleasure.

8 But Ambrose, Origen, and Hierome thought that GOD distributeth his grace among men, as he foreseeth that every man will vie it well: Yea and Augustine was once in the same opinion. But when he had better profited in knowledge of the Scripture, hee not onely reuoke it as evidently false, false, but also strongly confused it: yea and after his reuoking of it, in repro. using the Pelagians for that they continued in the same error, faith: Who cannot maruell that the Apostle knewe not this most subtle fene? For when he had set out a thing to be wondred at of these brethren, while they were not yet borne, and afterwaids objected a question against himselfe, saying: what then? Is there uniuinse with God? Here was fit place for him to aunswere, that God foresaw the merites of them both: yet he faith not this, but flyeth to the judgements and mercie of God, and in another place, when he had taken away all merites before election, Here (faith hee) is confuted their vaine reasoning which defend f forknowledge of God against f grace of God, and therefore say that we are chosen before the making of f worde because God foreknewe that wee would be good, not that he himselfe wold make vs good. He faith not this, which faith, Ye haue not chosen mee, But I haue chosen you. For if he had therefore chosen vs, because he foreknewe f woulde be good: he shoude therewithall also haue foreknowne that wee woulde choose him; and so foorth as followeth to that effect, Let the testi-monie of Auguftine be of force among them that willingly rest in the autho-ritie of the Fathers. How be it Auguftine suffreth not himselfe to bee fevered from the refte: but by clere testimonies sheweth that this disagreement is false with the malice whereof the Pelagians burdened him. For in the xix. chapter of his booke of the predeftination of Saints, he alleageth out of Ambrofe, Christ calleth whom he hath mercy on. Again, If he had willed, of the vndeout he might haue made deout.But god calleth whom he vouchfaeth, & whome he will he maketh religious. If I lifted to knit together a whole volume out of Augustine, I could readily shewe to the readers that I neede no other words but his: But I will not load them with tediousneffe. But go to, let vs imagine that they speake not at all: but lef vs giue heede to the matter it selfe. A hard question was moued, whether God did righteously in this that he vouchsaued his grace but to some O of which question Paul might haue vncombed himselfe with one word if he had alleagd f respect of worke. Why therfore doth he it not, but rather continueth on a discouer which abideth in the same hardenesse? Why, but because he ought not: For the Holy ghost which spake by his mouth, had not the disease of forgetfulness. Therefore without any circumstances he answereth, f God therefore fa-uteth, his elect, because he will: therefore hath mercie, because he will. For this Oracle of God, I will haue mercie vpon whom I will haue mercie, and I will shew mercie to whom I will shew mercie, is as much in effect as if it had been said, f God is moued to mercie by no other reason but because he will haue mercie. Therefore this sayinge of Augustine remaineth true, that the grace of God doth not find men fit to be chosen, but maketh them.

9 Neither do we anything passe vpon the suttellie of Thomas, that the foreknowledge of deservings, is not indeed the cause of Predeftination on the behalfe of him that doeth predeftinate, but on our behalfe it may after a certayne manner bee so called, that is, according to the particular weying of Predeftination: as when it is faide that God predeftina-teth glorie to man by deservings, because he hath decreeed to giue to him grace by which he may deferue glorie. For ifth the Lorde will in election

have vs to looke vnto nothing but his mere goodnesse, if any man shall couet here to see any more, it shalbe a wrongfull greedines. If wee lufted to strive in suttletie, wee want not wherewith to beate backe this silly suttletie of Thomas. Hee affirmeth that to the electe glorie is after a certaine manner predeftinate by deferuings,because the Lord doth after a certaine manner predeftinate to them the grace, by which they may defferue glorie. What if I aunswere on the contrarie side and say that predeftination vnto grace, freeth election vnto life, and is as it were a waiting maid after it that grace is predeftinate to them, to whom the possession of glorie hath beene long agoe appointed : because it please the Lorde to bring his children from election into justification? For therevpon it shalbe folloewe that the predeftination of glorie was rather the cause of the Predeftination of grace, the contrariwise. But away with these struyings as thinges superfluous for such as shal think that there is wisdom enough for them in the word of God. For this was in olde time truely written of an Ecclesiastical writer, that they which asigne the election of God to merites are more wise than they ought to be.

10 Some doe object that God shoulde bee contrarie to himselfe if hee shoulde vniuerally call all men to him, and receive but a fewe elect. So by their opinion the vniuerfalnesse of the promise taketh away the difference of special grace. And thus certaine sober men speake, not so much to oppresse the the truth, as to debarre crabbed questions, and to bridle the curiositie of many. Their will is praysie worthie, but their counsell is not to be allowed: because dallying by shutes is neuer excuuable. But their objecting of it which do more rassylingly intente against it, is verity too fonde a cauallion, or too shamefull an error. How the Scripture maketh these two to agree together, that by outwarde preaching all men are called to Repentance & faith, and yet not to all men is gien the Spirit of Repentance and faith, I haue in another place already declared, and by and by somewhat of it must be repeated againe. Nowe that which they require I denie to them, sith it is two wayes false. For, he that threateneth that while it raineth vpon one citie, there shall be drought vpon another: Hee that pronounceth that there shall in another place be famine of doctrine, bindeth not himselfe with a certaine lawe to call all men equally. And he which forbidding Paul to speake in Asia, and turning him from Bithinia draweth him into Macedonia, sith that it is in his owne power to distribuite this treasurie to whome soever it shall please him. Yet more plainly he fieweth by Esay, how he peculiarly directeth to the elect the promises of saluation : for he fayth of them onely, and not of all mankinde indifferently, that they shalbe his Disciples. Whereby it is certaine that the doctrine of saluation is wrongfull ly set open in common to all men to profit effectualli, which is faide to bee fenerallly layde vp onely for the children of the Church. Let this suffice at this present, that although the voyce of the Gospell speake generally to all, yet the gift of faith is rare. Esay assigneth the cause, for that the arme of the Lord is not open to all men. If he had faide that the Gospell is maliciously and fowardly despisef, because many doe stubbornely refuse to heare: peraduenture this colour touching vniuerfall calling should preuaile. Neither is is it the purpose of the Prophet to diminish the fault of men, when he teacheth that the fountain of blindenes is, that God vouchsafteth not to open his arme to them: onely he giveth warning, that because faith is a fingoar gift, the eares are beaten in vaine with outward doctrine. But I would faine know of these doctoure, whether onely preaching, or faith, make the children of God. Certainly when it is sayd in the first chapter of John, Whosoever belieueth in the only begotten Sonne of God, are themselfes alfo made the children of God; there is not in that place a confused heap jumbled vp together: but a speciall order is giuen to the faithfull, which are borne not of bloude, not of the will of the fleshe, nor of the will of man, but of God. But (saye they) there is a mutuall conflent of faith with the worde. Namely wherefoever is faith. But it is no new thing that seede fall among thornes or in stony places: not onely because the greater part appeareth in deepe obsteinate against God, but also because not all men haue eyes and eares. How then that it agree that God callleth to him them who he knoweth will not come? Lete Augustine anfwere for me. Wilt thou diuerte with me? Maruaile with me, & cry out, O depth. Let vs both agree in feare, left we perifh in error. Moreover if election (as Paul witnesleth) be the mother of faith, I turne backe the argument upon their owne heade, that faith is therefore not generall, because election is special. For by orderly hanging together of causes and effectes, it is easilie gathered that where Paul sayth, that we are full of al spiritual blessing, as God had choen vs before the creation of the world: therefore these riches are not common to all, because God hath chosen only whom he would. This is the reason why in an other place he comendeth the faith of the elect, leaft it should be thought that any man doth by his owne motion get faith to himself: but that this glorie may remayne with GOD, that they are freely enlightened of him, whom he had choen before. For Bernard sayth rightly, Friends doe feuerally heare to whom he alfo faith, Fears not thou small flocke: for to you it is giuen to know the mysterie of the kingdom of heauen. Who be these? euon they whom he hath foreknown and predestinate to be fashioned like to the image of his Sonne. A great & secret counfel is made knowne. The Lorde knewe who be his: but that which was knowne to God, is made manifest to men: neither doth he vouchsafe to make any other partakers of so great a mysterie, but those selfe same men whom he hath forknown and predestinate to be his. A little after he concludeth. The mercy of God is from eternity euon to eternity vpon them y feare him: from eternitie, by reason of predestinacion to eternitie, by reason of blessed making: the one without begining, the other without ending. But what neede I to cite Bernard for witnesse, when we heare of the masters owne mouth, that none do se, but they which are of God? By which wordes he signifieth, that all they which are not begotten againe of God, doe dasell at the brightnesse of his countenance. And to election in deedee is fittly joyned, to that it keepe the seconde degree, Which order the wordes of Christ do cleerely expreffe in an other place. This is the will of my Father, that I lofe not y which he hath giuen. For this is his wil, that whosoever belieueth in the Sonne, shall not perish. If he would haue al saued, he would appoint ouer them his Sonne to be their keeper, and would graffe them all into his body with the holy holy bond of faith. Nowe it is certaine that faith is a singular pledge of his fatherly loue, laide vp for his children whome he hath adopted. Therefore Christ in an other place saith that the sheepe followe the shepheard,because they knowe his voyce: but they followe not a stranger, because they knowe not the voyce of strangers. Whence commeth this difference, but because their ears are hoared by God? For no man maketh himselfe a sheepe: but hee is made one by the heavenly grace. For which cause also the Lorde teacheth that our saetiie shall alway be certaine and free from daunger, because it is kepe by the invincible power of God. Wherefore he concludeth that the vnbeketues are not of his sheepe: namely because they are not of the number of them, whom God hath promiseth by Efaie that they shalbe his disciples. Nowe because in the testimonies which I haue alledged is expresed perseverance, they doe therewithall testifie the unmoveable stedfastnesse of election.

Nowe let vs speake of the reprobate, whom the Apostle IOYNETH there together. For as Jacob, having yet with good words deferued nothing, is taken into grace: so Efaie, being yet defiled with no wicked doing, is hated. If we turne our eyes to workes, we doe wrong to the Apostle, as though he sawe not the same thing which we ecleerly see. It is proued, that hee sawe it not, forasmuch as he expressly enforcing this pointe, that when they had not yet done any good or euill, the one was chosen, and the other refused, to proue that the foundation of the predestination of GOD is not in workes. Againe when he mowed the obiection, whether God be vnrighteous, hee allegeth not that which had beene the most certaine and plaine defence of his righteousness, namely that God reduced to Efaie, according to his euilnesse: but he was content with an other solution, that the reprobate are sturred vp to this ende, that the glory of God may be set forth by them. Lyft of all he adioyneth a concluding sentence, that God hath mercie vpon whomse he will, and hardeneth whom he will. See you not howe he impureth both to the onely will of God? Therefore if we can not declare a reason why he vouchsaeth to graunt mercie to them that be his, but because it so pleaseh him: neither also shall we have any other cause in rejecting of other, than his owne will. For when it is sayd that God hardeneth, or sheweth mercie to whomse he will, men are thereby warned to seke no cause else where than in his will.

The xxiii. Chapter.

A Confutation of the slanders wherewith this doctrine hath alway beene wrongfully burdened.

But when the witte of man heareth these thinges, the frowardnesse therof can not be restrained, but that by and by as at the bloody blast of a trumpet, sounding to battaile, it diversly and excessiely turnomyth. And many in deede, as though they would drive away the malice from GOD, doe so graunt election, that they denye that any man is reprobate: but they do too ignorantly and childishly: forasmuch as election it selfe could not stande vnlesse it were set contrary to reprobation: God is sayd to seuer them whom he adopteth adopteth vsuto salvation: it should be more than foolishly said that other do either by chance or by their owne endeouour obtaine that which onely eledition giueth to a fewe. Therefore whome God paffeth over, he reiecteth: and for none other cause, but for that he will exclude them from the inheritance which he doth predestinate to his children. Neither is the waiwardnesse of men tolerable, if it suffer not it selfe to be bridled with the worde of God, where the incomprehensible counsell of God is intreated of,which the Angels themselues doe worshippe. But we have already heard, that hardenings is no lesse in the hand & will of God than mercie. Neither doth Paul (as the' men do I have spoken of) busily labor to excuse God with a lying defence: but only he teacheth that it is not lawfull for the thing formed to quarel with him that formed it. Now who so doe not admit that any are reicted of God, how wil they vncomber themselves from that saying of Chrift Every tree which my father hath not planted, shall be plucked vp by the root?
They playnely heare that all they are adjudged and auowed to destruction: whome the heavenly Father hath not vouchsafed to plant as holy trees in his ground. If they denie this to be a signe of reprobation, then is there nothing so cleare y it may be proved to them. But if they cease not to wragle, let the sobrietic of faith be contented with this admonition of Paul, that there is no cause to quarel with God, if he will on the one side to shew his wrath and to make his power knowne doe with dumme sufferance, and lenitie beare the vessels of wrath prepared to destruction: and on y other side he make knowne the riches of his glory toward the vessels of mercy which he hath prepared to glory. Let Readers marke, how Paul to cut off occasion from whisperinges and backbitings, giueth the cheefe rule to the wrath and power of God: because it is vniust that those deep judgementes which swallowe vp all our senses, should be made subiect to our determination: Our aduersaries aunswere is verie trifling, that God doth not vitrally reiect them whome he suffereth in lenite, but abideth with a minde hanging in suspence toward them, if paradueteur they may repent. As though Paul giueth to God a patience, to looke for their turning, whome he faith to be made to destruction. For, Augustine faith rightly where hee expoundeth this place, that where power is joyned to sufferance, God doth not suffer, but governeth with his power. They further say auo that it is not for nothing saide that the vessels of wrath are prepared to destruction: but, that God hath prepared the vessels of mercie: because by this meanes he affirmeth & chalengeth that praise of salvation to God, but the blame of destruction hee casteth vp upon them which by their owne will doe bring it vpon themselfes. But although I grant to them that Paul by the duerse manner of speakeing did often the roughnesse of the firste partie of the sentence, yet is it not meete to assigne the preparing vnto destruction to any other thing than to the secrete counsell of God: which also is affirmed a little before in the rest of the text, That God stirred vp Pharao: Then that he hardeneth whome hee will. Where-

This at the least I get which Augustine faith , that when G O D of wolues maketh sheepe, hee doth with a mightie grace reforme them, that their hardnes may bee tamed: and therefore God for this cause doth not convert the obstinate, because he doth not shew forth in them the mightier grace, which he wanteth not if he would shew it forth.

2 These sayings in deede should be sufficient for the godly and sober, & them which remember themselves to be men. But forasmuch as these venemous dogges doe cast vp not onely one sorte of venime against God, we will as the matter shal sere, aunswe to euery one particularly. Foolishe men doe diversely wayes quarrel with God, as though they had him subiecte to their accusations. First therefore they aske, by what right the Lord is angry with his creatures, of whom he hath not ben first prouoked by any offence: for to condemne to destruction whom he will, agreeeth rather with the wilfulnes of a tyrant, than the lawfull sentence of a judge. Therefore they say that there is cause why men should charge God, if by his bare will, without their owne descovering, they be predestinate to eternal death. If such thoughts doe at any time come into the minde of the godly, to break their violent assaults they shalbe sufficiently armed with this although they had no more, if they consider howe great wickednesse it is, even so much as to inquire of the causes of the will of God: for of all things that are, it is the cause, & worrthily so ought to be. For is it have any cause, then somewhat must goe before it, whereto it must bee as it were bound: which it is unlawfull once to imagine. For, the will of God is so the highest rule of righteousnesse, that whatsoever he willeth, even for this is that he willeth it, it ought to be take for righteous. When therefore it is asked, why the Lord did it: it is to be aunswered, because he willed it. But if thou goe further in a asking why he willed it, thou askest some greater and hier thing than the will of God: which can not be found. Let therefore the rightnesse of man restraine it selfe, and not seeketh which is not, least paraduenture it may not finde that which is. With this bridle (I say) he shall be well witholden whosoever hee be that wil defpate of the secretes of God with reuerence. As for the boldnesse of the wicked, which dare not openly to speake euill of God: against it the Lorde with his own righteouynesse, without any our defense shal sufficiently defende himselfe, when he shall take all shifting from their consciences, and holde them fast confounded, and condemne them. Neither doe we yet thrust in the fained daie of absolute power, which as it is prophan, so worthily ought to be abhorred of vs. We faine not God lawlesse, who is a lawe to himselfe: because (as Plato sayth) men stand in neede of lawes, who are troubled with unlawfull lustes: but the will of God is not onely pure from all fault, but also is the highest rule of perfection, yea and the lawe of all lawes. But wee denie that he is subiect to yelde accompt. Wee denie also that we are meece judges, which woulde pronounce of this cause after our owne sense. Wherefore if we attempt further than we lawfully may, let that threatening of the Psalm bring vs in feare, that God shall overcome so oft as he is judged of any mortall man.

3 So can God in keeping silence, put his enemies to silence. But, that we may not suffer them freely to sorne his holy name, he delivereth to vs out of his worde weapons against them. Wherefore if any man assaile vs with such words: why God hath from the beginning predestinate some to death, which when they were not, coulde not yet deterre the judgement of death: wec

we in stead of aunsweere may againe on our side ask of them, what they think that God oweth to man, if he will judge him by his owne nature. In such fort as we be all corrupted with finne, we cannot but be hatefull to god: and that not by tyrannous crueltie, but by most upright reason of iustice. If all they whom the Lorde doeth predestinate to death, are by the estate of nature subject to the judgement of death: of what vniustice against themselves, I befeech you, may they complaine? Let al the sons of Adam come: Let them strue and dispute with their creator, for that by his eternall providence they were before their generation condemned to everlastinge miserie. What shall they bee able once to mutter against this defence, when God on the other side shall call them to reknowledging of themselves? If they be all taken out of a corrupt maffe, it is no martiele if they be subject to damnation. Let them not therefore accuse God of vniustice, if by his eternall judgement they be appointed to death, to which they themselves doe feele whether they will or no, that they are willingly led of their owne nature. Whereby appeareth how wrongfull is the desire of their murmuring, because they do of set purpose hide the cause of damnation which they are compelled to acknowledge in themselves, y hide the laying of the blame vpon God may acquire the. But though I do a hundred times confesse, as it is most true y God is the author of it, yet they do not by and by wipe away y guiltines which being engraven in their consciences from time with oft recours presereth itselfe to their eyes.

4. Againe they except & say: were they not before predestinate by the ordinance of God to the same corruption which is nowe alleaged for the cause of damnation? When therefore they perish in their corruption, they do nothing but suffer the punishment of that miserie into which by his predestination Adam fell and drewe his posterity headlong with him. Is not he therefore vniust, which doth so cruellie mocke his creatures? I grant in deed that all the children of Adam fell by the will of God into that miserie of state wherein they be nowe bound: and this is it that I saide at the beginning, that at length we must alway returne to the determination of the will of God, the cause whereof is hidden in himselfe. But it followeth not by and by that God is subject to this flander. For we will with Paul answere them in this manner, O man, what art thou that eordest with God? doest the thing formed say to him that formed it? Why hast thou formed me so? Hath not the potter power to make of the same lump one vessel to honor, and another to dishonor? They will say that the righteousness of God is so not truly defended, but that wee seeke a shifting such as they are w漾 to have that want a suit excuse. For what else seemeth here to be said, than y God hath a power which cannot be hindered from doing any thing whatsoever it be as he will himselfe? But it is farre otherwise. For, what stronger reason can be brought than when wee are commannded to thinke what a one God is? For howe should he commit any vniustice, which is judge of the world? If it properly pertaine to the nature of God to doe judgement, than hee naturally loueth righteousness, and abhorreth vniustice. Wherefore the Apostle did not, as though he were ouertaken, looke about for holes to hide him: but shewed that the reason of the righteousness of God is hier than than that it either is to be measured by the measure of man, or may be comprehended by the slender capacitie of the wit of man. The Apostle in deed confeffeth that there is such depth in the judgements of God, wherewith ye minde of men should be swalowed, if they endeavoured to perce it into it. But he teacheth also how hainous wrong it is, to binde the workes of God to such a law, that so onely we understand not the reason of them, wee may be bolde to disfallow it. It is a knowne faying of Salomon (which yet fewe do rightly understand) The great creator of all rendreth rewards to thy foole, and rewardeth transcressors. For he cryeth out concerning the greatnes of God, and he will it to punishe fooles and transcressors, although hee doth not vouchsafe to let them have his Spirit. And monstrous is the madnesse of men, when they so coute to make that which is vnmeasurable, subiect to thy small measure of their reason. The Angels which stood still in their vprightnesse, Paul calleth clect. If their steadfastnes was grounded vpon the good pleasure of God, the falling away of the other proueth that they were forsaken; Of which thing there can no other cauе be alleges than reprobabon, which is hidden in the secret counsell of God.

Go to: let there now be present some Manichee, or Celestine, a flanderer of the prouidence of God: I say with Paul that there ought no reason to be renderd thereof: because with the greatnesse of it, it farre surmounteth our understanding: What marueile? or what abfurditie is it? Would he haue the power of God so limited, that it may be able to worke no more, than his minde is able to conceive? I say with Augustine, that they are created of the Lord, whom he without doubting foreknewe that they should go into destruction: and that it was so done because he so willed: but why he willed, it is not our part to ask a reason of it, who cannot comprehend it: neither is it meete that the will of God should come downe into controversie among vs, of which so oft as mention is made, under the name of it is named the highest rule of rightoufnesse. Why therefore is any question mowed of vrightoufnesse, where rightoufnesse clearly appeareth? Neither let vs be ashamed, after the example of Paul, so to stoppe the mouthes of the wicked, and from time to time so oft as they shalbe bolde to bark against it, to repeate this, Who be ye miserable men, that lay an accusation to Gods charge, and doe therefore lay it to his charge, because he doth not temper the greatnesse of his workes to your dulleffe? As though they were therefore wrongfull, because they are hidden from flesh. The vnmeasurablenesse of the judgements of God is by cleare experiences knoven vnto you. Ye knowe that they are called the deepe bottomlesse depth. Nowe aske of the narrower capacities of your wit, whether they comprehende that which God hath decreed with himselfe. What good doth it you therefoare with mad searching to plunge your fleshes into the bottomlesse depth, which reason it selue teacheth you that it shalbe to your destruction? Why are ye not at the least restrained in some feare of that which both the historic of Ab and the books of the prophets do report of the incomprehensible wisdome, and terrible power of God. If thy minde be vnquicted, let it not griewe thee to embrace the counsell of Augustine. Though a man looketh for an answere at my hande: and I also am a man. Therefore let vs both heare him that sayeth: O man, man, what art thou? But as a faithful ignorance, that as knowledge.

otherwise not much practised in holy writings, sawe both more deeply and more wifely, which shewed that this conten tion is superfluous; because both life and death are rather the doings of Gods will than of his foreknowledge.
If God did but foresee the successes of men, and did not also dispose and order them by his will, then this question should not without cause be moued, whether his foreseeing any thing availled to the necessitie of them. But sith he doth none otherwise foresee the things that shall come to passe, than because he hath decreed that they should come to passe: it is vaine to moue controverfie about foreknowledge, where it is certaine that all things doe happen rather by ordinance and commandement.

7 They say that this is not written in expreflie words, that it was decreed of God, that Adam should perish by his falling away. As though the same God, whom the Scripture reporteth to do whatsoever he will, created the noblefte of all his creatures to an ucertaine end. They say he had freewill, y he might shape to himselfe his own fortune; and that God decreed nothing, but to handle him according to his deffering. If so cold a deuife be receu-ed, where shalbe that almightinesse of God, whereby he governeth all things according to his secret counfelf, which hangeth vpon none other thing than it felfe? But predeftinacion, whether they will or no, sheweth him felfe in Adams posteritie. For it came not to passe naturally, that all men should lose faluation by the fault of one parent. What hindereth them to confelfe of one man, that which againft their willes they confefle of al mankind? For why should they lose their labour with dallying shifts? The Scripture crieth out that all men were in the person of one man made bondo to eternall death. Sith this cannot be imputed to nature, it is plaine that it proceeded from the wonderfull counfelf of God. But it is too much absurditie that these good Patrones of the righteousness of GOD doe fo stumble at a strawe, and leape over great beames. Againe I aske: how came it to passe, y the fall of Adam did wrap vp in eternall death so many nations with their children being infants without remedie, but because it fo pleased God? Here their tongues which are otherwise so prattling, must of necessitie be dumme.
It is a terrible decree, I grant: yet no man shalbe able to denie, but y God foreknewe what end man should haue, ere he created him, and therefore foreknewe it because he had so ordered by his decree. If any man here injury against the foreknowledge of God, he rashly & vndiscreetly stumbleth.
For, what matter is there, I befeech you, why the heavenly judge should be accused for that he was not ignorant of that which was to come? Therefore if there be any either luft or colourable complaint, it toucheth predefituation. Neither ought it to seeme an absurditie which I say, that God foresawe not only the fall of the first man, and in him the ruine of his posterritie, but also disposed it after his owne will. For as it belongeth to his wife-dome, to foreknow all things that shalbe: so it belongeth to his power, to rule and gourne all things with his hande. And this question Augustine verie well discoufeth, as he doth other, saying: Wee most holily confefle that which we most rightly beleue, that the God and Lorde of all things, which created all things very good, & foreknewe that euil things shoulde spring out of good, and knewe, that it more pertained to his almighty good.
goodness even of evil things do well, than not to suffer them to be evil; that he so ordered the life of Angels and men, that in it he might first shew what free will could doe, and then what the benefit of his grace and judgement of justice could do.

8. Here they runne to the distinction of will and permission, by which they will have it granted that the wicked do perish, God onely permitting but not willing it. But why should we say that he permitted it, but because he so willeth? Howbeit it is not likely that man by himselfe, by the only permission of God, without any his ordinance, brought destruction to himselfe: as though God appointed not, of what condition he would have the chief of his creatures to be. I therefore will not doubt to confesse simply with Augustine, that the will of God is a necessitie of things, and that what he willeth, it must of necessitie come to passe: as those things shall truly come to passe which he hath foreseen. Now both for excuse of themselves and of the vngodly, either the Pelagians, or Manichees, or Anabaptistes, or Epicurians (for with these foregoing we have to do in this question) shall object against vs necessitie wherewith they be bound by the predestination of God; they bring nothing fit to the purpose. For if predestination be nothing else but a dispensation of righteousness of GOD, which is hidden in decree, but yet without fault: For as much as it is certaine that they were not unworthy to be predestinate to that estate, it is also as certaine that the destruction is most righteous which they enter into by predestination. Moreover their destruction so hangeth upon the predestination of God, that both cause and matter thereof is found in themselves. For the first man fell, because the Lord so judged it to be expedient: why he so judged, is unknowen to vs: yet it is certaine that he so judged for no other reason but because he fawe that thereby the glory of his name should be worthily set forth. When thou hearest mention of the glory of God, there think of his righteousness: For it must be righteous that destroyth praise. Man therefore falleth, the providence of God so ordaining it: but he falleth by his owne fault. The Lord had a little before pronounced, that all the things which he had made were very good. Whence therefore commeth that peruersitie to man, to fall away from his God? Least it should be thought to be of creation, the Lord with his commendation allowed that which came from himselfe. Therefore by his owne wilhelss he corrupted the nature which he had received pure of the Lord, and by his fall he drewe his whole posteritie with him into destruction. Wherefore let vs rather behold an evident cause of damnation in the corrupted nature of mankind, which is nearer to vs, than search for a hidden and utterly incomprehensible cause thereof in the predestination of GOD. Neither let it grieve vs so farre to submit our wit to vnmeasurable wisdom of God, that it may yeelde in many secretes of his. For of those things which it is neither granted nor lawful to knowe, the ignorance is well learned: the courting of knowledge, is a kinde of madness.

9. Some man perhaps will say, that I have not yet brought enough to subdue that wicked excuse: but I verily confesse that it can never be brought to passe, but that vngodliness will alway grudge and murmur against it. yet I thinke that I have spoken so much as might suffice to take away not only all reason but also all colour of gainsaying. The reprobate would bee thought excusable in sinning, because they cannot escape the necessitie of sinning: specially fith such necessitie is cast upon them by the ordinance of God. But we deny that they are thereby well excused, because the ordinance of God, by which they complain that they are destinate to destruction, hath his righteousness, unknownen in deed to vs, but yet most certaine. Whereupon we conclude, that they beare no euid which is not laide upon them by the most righteous judgement of God. Then, we teach that they do outwarrantly, which to secke the beginning of their damnation, doe bend their eyes to the secret closets to the counsel of God, and winke at the corruptiôn of nature, from whence their damnation springeth. And this withstandeth that they cannot impute it to God, for that hee winneseth of his owne creation. For although man is creat by the eternall providence of god to that calamity, whereunto he is subject: yet the matter thereof he tooke of himselfe, not of God: forasmuch as he is by no other means so loft, but be cause he went out of kinde from the pure creation of God into a corrupt & vnpure perverse kindes.

10 Now the aduersaries of Gods predestination doe slander it also with a third absurditie. For when we impute it to nothing else but to the choice of the will of God, that they are made free from the universall destruction, whô he maketh heires of his kingdom, thereby they gather that there is within him accepting of persons, which the Scripture every where denieth: and therefore, that either the Scripture disagreeth with it selfe, or that in the election of God there is respect of deservings. First, the Scripture in another sense denieth, that God is an acceptor of persons, than as they judge it. For by the name of Person, it signifieth not a man, but those things which being seen with eyes in man are wont to procure either favour, grace, and dignitie, or hatred, contempt, and shame: as, riches, wealth, power, nobilitie, office, countrey, excellencie of beautie, and such other: on the other side, povertie, neede, baseness, vilenesse, contempt, and such other. So Peter & Paul do teach that the Lord is not an acceptor of persons, because he puteth not difference between the few and the Grecian, to refuse the one and embrace the other for only respect of nation. So James vseth the same words when he mindedeth to affirme, that God in his judgement nothing regardeth riches. But Paul in another place speaketh thus of God, that in judging he hath no consideration of freedom or bondage. Wherefore there shalbe no contrarietie if we shall say that God according to the will of his good pleasure without any deservings chooseth to his sonses whom he will, rescinding and refusing other. But the matter may thus be opened, that men may bee more fully satisfied. They ask how it commeth to passe, y of two between whom no deservings puttheth any difference, God in his electing passeth other the one and taketh the other. I on the other side doe ask them, whether they thinke that in him that is taken there is any thing that may make the minde of God to encline towards him. If they confess (as they needs must) that there is nothing, it shal followe that God looketh not upon man, but from his owne goodness fetcheth a cause why to doe good to him.

Whereas therefore God chooseth one man, refusing another, this cometh not of respect of man, but of his mercy alone, which ought to have liberty to shew forth and utter it selfe where and when it please him. For we have in another place also shewed, there were not from the beginning many called noble, or wife, or honorable, that God might humble the pride of flesh: so farre is it of, that his favour was bound to persons.

11 Wherefore many do falsely and wickedly accuse God of partial vnrighteousnesse, for that he doth not in his predestination keepe one selfe course toward all men. If (say they) he finde all gilty, let him equally punish all: if he finde them ungilty, let him withhold the rigor of his judgement from all. But so they deal with him, as if either mercy were forbidden him, or when he would have mercy he be compelled altogether to giue over his judgement. What is it that they require: if all be gilty, that all may together suffer all one paine. We graunt the gultines to be common, but we say the mercy of God helpeth some. Let it help all, say they. But wee aunswere, that it is rightfull that he should also in punishing shew himselfe a rightfull judge. When they suffer this: what do they else but either go about to spoyle God of his power to haue mercy, or at least to graunt it him upon this condition, that hee utterly giue over his judgement. Wherefore these sayings of Augustine do very well agree together. Sith in the first man the whole maffe of manknde fell into condemnation, these vessells that are made of it to honour, are not the vessells of their owne righteousness, but of the mercy of GOD: and whereas other are made to dishonour, the same is not to be imputed to vnrighteousnesse but to judgement, &c. That to those whom he rejecteth, God rendereth due paine: to those whom he calles, he giueth vndefeated grace: that they are delivered from all accusation,after the maner of a creditor, in whose power it is, to forgive to the one, & aske of the other. Therefore the Lorde also may giue grace to whomse he will, because he is mercifull, and giue it not to all, because he is a just judge. He may by giuing to some that which they do not desere, shew his free grace: & by not giuing to all, declare what all desere. For whereas Paul writeth that God enclosed al vnunder, that he might haue mercy vpon all, it is therewithall to be added that he is detter to no man: because no man first gaueth to him, that he may require like of him.

12 This also they often say, to overthrow predestination, that while it standeth, all carefulnesse and endeavour of well doing falleth away. For who (say they) shal heare that either life or death it certeiningly appointed for him by the eternall decree of God, but that it will by and by come into his minde that it maketh no matter how he behaue himselfe, if the predestination of GOD can by his worke bee nothing hindered or furtherrer? So shall all men disdaine to throw forth themselves, and after a desperate manner runne headlong whither their lust shall carry them. And verily they saye not altogether falsely, for there be many sinners, which with filthy blasphemies delifie the doctrine of predestination, and by this pretence also do mocke our all admonishmentes and rebuking sayings, God knoweth what he hath once determined to doe with vs: if hee haue decreed our salvation, he will bring vs to it at the time appointed: if he haue predestinate our death, we should.

trauaile in vaine to the contrary. But the Scripture, when it teacheth with how much greater reverence and religiounsette we ought to think of so great a mysterie, doth both instruct the godly to farte other sente, and well confute thele mens outrage. For it doth not speake of predestinacion to this ende, that we should be encouraged to boldence, and with vnlawfull rashnesse attempt to search the vnaughten secretes of God: but rather that being humbled & abased we should learn to tremble at his judgemen, and reuerently to looke vp to his mercy. To this marke the faithfull will euell themselfes. As for that filthy groining of swine, it is well confuted of Paul. They say that they go carefullie forward in vices: because if they be of the number of the elect, their vices shall nothing hinder them, but that they shall at length be brought to life. But Paul tell eth that we be to this ende, that we should leade a holy and faultlesse life. If the marke that electio is directe vnto be holines of life, it ought more to awake and stirre vs vp carefullie to practisethat holiness, than to serue for a cloking of slouthfulness. For how greatly do these things differ the one from the other? to ceafe for wel doing, because election is sufficient to saluation: and that the appointed ende of election is that we should apply ourselves to the enuie of good deinges. Away therefore with such sacrileges which doe wrongfullie miscusre the whole order of election. Where they stretch their blasphemies further, when they say that he which is reprobat of God, shall looie his laboure if he go about to make himselfe allowable to him with innocencie and honesty of life: therein they are taken with a most shamelesse lye. For, whence could such eneavour come but of election? For whosoeuer be of the number of the reprobate, as they are vessels made to dishonour, so they cease not with continual wicked doinges to provoke the wrath of God against themselfes, and by evident tokens to confirme the judgement of God which is already pronounced upon them: so far be they from struing with him in vaine.

1st. But other do malicissly and shamefullie slander this doctrine, as though it did ouerthrowe all exhortations to godly living. For which matter in old time Augustine was burdened with a great malice. Which hee wiped away with his booke of corretion and grace written to Valentine, the reading whereof will appease all godly and trauestable men: yet shall I touch a few things, which (as I trufl) shall satisfie them that be honest and not contenious. We haue already scene howe open and loude a preacher of the free election Paul was: was he therefore cold in admonishing and exhorting? Lette these good zealous men compare their earneftnesse with his, and it shalbe founde in them ife in comparision of his incredible heate. And truely this principle taketh away all doubtes, that we are not called to vncleneffe, but that every man should possesse his vessel in honor, &c. Again, that we are the handie worke of God created to good worke, which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. Summarily, they that are euenc but meanly exercisde in Paul, shal without lenger declaracion easely perceiue how falsely he maketh these things to agree, which they faine to disagree. Christ commandeth men beleue in him: Yet is his definition sentence neither false nor contrary to this commandement, where he sayth: No man can come to me, but he to whom it is given of my father. Let preaching therefore haue his course, which may bring men to faith, and with continual profiting holde them fast in perfeuerance. Neither yet let the knowledge of predestination be hindered, y they which obey may not be proude as of their owne, but may glorie in the Lord. Christ not for nothing: Who hath cares of hearing, let him heare. Therefore when we exhorte and preache, they that haue cares doe willingly obey: but who so lacke cares, in them is fulfilled that which is written, That hearing they heare not. But why (faith Augustine) shoulde some haue, and other some not haue? Who hath knowe the minde of the Lord? Must that therefore be denied which is open, because that cannot be comprehended which is hidden: These sayings I haue faithfully reported out of Augustine: but because paradigme his words shal haue more authoritie than mine, goe to, let vs bring forth the verie worde that are read in himselfe. If when this is heard, many are turned into dulleffe and sluggisheffe, and being inclined from labour to lust doe go after their desires: ought that therefore to be accounted false which is spoken of y foreknowledge of God? If God haue foreknown y they shalbe good,shal they not be good, in howe great euilnesse fouer they nowe fure? and if hee haue foreknown that they will be euill, shal they not be euill in howe great goodness fouver they be now seen? shal therefore those things which are truly spokè of the foreknowledge of God, be for such caufes either to be denied or to be left vnspoken off? namely then when if they be not spoken of, men goe into errors? The rule (faith he) to keep truth vnspoken of, is one thing, & the necessitie to speake trueth is an other. As for the caufes of leauing trueth vnspoken, it were long to search them out all: of which yet this is one, that they be not made worse which understande it not, while we mean to make them more learned that vnderstande it, who when we speake any such thing are indeepe not made more learned, nor yet are made worse. But whè a true thing is in such case, that when we speake it, he is made worse that cannot conceiue it: and when we speake it not, he is made worse that can conceiue it: what thinke we nowe to be done? is not the trueth rather to be spoken, that hee may conceiue it, that can conceiue it: than to keep it vnspoken, that not onely neither of them may conceiue it, but also hee y more understande may be the worse? whereas if he did heare and conceiue it, by him also many shoulde learne. And we will not say that which, as the scripture wittneffeth, we lawfully might haue spoken. For we feare for our leaft, when we speake, he be offended that can not conceiue it: but we feare not least while we hold our peace, he y can conceiue trueth be deceived with falsehoode. Which sentence he at the last shortly knitting vp, more plainly also confirmeth. Wherefore if the Apostles, and they which followed them, the doctors of the Church did both, namely both godly preache of the eternall election of God, and holde the faithfull in awe under the discipline of godly life: why do these our adversaries being confuted with invincible violence of trueth, thinke that they say well in saying that which is spoken of predestinatio is not to be preached to y people although it be true. Yea it must in any wise be preached, y he which hath cares to heare may heare. But who hath cares if hee hath not receiued them from him that promiseth that hee will giue them? Truely let him that receiuieth not, refuse it: so that yet hee he which receiveth it, do take and drinke, do drinke and liue. For as godlines is to be preached, that God may be rightly worshippes: fo is also predestination, that he which hath cares to heare of the grace of God, may glory in god and not in himselfe.

14. And yet that holy man, as he had a singular desire to edifie, so tempereth the manner of teaching the truth, that offence be wisely avoided so far as it lawfully may be. For he sheweth that those things which are truly said, may also be conveniently said. If any man do thus preach to the people. If ye believe not, the cause is for that ye are already predestinate of God to destruction; such a man doeth not only cherish slothfulness, but also maintaine wickednes. If any man also stretch his saying to y time to com, and say that they which heare shal not beleeue, because they are reproued: this shalbe rather a cursing then a teaching. Such therefore Augustine not unworthily biddeth to depart from the Church, as foolish teachers, and un-lucky and ill prophesying Prophets. In an other place he truely affirmeth that it is to be holden that a man then profeth with rebuking, when he hath mercy and helpeth which maketh to profite whom he will, even without rebuking. But why some thus and some otherwise? God forbid that, ye we shoulde say that the power of judging belongeth rather to the clay than to the potter. Againe afterwarde. When men by rebuking either come or returne into the way of righteousness, who worketh saluation in their hearts, but hee, which when any whosoever he be planteth and watereth, giueth the increase, whom when he wil saue, no free will of man ressisteth? It is therefore not to be doubted that the wils of men cannot ressist will of God (which both in heaven and earth hath done whatsoever he would, and which hath also done those things that are to come) but that he may doe what he will, forasmuch as euon of the verie wils of men hee doeth what he will. Againe, when he will leade men to him, doeth he binde them with corporall bonds? Hee inwardly worketh, inwardly holdeth hearts, inwardly moueth hearts, and draweth them with their wils which hee himselfe hath made in them, But, that which hee by and by addeth ought in no wise to bee omitted: that because wee knowe not who belongeth or not belongeth to the number of the predestinate, we ought so to be affectioned that wee would all men to be faued. So shall it come to passe, that whom soever we find, we shall travell to make him partaker of peace. But our peace shall rest upon the children of peace. Therefore for our part, we must applie holsome and sharpe rebuking to al men like a medecine, that they perish not, nor destroy other, but it shalbe the worke of God to make it profitable to them whom he hath for-known and predestinate.

The xxiiij. Chapter.
That election is established by the calling of God; but that the reprobate doe bring upon themselves the self destruction whereunto they are appointed.

By T, that the matter may more plainly appeare, we must intreat both of the calling of the elect, and of the blinding and hardening of the wicked. Of the first of these I have alreadie spoken somewhat, when I confuted their errour, which thinks that the generallnesse of the promises extended egalegal to all mankind. But this election which otherwise God hath hidden with himself; he doth not without choice at length disclose by his calling, which a man may therefore call the testifying of it. For, whom he hath foreknown, them he hath also foreappointed to be Fashioned like the image of his son: whom he hath foreappointed, them he hath also called: whom he hath called, these he hath also justified, that in time to come he may glorify them. When the Lord hath by electing already adopted his into number of his children; yet we see howe they enter not into possession of so great a benefit, but when they be called: on the other side, how being called they doe now enjoy a certaine communicating of his election. For which reason Paul calleth the spirit which they receive, both the Spirit of adoption, and the seale, and earnest of the inheritance to come: namely because it doth with the testimonie thereof stabilifie and seale to their heartes the assurednes of the adoption to come. For though the preaching of the Gospel spring out of the fountain of election: yet because it is also common to all reprobate, therefore it could not by it selfe be a sure proofe thereof. But God effectually teacheth his elect, that he may bring them to faith: as we haue before alledge out of the wordes of Christ, Who so is of God, he and none other feareth the Father. Again, I haue shewed thy name to the men whom thou hast given me: Whereas he faith in another place, no man can come to me, vnlesse my Father drawe him. Which place Augustine wisely wyteth, whole wordes are these. If (as Truth faith) every one that hath learned, commeth: Christ, cont. who soever commeth not, certainly neither hath he learned. It doth not therefore followe that he which can come, also commeth; vnlesse he haue both willed and done it. But every one that hath learned of the Father, not onely can come, but also commeth, when nowe there is present both y profile of comming, and the affection of willing, and the effect of doing. Also in an other place more plainly. What is this else, Euerie one that hath heard of the father, and hath learned, commeth to me, but there is none that heareth and learneth of the father and commeth not to me? For if every one which hath heard of the father and learned, commeth: truely every one that commeth not, hath not heard of the father, nor learned: for if he had heard and learned, he would come. This schoole is farre from the senses of the flesh, in which schoole the father is heard and teacheth, that men may come to the sonne. And a little after. This grace which is secretely giuen to the heartes of men, is receiued of no hard hart: for it is therefore giuen, that the hardness of the heart may first bee taken away. When therefore the father is heard within, he taketh away the stonic heart, and giueth a fleshly heart. For so he maketh the children of promise and vessels of mercy, which he hath prepared to glory. Why therefore doth he not teach all, that they may come to Christ, but because all whome he teacheath, by merrice he teacheath, whom he doth not teach, by judgement he doth not teach: because he hath merrice upon whom he will, and hardeneth whom he will. Therefore God assigneth them for children to himselfe, and appointeth himselfe father to them, whom he hath chosen. Nowe by calling he bringeth them into the household, and uniteth himselfe to them, that they may bee one together. But, when Calling is joyned to election, in that manner the Scripture sufficiently signifieth that in it nothing is to be required but \textit{mer-} \textit{cie of God}. For if we aske, whome he calleth and for what reason: \textit{hee aun-} swereth, whome he had elected. But when we come once to election, there the only mercie of God appeareth on every side. And hence that saying of Paul truely hath place, \textit{It is not of him that willleth, nor of him that runneth,} but of God that hath mercie. \textit{Neither yet that same so as they commonly} take it, which part it betweene the grace of God, & the willing and running of man. For they expounde it, that the desire and indeuour of man haue in deede no force of themselues, vnlesse they be prospered by the grace of god: but when they are holpen by his blessing, then they affirm that they haue also their partes in obeyning saluation. Whose expounde I had rather conclude with Augustines words than mine owne: \textit{If the Apostle meant nothing} else but that it is not of him onely that willleth or runneth, vnlesse the Lorde be there present mercifull: wee may contrariwise turne it against them and say that it is not of onely mercie, vnlesse there be present willing & running.
But if this be openly wicked, let vs not doubt that the Apostle giueth all to the mercie of the Lorde, & leaueth nothing to our willes or endeavours.
To this effect speake keth that holy man, And I se not a strawe by that nice fret-tele, that they say that Paul woulde not haue so faide vnlesse there had ben some indeuour and some will in vs. For he did not consider what was in man: but when he sawe that some did assigne part of saluation to the endeauour of men, he simplicely condemned their error in the first part of the sentence, and in the second he chalenged the whole sum of saluation of the mercie of God. And what other thing doe the Prophets trauel about but continually to preach the free calling of God?

2 Moreover the very nature alfo & dispensation of calling doth clearly shewe it, which consisteth not in the onely preaching of the worde, but also in the inlightening of the Spirite. To whom God offereth his word, is shewed vs in the Prophete: I am founde of them that fought me not: I haue openly appeared to them that did not aske for me. To a people which hath not called uppon my name I haue faide, Loe I am present. And leaft the Iewes shoulde thinke that this kindnesse belonged onely to the Gentiles, he doeth alfo put them in remembrance from whence hee rooke their Father Abraham, when hee vouchsaued to joyn him to himselfe, namely from merce idolatrie, in which he was drowned with all his. When hee first shineth with the light of his worde to men not deferring it, he therein sheweth an example plaine enough of his free goodnesse. Here therefore the un-measurable goodnesse of God sheweth forth it self, but not vnto saluation to all: becaus for the reprobate there abideth a more gretious judgment, for that they refuse the testimonie of the will of God, And God also, to set forth his glorie, withdraweth from them the effectuall force of his spir-ite. Therefore this inwarde calling is a pledge of saluation, which cannot deceiue vs. For which purpose maketh that saying of John, Thereby we knowe that we are his children, by the spirite which hee hath giuen vs. And leaft he shoulde glorie, that it did at the least answere to him when hee called and of his owne will offered himselfe, hee affirmeth that it hath no cares to heare, no eyes to see, but which hee hath made: and that hee maeke keth keth them, not according to every mans thankfulness, but according to his owne election. Of which thing you have a notable example in Luke, where both Jews and Gentiles in common together heard the preaching of Paul and Barnabas. Whereas they were at that time al taught with one selfe same word, it is sayde that they beleued which were ordained to everlasting life. With what face may we deny that the calling is free, in which euen to the very last part election reigneth alone?

3 But here wee must beware of two erors: because many make man a worker together with God, that he by his consent may make the election to be of force: so by their opinion, the will of man is aboue the counsell of God. As though the Scripture did teach, that it is only given vs that we may beleue, and not rather faith it selfe. Other some, although they do not so weaken the grace of the holy Ghost yet being led by I wot not what reason, hang election upon faith as though it were doubtfull, yea and vneffectuall vntill it be confirmed by faith. It is in deed certaine y it is confirmed, as toward vs: and we have already shewed y the secret counsell of God beginneth to shine out, which was before hidden: so that by this word you understand nothing else, than that it is approvd which was vnknown, & is as it were sealed with a seale. But it is falsely sayd, that election is then and not till then effectual, when we haue embraced y Gospell, and y therof it taketh lively strenght. We must in deed from thence fetch the certainie of it: Because if wee attempt to reache vnto the eternal ordinance of God, that deepe bottomless depth will swallowe vs vp. But when God hath opened it vnto vs, wee must clime vp hier, leaff the effect should drowne the cause. For what greater absurdity or shamefull vniustice is there, than that when the Scripture teacheth that wee are enlightened as God hath chosen vs, our eyes shoulde be so daseled with this light, that they shoulde refuse to looke vpon election? Yet in the meane time I deny not, that to the ende we may be certaine of our salvation, we must beginne at the word, and that our assiance ought therewith to be comtented, that we may call vpon God by the name of Father. For some quite contrary to right order, y they may be certified of the counsell of God (which is neere vnto vs, in our mouth and in our heart) do couet to file aboue the cloudes. Therefore that rashinesse is to be restrained with fabrieties of faith, that it may suffice vs that God in his outward worde is a witnesse of his hidden grace: to that the conduite pipe out of which there oweth water largely for vs to drinke, doe not hinder but that the springhead may haue his due honour.

4 Therefore as they do wrongfull, which hang the strenght of election vpon the faith of the gospell, by which faith we seele that election pertaineth to vs: so we shall kepe the best order, if in seeking y certainty of our election, we sticke fast in these latter signes, which are sure witnesings of it. Satan doth with no tentation either more greedyously, or more dangerously astonish the faithfull, than when disquieting them with doubt of their election, hee doth also move them with a persurtt: desire to seek it out of the way. I call it seeking out of the waye, when a wretched man enterpriseth to brake into the hidden secrets of the wisdome of God, and to peare even to the hyst: eternity to understand what is determined of himselfe at the judgement seat.
feare of God. For then he throweth himselfe headlong to be swallowed vp into the depth of the vnameasurable devouing pit: then he wrapeth himself with innumerable snares and such as hee can not winde out of: then hee overwhelmeth himselfe with the bottomlesse depth of blinde darkeness. For so is it rightfull that the foolifhnesse of the witte of man be punished with so horrible raine, when he attempteth of his owne force to rise vp to the height of the wisdom of God. And so much more deadly is this tentation, as there is none to which we are commonly all more bent. For there is most rarely any man to be founde, whose mind is not sometime stricken with this thought. Whence haft thou salvation, but of the election of GOD? And of Election what revelation haft thou? which thought, if it haue once taken place in any man, either perpetually vexeth the miserable man with terrible tormentts, or utterly difmayeth him. Truely I would haue no surer argument than this experience to prooue, howe wrongfully such men imagine of predestination. For the minde can be infected with no errour more pestilential then that which plucketh downe and thrusteth the confidence from her peace and quietnesse towards God. Therefore if we feare shipwreke, wee must diligently beware of this rocke, which is neuer stricken vpon without destruction. And though the disputing of predestination be esteemed like a dangerous sea, yet in passing through it there is founde a safe and quiet yea and pleasant sayling, vnlesse a man doe willfully couet to be in daunger. For as they doe drowne themselves in the deadly bottomlesse depth, which to bee certified of their election doe enquire of the secret Counsell of God without his worde: so they which doe rightly and orderly search it in such foyr as it is contained in the worde, receive thereof a singular fruit of comforte. Let this therefore be our way to search it, that wee beginne at the calling of God, and ende in the same. Howbeit this withflageth not, but that the faithfull may thinke that the benefits which they daily receive at the hand of GOD, doe diisende from that secrete adoption: as they say in Elyasz, Thou hast done maruelous, thy thoughts are old, true, and faithfull: forasmuch as by that adoption as by a token the Lords will is to confirme so much as is lawfull to be known of his counsell. But leaft any man should thinke this a weake testimonion, let vs consider howe much both clearennesse and certainty it bringeth vs. Of which thing Bernarde speakeh silly. For after that he had spoken of the reprobate, he sayeth: The purpose of God standeth, the sentence of peace standeth vpon the that feare him, both covering their euils, and rewarding their good things: so as to them after a maruelous manner not onely good things, but alsoe euil doe worke together vnto good. Who shall accuse the elect of God? It sufficeth me to all righteousesse, to haue him alone mercifull, to whom alone I haue finned. Alif he hath decreed not to impute to me, is so as if it never had bin. And a little after: O place of true rest, and to that vnworthily I may giue the name of a bedchamber, in which GOD is seene not as troubled with wrath, nor as witholden with care; but his will is prooued in him good, and well pleasing, and perfect. This sight doth not make a frayde, but calmeth: doth not stirre vp vnight curiousnesse, but appeaseth it: doth not weary the senses, but quieteth them: Here is quiet truely taken. God being appeased, appeaseth all things; and and to behold him quiet, is to be quiet.

5 First if we seeke a fatherly kindnesse and favorable minde of God, we must turne our eyes to Christ, in whom alone the soule of the father resteth. If we seeke saluation, life, and the immorralitie of the heauenly kingdom, we must the also flee to no other: forasmuch as he alone is both Fountain of life, and author of saluation, and heire of the kingdom of Heauen. Now whereto serueth election, but that being adopted of the heauenly father into the degree of children, we may by his favour obtayne saluation & immorralitie? Howsoever in seeking thou toste it and shake it, yet thou shalt finde ye the vertëmost marke of it extenteth no further. Therefore whom God hath taken to his children, it is not said that he hath chosen them in themselves, but in his Christ: because he could not lose them but in him, nor give them the honour of the inheritance of his kingdom, unlesse they had first bene made partakers of him. If we be chosen in him, we shal not finde in our selves the certaintie of our election: no, nor yet in God the father, if we imagine him naked without the sonne. Christ therefore is the mirror, in whom we both must, and without deceite may behold our election. For sith it is he into whole body the Father hath appointed to grasse all them whom from eternitie he hath willed to bee his, that hee may take for his children so many as hee reknowledgeth among his members: we have a witness plaine and sure enough, that wee are written in the booke of life, if wee communicate with Christ. And that sure communion of himselfe hee gaueth vs, when by the preaching of the Gospell hee testified that hee was given to vs of the father, that hee with all his good things shoulde bee ours. We are said to put on him, and to grow together into him, that we may live: because he liueth. So oft is this doctrine repeated, The Father spared not his onely begotten sonne, that the sonne beleeueth in him, may not perish. But hee that beleeueth in him, is saide to have passed from death into life. In which sense he calles himselfe the breade of life, which whofo eateth, he shal not die for euer. He (I say) hath beene a witness to vs, that they shal be receued of the heauenly father in place of his children, of whom hee hath beene received by faith. If wee couete any more than to bee accompted among the children and heires of God, then we may climbe aboue Christ. If this bee our vertëmost mark: howe much be we mad in seeking without him that which wee haue already obeyned in him, and which may bee found in him alone? Moreouer sith hee is the eternall wisedome, the unchangeable truth, and faste sealed counsell of the father: it is not to be feared leaf that which he declareth to vs in his worde, shoulde vary any thing be it seuer so little from that will of the Father which wee seek: but rather he faithfully opened it vnto vs, such as it was from the beginning, & euer shal be. The practike of this doctrine ought also to bee in vs in prayers. For though the faith of election doth incourage vs to cal vs God; yet when we make our prayers, it were vnorderly done to thrust it into the presence of God, or to concur with this condition. Lord if I bee elected, heare mee: for as hee willeth vs to bee content with his promises, and no where else doe seek, whether he will be intreatable to vs or no. This wisdom shal declare vs if it commaundeth vs to many snarës, if we can skill to apply that to a right vs which hath beene rightly rightly written: but let vs not vndiscreetly draw hither and thither that which ought to have beene restrained.

6 There is also for stablishing of our affiance an other way of election, which we haue saide to bee joyned with our calling. For, whom Christ taketh being inlightened with the knowledge of his name into the bosome of his Church, then he is saide to receiue into the faith and protection. And whom soever he receiued, they are saide to bee committed to him of the father & deliuered to his trust, that they may be kept into eternall life. What meane wee? Christ crieth out with a loude voice, that so many as the Father willeth to bee saued, he hath deliuered them into his protection. Therefore if we lift to knowe whether God hath care of our saftie, let vs seeke whether he hath committed vs to Christ, whom he hath made the onely Saviour of all his. Nowe if we doubt whether we be received of Christ into his Faith and keeping, he preuenteth our doubting, when he voluntarily offereth him selue to be our sheepheard, and pronounceth that wee shall bee in the number of his sheepe if we heare his voyce. Let vs therefore embrace Christ, being liberally set open for vs, and comming to meete vs: hee shall number vs in his flocke, and shall keepe vs inclosed within his folde. But there entretie into vs a carefulnesse of our state to come. For as Paul teacheth that they are called, which were before chosen: so Christ sheweth that many are called, but fewe are chosen. Yea and also Paul himselue in an other place diuorth vs from carefulnesse: Let him that standeth (faith he) looke that he fall not. Againe, Art thou graffed into the people of God? Be not proude, but feare: for God is able to cut thee of againe that he may graffe other. Finally we are sufficiently taught by experience it selfe,that calling and faith are of small value, vnlesse there be adioyned continuance which happeneth not all men. But Christ hath deliuered vs from this care: for verily these promises have respect to the time to come. All that my father giueth me, shal come to me: and him that shal come to me, I will not cast him out of my dore.Againe, this is the will of him that sent me, the Father, that I loose nothing of all things that hee hath giuen mee, but may raise them vp againe in the last day. Againe, My sheepe heare my voice, and they followe me: I knowe them, and I giue them eternall life, and they shall not perish for euer, neither shall any man take them out of my hand. The father which gave them to me, is greater then al: & no man can take the out of y hand of my father.

Nowe when he pronounceth, every tree which my Father hath not planted, shall be plucked vp by the root: he signifieth on the contrarie side, that they can never be plucked from saluation, which haue roote in God. Wherewith agreeth that sayeing of Iohn, If they had beene of vs, they had not at al gone out from vs. Herevpon also commeth that noble glorying of Paul against life and death, present things and things to come: which glorying must needs be grounded vpon the gift of continuance. Neither is it any doubt that he directeth this sayeing to all the faithfull. In another place the same Paul faith. He that hath begunne in you a good worke, shall end it eu'n until the day of Christ. As also Dauid, when his faith fainted, leaned vp on this say: Thou shal not forsake the worke of thy hands. And nowe neyther is this doubtfull, that Christ when he prayeth for all the faithfull, asketh the

the same thing for them which he asketh for Peter, y their faith may never Luke.22.33. faint. Whereby we gather, that they are out of danger of falling away, because the sonne of God, asking itedfaft continuance for their godlineffe, suffered no denial. What would Christ haue vs to learne hereby, but that we should trust that we shall perpetually be safe, because we are once made his? 7 But it daily happeneth, that they which seemed to be Christes, do a-gaine reuolt from him & fall, Yea & in the very same place where he affir-meth that none had perished of them which were giuen him of the Father, yet he excepteth the sonne of perdition. That is true in deed: but this is also as certaine, that such did never cleaue to Christ with y affiance of heart with which I say that the assurednesse of our election is established. They went out from vs (faith Iohn) but they were not of vs. For if they had been of vs, they had stil taried with vs. Neither do I deny that they haue like signes of calling as the elect haue: but I do not graunt that they haue that sure establishment of election which I bid the faithfull to fetch out of the worde of y Gospel. Wherefore let not such examples moue vs but that wee quietly rest upon the promise of the Lord, where he pronounceeth, that al they are giuen to him of the Father, which receive him with true faith, of whom fith he is their keeper & Pastor, none shal perish. Of Iudas wee shall speake hereafter. Paul doth not counsel Christians from assurednes altogether, but from care-leffe and loose assurednesse of the flesh, which draweth with it, pride, pre-sumption, & disdain of other, and quencheth humility & the reuerence of God, and bringeth forgetfulness of grace received. For he speaketh to the Gentiles, whom he teacheth, that they ought not proudly & vngently to reproch thefewe for this, that the fewes being disterited, they were set in their stead. Fears also he requireth not wherewith they should be dismaid & flagger, but which framing vs to the humbler receiuing of the grace of God, should abate nothing of the affiance thereof; as wee haue faide in another place. Befide that, he doth not there speake to every man particularly, but to the fewes themselfes generally. For when the Church was deuided into two parts, & envy bred dissension, Paul putteth the Gentiles in mind y their being supplied into the place of the peculiar & holy people, ought to bee to them a cause of feare & modestie. And among them there were many puffed vp with glorie, whose vaine boasting it was profitable to beat downe. But we haue in another place shewed, that our hope is extended to the time to come euen beyond death, and that nothing is more contrary to the nature of it, than to doubt what shall become of vs.

8 That saying of Christ, of many being called but few chosen, is very ill taken after that maner. There shalbe nothing doutful if we hold fast that which ought to be cleare by the things aboue spoken, that there are two sortes of calling. For there is an vnuerfal calling whereby through the outward preaching of the word, God calleth altogether to him, eu'n them also to whom he setteth it forth vnto the favor of death, & vnto matter of more grievous condemnation. The other is a speciall calling which for the most part he vouchsafteth to giue only to the faithful, when by the inward enlightening of his spirit he maketh y the word preached is setted in their hearts. Yet sometime he maketh them also partakers of it whom he enlighteneth Vv. but but for a time, & afterward by the desiring of their unthankfulnesse forsake them, and striceth them with greater blindness. Now when the Lord saw the Gospel to be published farre and wide, and to be despised of many, but to be had in due price of fewe: he describeth vs God under the person of a king, which preparing a solemn feast sendth his messengers round about to bid a great multitude to be his guests, and yet can get but a fewe, because every one alleageth letters for his excuse, so that at length he is compelled upon their refusal, to call out of the hie ways every one that he meeteth. Hitherto every man seeth that the parable must be vnderstand of the outward calling. He addeth afterward that God doeth like a good maker of a feast, which goeth about the tables, to cheer his guests. If he finde any not clothed with a wedding garment, hee will not suffer him with his vncleanlinesse to dishonor the solemnity of the feast. This parte of the parable, I grant, is to be vnderstande of them which enter into the Church by the profession of faith, but are not clothed with the sanctification of Christ. Such dishonors and as it were botches of his Church, the Lord will not suffer for ever: but, as their filthinesse deserveth he will cast them out. Therefore fewe are chosen out of a great number of them that are called, but yet not with that calling by which wee say that the faithful ought to judge their election. For, that generall calling is also common to the wicked: but this speciall calling bringeth with it the spirit of regeneration, which is the earnest and seal of the inheritance to come, wherewith our hearts are sealed vp against the day of the Lord. In a summe sith hypocrites boast of godliness as well as the true worshippers of God, Christ pronounceth that at length they shall be cast out of the place which they wrongfully possessed: as it is said in the Psalme, Lorde, who shall dwell in thy tabernacle? The innocent in handes, and the man of a pure heart. Again, in another place. This is the generation of them that seek the face of the God of Jacob, &c. And so doth the Spirit exhort the faithful to sufferance, that they take it not grievously that the Israelites be mingled with them in the Church: for at length their visor shall be plucked from them and they shall be cast out without shame.

8 The same reason is of the exception even now alleaged, where Christ faith, yet none perished but the sonne of perdition. It is in deed an unproper speeche, but yet not darke. For he was not accounted among the sleepe of Christ, for that he was one in deed, but because he kept the place of one. And where in another place the Lord affirmeth that he was chosen with the Apostles, that is spoken only in respect of the ministerie. Twelsc (faith he) haue I chosen, and one of them is a Deuil: that is, he had chosen him to the office of an Apostle. But when he speake of choosing to salvation, he denieth him farre away from the number of the chosen, saying: I speake not of all: I knowe whome I haue chosen. If a man do in both places confound the worde of Choosing, he shall miserably entangle himselfe: if hee make difference, nothing is more plaine. Therefore Gregorie teacheth very ill & pestilently when he faith that wee knowe only our calling, but are uncertaine of our election: whereby hee moueth all men to fear and trembling: v sing also this reason, but because wee knowe what we be to day, but what wee sho shall be known not. But in that place he sufficiently declareth, how he stilled at this blocke. For, because he hanged election upon the merits of works, he had matter enough; and more to discourage the mindes of men: but he could not strengthen them, which did not remove them from themselves to the affiance of the goodness of God. Hereof the faithfull have some raft of that which we have determined at the beginning that predetermination if it be rightly thought vp, bringeth not a shaking of faith, but rather the best strengthening of it. And yet I deny not, ye the holy Ghost framed his take to the final measure of our faine. As when he saith, In the secret of my people they shall not be, and in the roule of my servants they shall not be written. As though God did beginne to write in the booke of life, them whom he reckoneth in the number of his: whereas yet we know, euen by the witness of Christ, that the names of the children of God are from the beginning written in the booke of life. But in these words is expressed the casting away of them which seemed the chief among the elect: as it is sayde in the Psalme. Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, and let them not be written with the righteous.

9 But the elect are neither immediatly from the wombe, nor all at one time, by calling gathered together into the flocke of Christ, but as it pleaseth God to distribute his grace to them. But ere they be gathered together to that chiefe sheepheard, they are scattered abroade and stray in the common deserte, and differ nothing from other, sauing that they be defended by the singular mercie of God, from falling into the extreme headlong downesfall of death. Therefore if you looke vpon themselfes, you shall see the offspring of Adam, which fauourth of the common corruption of the whole maffe. That they be not carried into extreme & desperate vngodlines, this commendeth not to passe by any goodnesse naturally planted in them, but because the eye of God watcheth, and his hand is stretched out to their salvation. For they that dreamed that from their very natuirtie there is planted in their heartes I wote not what seed of election, by the vertue whereof they are alwayes inclined to godliness, and to the feare of God, they both are not holpen to prove it by the authoritie of Scripture, and also are confuted by experience it selfe. They do in deed bring forth a fewe examples to prove that the elect euen before their enlightning, were not utterly strangers from religion: that Paul in his being a Pharisee liued vnreprooueable; that Cornelius was by almes and prayers accepted of God: and such other. Of Paul, we graunt to them: of Cornelius, wee say, that they are deceived. For it appeareth that he was then already enlightened and regenerate, so that hee wanted nothing but the eleuer reveiling of the Gospel. But what will they wring out by these fewe examples? that al the elect are alwayes endued with the spirit of godliness? No more than if a man by shewing the virtuounesse of Aristides, Socrates, Zenocrates, Scipio, Curius, Camillus, and others, should thereof gather that all they that are left in blindness of idolatrie, were devious followers of holinesse and beneiftie. Yea and the Scripture in more places than one, openly crieth out against them. For, the state which Paul describeth of the Ephesians before their regeneration, sheweth not one graine of this seede. Ye were (sayth he) dead with defauttes and sinnes; in which which ye walked according to the time of this world, according to the prince of the aire, which nowe worketh in the obstinate children: among whom we all also were sometime conuersante in the lustes of our fleish, doing those things that liked our fleish and minde. And we were by nature the children of wrath, as other also were. Againe, Remember that ye were sometime without hope, and lacked God in the world. Againe, Ye were sometime darknesse: but now ye are light in the Lord: walke as the children of light. But paraduenture they will have these things to be referred to the ignorance of the true God, wherewith they did not that the elect are holden before that they were called. Albeit this were a shamelesse cavilling, sith he therof concluded, that they ought nowe no more either to lie or to steale: yet what will they anwere to other places? as is that place to the Corinthians, where whè he had pronounced that neither whoremongers, nor adulterers, nor lustful men, nor covetous men, nor idolaters, nor theftes, nor liars, nor iniquitie. For what fruit had you of these things, in which ye are nowe worthily ashamed, &c?

11 What maner of seed of election, I pray you, did then budde in them, which being manifoldly defiled in all their life, as it were with desperate wickednes, wallowed in the most abominable and accursed finne of all? If bee would have spoken after their opinion, hee should have shewed howe much they were bond to the bounteoues of God, by which they had beene preferred from sliding into so great filthinesse. So Peter also should have exhorted his to thankfulness for the perpetuall seed of election. But he contrariwise putte them in minde that the time past sufficed to make an ende of the lustes of the Gentiles. What if we come to examples? what budde of righteousness was there in Rahab the harlot, before faith? in Manasse, when Hierusalem was dipped and in a manner drowned in the bloude of the Prophets in the Theeke, which among his last gaspings began to thinke of repentance? Away therefore with these arguements, which silly curious men do rashly deuise to themselues without the Scripture. But let that abide certaine with vs, which the Scripture hath, that all haue strayed like lost sheepe, every one hath swerved into his owne way, that is, perdito. Out of this gulf of perdition, whome the Lord hath determined once to plucke fourth, them he dissereth til his fit time: onely he referreth them, that they fall not vnto vnpardable blaphemy.

12 As the Lord by the effectuallnesse of his calling towards the electe, maketh perfect the saluation, where vnto hee hadde by externall counsell appointed them: so he hath his judgements against the reprobate, whereby he executeth his counsell of them. Whom therefore he hath created vnto the shame of life, and destruction of death, that they should bee instruments of his wrath, and examples of his seueritie: from them, that they may come to their ende, sometime he taketh away the power to hark his words, and and sometime by the preaching of it he more blindeth and amazeth them. Of the first maner, whereas there be innumerable examples, let vs choose one more cleare & notable than all the rest. There passed away about foure thousand yeares afore Christ, in which he hid from all the Gentiles the light of his health bringing doctrine. If any man answere that he therefore made them not to enjoy to great a benefit because he judged them vnworthie, they which come after shall not be pronounced any more worthie. Of which thing, beside the experience, Malachie is a substantiall witness, which reproving infideliie mingled with grosse blasphemies, yet declareth y there that came a redeemer. Why therefore is he rather giuen to these than to those? He shall trouble himselfe in vaine, that shall here search for a cause hier than the secret and vnsearchable counsell of God. Neither is it to bee feared least any scholer of Porphyrie, should freely gnawe at the righteousselle of God while wee ashamede nothing in defence of it. For when wee say that none perish vndeferting, & that it is of the free bountifullnesse of God that some be delivered, there is largely enough saide for the setting forth of his glorie,so that it needeth not our shifting. The foueraigne judge therefore maketh away for his predestination, when whome he hath once receive, them being depriued of the communicating of his light he leaueth in blindness. Of the other maner there are both daily examples, and also many contained in the Scripture. One selfsame preaching is commonly made to a hundred, twentie receive it with readie obedience of faith: the rest doe either jet taught by it, or scorn it, or hife it out, or abhorre it. If any man answere that this diuerstitie proceedeth of their malice and peruersitie, hee shall not yet fauor it: because the others with also should bee possesed wth the same malic, yelesse God did amende it with his goodnesse. Therefore we shall still be encombrd, yelesse wee call to minde that which Paul saith, Who maketh thee to differ? Whereby he signifieth that some excell other some, not by their owne vertue, but by the only grace of God.

13 Why therefore doth he in granting grace to those passe over these? Of those Luke fheweth a cause, Because they are ordained to life. Of these, what shal we thinke, but because they are the vessels of wrath vnto dishonour? Wherefore let it not grieue vs to say with Augustine. God (sayeth hee) might turne the will of the eui into good, because he is almightie. He might in deed. Why therefore doeth he it not, because he would not. Why hee would not, is in himself. For we ought to be no more wise than we ought to be. And that is much better, than to shift with Chrystoforme, and say that he draweth him that is willing and reacheth his hand, that the difference may not seem to stand in the judgement of God, but in the onely will of men. Truely it so standeth not in the proper motion of man, that evene the godly and they that feare God have neede of a singular instruction of the Spirite. Lidia the purpleseller feared God, & yet it behoved that her heart shoule be opend, that shee might harken to the doctrine of Paul, and profit in it. This is not spoken of one woman alone, but that wee should knowe that the profiting of euery man in godlinesse is the secrete worke of the Spirite. This verily cannot bee brought in question, that the Lorde sendeth his worde to many, whose blindness hee will have to be more enforced. For to what purpose doth he bid so many commandementes to be carried to Pha-raos: was it because he hoped that with often repeated messages he would be appeased? No, but before he began, he foreknewe and forsettde the ende.
Go (said hee to Moses) and declare to him my will: but I will harden his heart, that he obey not. So when he stirreth vp Ezechiel, hee warneth him afore hande that he sended him to a rebellious and stubborne people: to the ende that he should not be afrayde if he perceiue himselfe to sing to defat men. So he foretelleth to Iereemie, that his doctrine should become a fire, to destroy and waft the people like stubble. But the prophesie of Efaie yet more enforceth it. For he is thus sent of the Lorde: Go and saie to the children of israel: With hearing heare ye, and understond not: With seeing see ye, and knowe not. Make obstinate the heart of this people, and make heauie their eares , and overplaiuer their eyes: lest paraduernte they may see with their eyes, and heare with their eares , and understandle with their heart, that being turned they may be healed. Behold he direceth his voice to them, but that they may waie more deaf, he lighteth a light, but that they may be made more blinde: he sheweth forth doctrine, but that they may be made more dull: he layeth to them a remedie; but not that they may be healed. And Iohn alleaging this prophesie, affirneth that the Iewes could not beleue the doctrine of Christ, because this curse of God lay upon them. Neither can this also be in contoversie, that wh6 GOD will not haue to be enlightened, to them he delurred his doctrine wrapped vp in darke speeches, that they may nothing profiere thereby but to be thrust into greater dulness. Christ also testifieth, that he doth therefore ex-oundonely to the Apostles the parables in which he had spokenes to y mult-titude, because to them it was giuen to knowe the mysteries of the kingdom of God, but to the common people not so. What meaneth the Lorde(wilt thou saie) in teaching them, of whom he prouideth that he may not be un-derstande? Consider whence is the fault, and thou wilt ceasse to ask. For in y word how great darknes foperer there be, yet there is alway use enough to convince the conscience of the wicked.

14 Now remaineth for vs to see, why the Lorde doeth that which it is plaine that he doth. If it be auestioned that it is so don because men have so defersed by their vngodliness, wickednese, & vnthankfulness: the same shal in deede be well and truely faide: but because there appeareth not yet the reason of this diuerstie, why when some are bowed to obedience, others so continue hardenned, in searching it wee must needes go to that which Paul hath noted out of Moses, namely that God hath raised them vp from the beginning, that he might shewe his name in the whole earth. Wheras therfore the reproue do not obey the worde of God opened vnto them, that shall be well imputed to the malice and perturbenesse of their heart, so that this be therewithall added, that they are therefore giuen into this perturbenesse, because by the righteous but yet unsearcheble judgement of GOD they are raised vp to set forth his glorie with their damnation. Likewise wh6 it is saide of the sonses of Hely, that they harkened not to holsome warnings, because the Lord willed to kill them; it is not denied that the stubborne ness proceeded of their owne naughtinesse: but it is therewithall touched why they
they were left in stubbornnesse, when the Lord might have softened their hearts, namely because his unchangeable decree hadde once appointed them to destruction. To the same purpose serueth that saying of John, When he had done so great signes, no man beleued in him: that the word of Efiay might be fulfilled, Lorde, who hath beleued our saying? For though he do not excuse the stiffnecked from blame, yet he is content with that reason, that the grace of God is vnfauior to men, till the holy Ghost bring tasf. And Christ alleging the prophecie of Efiay, They shall all be taught of God, tendeth to no other ende but to prove that the Iewes are reproue and strangers from the Church, because they are vnapt to learner: and he bringeth no other cause thereof, but for that the promise of God doth not pertain to them. Which thing this saying of Paul confirmeth, that Christ which to the Iewes is an offence, and to the Gentiles foolishnesse, is to the called the strength and wisedome of God. For when he hath told what commonly happeneth so oft as the Gospell is preached, namely some it maketh more obstinate, and offome it is despised, he faith that it is had in price of them only which are called. Hee had in deed a little before named them believers, but he meant not to take away the due degree from the grace of God which goeth before faith, but rather hee addeth this seconde saying by way of Correction, that they which had embraced the Gospell shoule give the praise of their faith to the calling of God. As also a little after he teacheth that they are choosen of God. When the vngodly heare these thinges, they crie out that God with inordinate power abuseth his poore creatures for a sport to his crueltie. But we which knowe that all men are so many wayes endangered to the judgement seate of God, that beeing asked of a thousande thinges they can not satisfie in one, doe confess that the reprobate suffer nothing which agreeeth not with the most just judgement of God. Whereas we doe not clearly attaine the reason thereof, let vs not be discontent to be ignorant of somewhat, where the wisedome of God lifteth vp it selfe into so great heigh.

15 But forasmuch as there are a fewe places of scripture wont to bee objected, in which God feemeth to denie that it is done by his ordinance that the wicked doe perish, bury by this that, he crying out against it, they wilfulliy bring death vpon themselues: let vs brieuely declaring these places, shew that they make nothing against the sentence aboue set. There is brought foorth a place of Ezechiel, that God will not the death of a finner, but rather that he may be turned and liue. If they will extende this to all mankinde: why doth he not move many to repentance, whose mindes are more pliable to obedience, than theirs which at his daily allurementes waxe harder and harder? With the Sodomites (as Christ witnesseth) the preaching of the Gospell and miracles would haue brought foorth more fruite than in lurke. How commeth it to passe therefore, if God will all to be saued, that hee openeth not the gate of repentance to those miserable men that would haue beene more ready to receive grace? Hereby we see that the place is violently wretted, if the will of GOD, whereof the Prophet maketh mention, be sette against his eternall counsel, wherby he hath seuered the elect from the reprobate. Nowe if we seeke for the true natural meaning of the Propheete: his purpose purpose is to bring hope of pardon to the penitent. And this is the sum, that it is not to be doubted but that God is ready to forgive so soon as the sinner turneth. Therefore he will not his death, in so much as hee will than his repentance. But experience teacheth that hee so willeth them to repent who he generally calleth to him that ye it to toucheth not all their hearts. Yet is it therefore to be sayde that hee dealeth deceitfully, because although the outwarde voyce doe but make them vnexecuslable which heare and doe not obey it, yet it is truly accounted the testimonie of the grace of God, by which testimonie he reconcileth men to himselfe. Therefore let vs hold this for the meaning of the Prophete, that the death of a sinner pleaseth not God: that the godly may have affaunce, that so soon as they shalbe touched with repentance, there is pardon ready for them with GOD: and the wicked may feele that their fault is doubled, because they answere not to so great mercifull kindnesse and gendenesse of God. The mercy of God therefor will always meete repentance, but to whom repentance is gien, both all the Prophets, and Apostles, and Ezechiel him selfe doe plainly teach. Secondly there is alleged a place of Paul, where he sayth that God will eth al men to be saued, which although it haue a diuere meaning from the other, yet in some thing they agree together. I aunswere, first that by the rest of the text it is made plaine howe he willeth. For Paul coupleth together, that he willeth them to be saued, and to come to the acknowledging of the truth. If they will haue this to be determined by the eternall counsell of GOD that they receive the doctrine of salvation, what meaneth that saying of Moses, What nation is so noble, that God commeth neare to it as hee doth to thee? Howe came it to passe that GOD refrained from many peoples the light of the Gospel, which other enjoyed? Howe came it to passe that the pure knowledge of godlinesse never came to some, and some fearlessly tausted so much as any darke principles of it? Hereof it shall nowe bee easie to gather, whereunto Paul tendeth. He hadde commandad Timothee to make solemn prayers in the Church for kinges and princes. But when it seemeth somewhat an absurditie that prayers shoulde be made to GOD for a kinde of men in a manner despised (because they were not onely strangers from the body of Chriffe, but also endeued with all their forces to oppresse his kingdome) he added, that the same is acceptable to GOD which willeth al men to be saued. Whereby verily hee signifieth nothing else but that he hath stopped vp the way vnto salvation to no degree of men: but either that the hath so pourd out his mercie that he will eth no man to be voyde of it. The other sentences doe not declare what God hath by his secrete judgement determined of all men: but doeth shew that there is pardon ready for all sinnes which doe onely turne themselues to require it. For if they more stifely stonde vpon this that it is sayde that he will haue mercie vpon all, I will on the contrarie side aunswere them with that which is written in an other place, That our God is in heaven where hee doeth whatsoever he will. This worde therefore must so be expounded that it may agree with the other, I will haue mercie vpon whom I will haue mercy, and I will shewe mercie to whom I will shew mercie. He thatchooseth out them whome he will haue mercie on, doth not giue it to all. But such it clearly appereath.

peareth that in that place is spoken not of all particular men, but of degrees of men, we will make no longer disputing about it. Howbeit it is also to be noted, that Paul doth not affirme what God doth alway & euerly where and in all men: but leaueth it to him at his libertie at length to make kingses and magistrates partakers of the heauenly doctrine, although by reason of their blindenesse they doe nowe rage against it. They seeme to preffe us more strongly with obiecting the place of Peter, that God willeth none to perishe, but receiueth all to repentance. But the vndoing of his knot doth by and by offer it selfe in the seconde worde, because the will to receiue can not be under-standethed to be any other than that which is euerly where taught. Truely the turning is in the hande of God: whether he will turne all or no, let himselfe be asked, when he promiseth that he will giue to a certaine fewe men a fleshly hearte, leauing to other some a stone heart. It is true in deed, that vnlesse he were ready to receiue them which call vpon his mercy, this saying should be false. Turne to me, & I will turne to you. But I say that none of all mortall men doth come to God but he y is prevented of God. And if repentance were in the wil of man, Paul would not say, If Paraduente he giue the repentance. Yea vnlesse the same God which with worde exhorteth all men to repentance, did with secret mouing of his spirit bring the chosen to it: Jeremiac would not say, Turne me, Lord, and I shall be turned: for when thou hast turned me, I have repented.

16 But (thou wilt say) if it be so, there shalbe small truth in the promisses of the Gospell, which when they testifie of the will of GOD, affirme that he willeth that which is against his imouable decrees. Not so. For howsoeuer the promisses of saluation be vniversal, yet they nothing disagree with the pre-destination of the reprobate, so that wee direct our minde to the effect of them. We knowe that then and not till then the promisses are effectual to vs, when wee receive them by faith, on the other side when faith is made voyde, the promisse is therewithall abolished. If this be the nature of them, let vs then see whether these things disagree together: that it is sayde that God hath from eterinitie ordeined whome he will embrace with loue, and vpon whom he will exercise wrath: and that he promiseth saluation to all without difference. Truely I say that they agree verie well. For in so promisint he meaneth nothing eile than that his mercie is set open for all which doe counet and craue it: which thing none doe but they whom he hath en-lightned. And them he enlightneth, whom he hath predestinate to saluation. They (I say) haue the truest of the promisses sure and unshaken, so as it can not be sayde that there is any disagreement betwene the eternall e-lection of God, and the testimonie of his grace which he offereth to the faith-ful. But why nameth he all? verily that the confidences of the godly may the more safely rest, when they understannde that there is no difference of sinners, so that faith be preuent: and that the wicked may not cauill for their excuse, that they want a sanctuary wherunto they may withdraw themselues from the bondage of sinne, when with their owne vnthankfulnes they refuse it being offered them. Therfore when the mercy of God is by the Gospell of-fred to both sorts, it is faith, that is to say the enlightning of God, which maketh difference between the godly and vngodly, so as the one sort seelethe the
Of the maner how to receive effectuallnesse of the Gospel, and the other sort obtaine no fruite thereof. The enlightening itself also hath the eternal election of God for the rule thereof. The complaint of Christ, which they allege, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, howe oft haue I willed to gather together thy chickens, but thou wouldest not? maketh nothing for them. I graunt that Christ there speeketh not onely in the perfon of man, but also reprocheth them that in all ages they haue refused his grace. But we must define that will of God which is entreated of. For neither is it vnownen, how diligently God endeavored to keepe stil that people, and with how great stiffenesse they euene from the first to the last being given to their wandering desires refused to be gathered together: but it followeth not thereof that the counsell of God was made voyde by the malice of men. They answere and say that nothing leffe agreeth with the nature of GOD than to have a double will in him. Which I graunt to them, so that they fitly expounde it. But why doe they not consider so many testimonies, where God putting vpon him the affections of man descendeth beneath his owne majesty? He faith that he hath with stretched out arms called the rebellious people, that he hath early and late trauailed to bring them backe to him. If they will apply all these things to God, and not consider the figure, there shall arise many superfluous contentions, which this one solution bringeth to agreement, that the propertie of man is figuratively applied to GOD. Howe be it the solution which wee haue brought in an other place largely sufficient, that although the will of God be, as to our fence manifolde: yet he doth not in himselfe diversely wil this and that, but according to his wisdom, which is diversely manifolde (as Paul calleth it) he amazeth our fences, till it shall be given vs to knowe that he mercifully willeth that which now seemeth to be against his will. They also mocke with caullations, that fith God is the father of all, it is vnrighteous that he should discriue any that hath not before with his own fault deserved this punishment. As though the liberalitie of God stretcheth not euene to hoggis and dogges. But if they speake onely of mankinde, let them answere why God bounde himselfe to one people, to be the father thereof: and why also out of the same people he picked a small number as it were a floure. But their owne lust of cuill speaking hindereth these railers that they consider not that God so bringeth forth his sunne to shine vpon the good and cuill, that the inheraunce is layde vp for a fewe, to whom it shal on e day be fayde, Come ye blessed of my Father, possess ye the kingdom, &c. They obiect alfo that God hateth none of these things that he hath made. Which although I graunt them, yet this remaineth true, which I teach, that the reprobate are hatefull to God, and that verie rightfully, because they being destitute of his Spirite can bring forth nothing but caufe of curfe. They say further, that there is no difference of the lewe and the Gentile, and therefore that the grace of God is without difference sette before all men: namely if they graunt (as Paul determineth) that GOD calleth as well out of the lewes as out of the Gentiles, according to his good pleasure, so that he is bound to no man. After this maner alfo is that wiped away which they obiect in an other place, that God hath enclosed all things vnder sinne, that he may haue mercie vpon all: namely because hee will that the saluation of all them that are fauod be ascribed to his mercie, although this this benefite be not common to all. Nowe when many things are allledged on both partes, let straight our conclusion, to tremble with Paul at so great depth, and if wanton tongues shall be busie, that we be not ashamed of this his crying out, O man, what art thou that striuest with God? For Augustine De præde. & truec afirmeth that they do peruerely which measure the righteousnesse of gratia. ca. 2. God by the measure of the righteousnesse of man.

The xxv. Chapter.
Of the last Resurrection.

A lthough Christ the sonne of righteousnesse, having overcome death, shining by the Gospell, gueth vs the light of life (as Paul witnesseth) whereby also it is said that by beleeuing we have passe from death unto life, being nowe not forcers and strangers, but citizens with the Saintes, and of the householde of God, which hath made vs to fit with the onely begotten sonne himselfe in heavenly places, that nothing may be wanting to perfect felicite yet least it should be greevous vnto vs to be exercized vnder this hard warfare, as though we had no suerte of the victorie which Christ hath gotten, we must hold fast that which is in an other place taught of the nature of hope. For, because wee hope for those thinges which appeare not, and (as it is saide in an other place) faith is a demonstration of thinges invisibile: so long as we are inclofed in the prison of the fleth, we are wayfaring from the Lord. For which reason the same Paul faith in another place that we are deade, and that our life is hidden with Christ in God, and that when hee which is our life, shall appeare, then shall we also appeare with him in glory. This therefore is our condition, that with liuing soberly and justly and godly in this worlde, wee looke for the blesseed hope, and the comming of the glorie of the great God, and of our Saviour Iesus Christ. Here we neede a singular patience, that we be not wearied and either turne backe our course or forfake our standing. Therefore whatsoever hath beene hitherto set out concerning our saluation, requireth mindeis lifted vp to heauen, that wee may loue Christ whome we haue not seene, and beleeuing in him may rejoyce with vs speakeable and glorious joyfullnesse till wee receiue the ende of our faith, as Peter telleth us. After which maner, Paul faith that the faith and charitie of the godly hath respect to the hope which is laide vp in heauen. When we thus with our eyes fastened vppon Christ doe hange of heauen, and nothing withholdeth them in earth from carying vs to the promisde blesseednesse: then is that truely fulfilled, Our hearts is where our treasure is. Hereupon commeth that faith is so rare in the world, because nothing is more harde to our dulnesse than through innumerable steppes to clime vp about them with endeauering forwarde to the price of our heauenely calling: To the great heape of miseries wherewith wee bee almost overwhelmed, are added the mockinges of vn godlie men, wherewith our simplicitie is rayled at, when voluntarile forsaking the allurements of present good thinges, wee seeme to followe the blesseednesse hidden from vs, as it were a fleeing shadowe. Finally aboue and beneath

... before vs and behinde vs, violent tentations besiege vs, to the sustaining of the fear whereof our courages shoulde be farre too weake, vnlesse being vnembred of earthly thynge they were fast bounde to the heavenly life, which in seeming is farre from vs. Wherefore only he hath soundly profitted in the Gospell, which is enuired to a continual meditation of the blessed resurrection.

2 Of the soueraigne ende of good things, the philosophers haue in olde time curiously disputed, and also striued among themselves: yet none except Plato, acknowledged the soueraigne good of man to bee his conjoyning with God. But what maner of conjoyning that was, he could not perceive so much as with any small tast, and no manuell, Sith he had never learned of the holy bond thereof. To vs the only & perfect felicitie is known even in this earthly wayfaring: but, such as dayly more and more inkindleth our heartes with defire of it, till the full enjoying may satisfie vs. Therefore I saie that none receive fruite of the benefites of Christ, but they that lift vp their mindest to the resurrection. For Paul setteth vp this marke to the faithfull, towarde which he faith that hee endeuorth, and forgeteth all things till he come to it. And so much the more chearfully ought wee to trauel toward it, least if this world withstand vs, wee suffer greevous punishment for our slouthfulness. Wherefore in an other place he marketh the faithfull with this marke, that their conversation is in heaven, from whence also they looke for their Saviour. And that their courages should not faint in this race, he ioyneth all creatures companions with them. For, because every where are seeneth deformed ruines, he faith that all things in heaven and earth doe endeuor to the renewing. For Sith Adam by his fall disfolled the perfect order of nature to the creatures, their bondage is painful & greevous, wherevnto they are subject by reason of the finne of man, not for that they are indued with any feeling but for that they naturally couet the perfect estate from which they are fallen. Therefore Paul sayth that they grone, and are as in paine of childe bearing, that wee to whom are giuen the first fruities of the Spirite, may be ashamed to pine away in our corruption, and not at the leaft to followe the deadde elementes, which beare paine of an others finne. And the more to pricke vs forward, he calleth the laste comming of Christ our redemption. It is true indeede that all the partes of our redemption are alreadie fulfilled: But because Christ hath once beene offered for finnes, he shalbe seene againe without finne vnto saluation. With what miseries souer we be pressed, let this redemption suffice vs euern vntil the performance of it.

2 The verie weight of the thing it selfe shal whette our endeuor. For neither doeth Paul without cause affirmne that the whole Gospell is voide & deceitefull, vnlesse the dead doe rise againe: because our state shoulde bee more miserable than the state of all men, namely Sith we lying open to the hatreds and reproches of many, are euerie hour in daunger, yea and are as shepe appointed to the slaughter: and therefore the authoritie thereof should fall away not only in one part, but also in the whole sum which both our adoption and the effecte of our saluation containeth. And so let vs be heedfully bent to the most earnest thing of all, that no continuance of time may make vs wearcie. For which purpose I haue differed to this place, which I had brefely to entreat of it, that the readers may learne, when they haue receiued Chrift the authour of their saluation, to rife vp hier, and may knowe that he is cloathed with heavenly immortalitie and glorie, that the whole bodie may be made like fashioned to the heade, as also the holy Ghost oftentimes setteeth forth in his person an example of the resurrecion. It is a thing harde to bee beleued, that bodies when they haue bene consumed with rottennesse, fhall at their appointed time rife vp againe. Therefore where many of the Phylophers haue affirmed foules to be immortal; the resurrecion of the flesh hath bene allowed of fewe: wherein although there was no excufe, yet we are thereby put in minde, that it is too hard a thing to drawe mans fefnes to beleue it. That faith may overcome fo great a stoppe, the scripture miniftreth two helpe: the one is in the likenesfe of Chrift, the other is the almightyneffe of God. Nowe fo oft as the resurre-cation is thought of, let the image of Chrift come into our mindes: which in the nature that he tooke of vs, roaffe out the race of mortall life, that nowe hauing obteined immortalitie, he is to vs a pledge of the resurrecion to come. For in the miseries wherewith we are besieged, wee carie about his mortififying in our fleshe, that his life may bee openly shewed in vs. And wee may not feuer him from vs, neither can wee possiblie, but that he must be torne in sunder. Whereupon commeth that argument of Paul, If the deade doe not rife againe, then neither is Chrift rifen againe: becaufe verily hee taketh that principle for confessed, that Chrift was not made subject to death, nor obteined victorie of death by rizing againe, privately for himselfe: but, that that was begun in the head in which must needs bee fulfilled in all the members, according to the degree and order of everyone. For it were not right that they should in all points be made egal with him. It is laide in the Pfalme. Thou shalt not suffer thy meekone to see corruption. Although a portion of this trust perteine to vs according to the mea-ure of gifte, yet the full effect hath not appeared but in Chrift, which being free from all rotting hath receyued againe his body whole. Now least the fellowshippe of blessed resurrecion with Chrift shoulde bee doubtfull to vs, that wee may be contented with this pledge, Paul expressly affirmeth that he therefore stretteth in heauen, and shall come at the last day a judge, that he may make our base and vile body like fashioned to the glorious body. In an other place also hee teacheth, that God rayfed not vp his Sonne from death to the intent to shewe a token of his power: but to stretch out the same effectuall force of the spirite towarde vs which are faithfullwhome he therefore calleth life, while he liveth in vs, becaufe he was giuen to this ende that he should make alue that which is mortal in vs. I kniue vp in a brief abridgement those things which might both be more largely handled and are worthie to be more gorgiously set out: and yet I trufl that the godly readers shall in fewe words find matter enough which may suffice to edifie their faith. Chrift therefore is rifen againe, that hee might haue vs companions of the life to come. Hee was rayed vp of the father, in so much as hee was the head of the Church, from which he doeth in no wise suffer himeselfe to be plucked away. He was rayed vp by the power of the Spirite, which is common to vs unto the office of quickening. Finally, he was raised vp, that he should be resurrection and life. But as we have faide that in this mirrour, their is to bee scene of vs a lively image of the resurrection, so let it bee to vs a sure substance to stay our minde, so that yet wee be not tookefull or weare of long tarrying, because it is not our part to measure the seasons of times by our will, but patiently to refit till God at his owne fit time repaire his kingdom.

To which purpose seemeth that exhortation of Paule: The first fruites is Christ: and then they are Christites, every one in his order. But that no question should be made of the resurrection of Christ, vppon which the resurrection of vs al is founded, we see by howe many and how diuerse meanes hee hath made it approv'd by witnesse to vs. Fine noted men will laugh at the history which the Evangelistes rehearse, as at a childish mockery. For of what importance shall the message be which fearefull silly women bring, and afterward the disciples confirme being in a manner astonisht? Why did not Christ rather sette vp the triumphing eftagnes of his victorie in the midst of the temple & the market place? Why came he not forth terrible into the fight of Pilate? Why doth he not alfo prove himself to the priests, and to whole Ierusalem that he is rifen vp alioe againe? As for ye witneses which he choose, prophane men will fearefully grant them to be sufficient. I answere that although in these beginninges the weakenesse thereof was contemptible, yet al this was governed by the wonderful providence of God: that partly the loye of Christ and zeale of godlinesse, and partly their owne hardnes of beleefe should carrie them in haft to the sepulchre which had lately been dismaied for feare, that they might not only be seeing witneses of the thing, but alfo shoule have heart of the Angels that which they sawe with their eyes. Howe shall we suspect their credite, who thought it to be a fable which they had heard of the women, til they were brought to the present fight of ye thing it selfe? As for all the people and the Ruler himselfe, after that they had bin largely convinced, it is no maruell if as well the fight of Christ, as other signes, was not granted them. The sepulchre was sealed vp, the watchmen watched it, the thirde day the body was not founde, the Souldiers corrupted with mony scatered a rumour that his discipels had stolen him away. As though they had had power to gather a band together, or had armed, or were practised men to intrepriffe any such feare. If the soldiars had not courage enough to drue them away, why did they not purshee them, that with ye help of the people they might have taken none of them? Pilate therefore with his ring truely sealed the resurrection of Christ; & the watchmen which were set at the sepulchre both in their holding their peace and in their lying, were made publishe of the same resurrection. In the means time the voice of Angels founded, He is risen, he is not here. The heavenly glistring plainly shewed they were not men but Angels. Afterward, if there remained any doubting, Christ himselfe tooke it away. The disciples sawe him oftener than once, and also felt his feette and his hands, and their hardnes of believing not a little profited to the strengthening of our faith. Hee disputeth among them of the mysteries of the kingdom of God, and at the laft in their sightes beholding him, he ascended into heauen. And not onely this sight was shewed to the xi. Apostles, but also he was seene at once of mo than five hundred bre-

brethren. Nowe when he sent the holy Ghost, he shewed a sure profe f not onely of life, but also of the souereigne power: as hee had faide before, It is profitable for you that I gootherwise the holy Ghost shall not come. But now Paul was ouerthrown by the way not by the strength of a deade man, but he fet him whom he perfected to have moft his power. To Stephen hee appeared for an other end, namelie that with afflictednesse of life he might ouercom the care of death. To discredite many authentike wittneses, is not onely a part of diuertifullnesse, but also of frowarde and furious stubbornnesse.

4. This which we haue faide, that in prouing the resurrection our senses must be directed to the infinite power of God. Paul brefly teacheth, that he may make (faith he) our vile body like fashioned to the body of his brightnesse, according to the working of his power, by which hee may subdue all things to himselfe. Wherefore nothing is more vnmeet, than here to haue respect what may naturally be done, where an inestimable miracle is set before vs, which with the greatnesse thereof swalloweth vp our senses. Yea Paul by setting forth an example of nature, reproueth their dullnes which deny the resurrection. Thou foole (faith hee) that which thou owest is not quickended vntelie it first dy, &c. He faith that in deed is seen a forme of the resurrection, becaufe out of rottennesse goweth corn. Neither were it so hard a thing to beleue, if we were as heedefull as we ought to be to the miracles which throughour all the coasts of the world doe offer themselves to our eyes. But let vs remember that none is truely perwaded of the resurrection to come, but he which being rauished into admiration, giueth to the power of God his glorie. Efte lifted vp with this affiance, crieth out, Thy deade shall lye, my carcase shal rife againe. Awake ye, and praise ye dwellers of the dust. In delpeered case he lifteth vp himselfe to God the author of life, in whose hand are the ends of death, as it is saide in the Psalme. Job alfo being liker to a carriion than to a man, trusting vpon the power of God sticketh not as though he were whole and found to lift vp himselfe to that day sauing, I knowe that my redeemer liueth: and in the last day hee shall rife vp the dust (namely to shew soorth his power therein) and I shal againe be compassed with my skinne, and in my flesh I shall see God, I shall see him, and none other. For albeit vsome do suteely wrest these places, as though they ought not to be vnderstande of the resurrection, yet they strenthen that which they couet to ouerthrow: becaufe the holy men in their eulls seeke comfort from no where else, than from the likenes of the resurrection. Which better appeareth by the place of Ezechiel. For when the Iewes beleued not the promise of their returne, and obiected that it was no more likely that a way shoulde bee made open for them, than that deademen should come out of their grave there was a vision shewed to the Prophete, a field full of drie bones: those the Lorde commanded to take agayne flesh and sinewes. Although vnder that figure hee raiseth vp the people to hope of returne: yet the matter of hoping hee gathereth of the resurrection: as it is to vs an examplar of the deliueraunces which the faithfull doe feele in this worlde. So Christ, when hee hadde taught that the voyce of the Gospell giueth life: becaufe the Iewes receyued not this, he by and by said further: Maruell not at this, because the houre commeth in which all that are in the graves shall heare the voyce of the fonne of God, and shall come forth. Therefore after this example of Paul, let vs alreadie cheerfully triumph in the midit of battells, because he which hath promised life to come, is mightie to keepe that which is left with him: and let vs glorie of a crowne of rightousnesse, to layde vp for vs, which the iust judge shall deliuer vs. So shall it come to passe, that whatsoever greues wee suffer, they shall be to vs a shewing of the life to come, because it agreeth with the nature of God to render affliction to the wicked which afflicte vs: but to vs which are vnjustly afflicted, rest at the appearing of Christ with the Angels of his power, in a flame of fire. But that is to be holden which he addeth by and by afterward, that he shall come that he may be glorified in his saints, and be made wondrful in al them that haue beleued, because the Gospel hath beene beleued.

§ But although the mindes of men ought to haue bene continually ocuppied in this studie; yet as though they woulde of let purpose destroy all remembrance of the resurrection, they haue called death the vtermost bond of al things and the destruction of man. For verily Salomon speaketh of the common and received opinion, when he saith that a liuing dogge is better than a deade Lyon. And in another place: Who knoweth whether the soule of a man goo vpwarde, and the soule of a beaft goo downwarde? But in all ages this brutifhe fenfes lesse error hath beeene common in the worlde, yea and hath broken into the Church it selfe: for, the Sadduces have presumed to profess openly that there is no resurrection, yea and y soules are mortall. But that this grosse ignorance should not help to exccute any man, y infidels even by verie instinct of nature haue alway had an image of the resurrection before their eyes. For to what purpose serveth that holy and inviolable manner of burying, but to bee an earnest of newe life? Neither may it bee aunswered that this spring of error: because the religiuousnesse of burying was alway in very among the holy Fathers, and God willed the same manner to remaine among the Gentiles, that an image of the resurrection fore before them might awake their drowsines. But although that ceremony wanted his vse of profiting, yet it is profitable for vs if we wisely marke the end of it, because it is no slender confusion of vnbeleeue, that altogether professed that which no man beleued. But Satan hath not only astonished the fenctes of men, so that they haue buried with the bodies the remembrance of the resurrection, but also hath practised to corrupt this part of doctrine with diverse fained inventions, at length it might utterly die. I passe over howe in Pauls time Satan began to pinch at it: but in a little after there followed Millenaries, which limited the raigne of Christ to a thousand yeares. This error is so childish, it needeth not or is not worthy of any confutation. Neither doth the Revelation make on their side, by which it is certaine that they colored their error: for as much as in the place where he mentioneth the number of a thousande, hee intreateth not of the eternall blestednes of the Church, but onely of the diverse troubles which were to come upon the Church while it yet travelled in earth. But the whole Scripture cryeth out that there shall bee no end of the blest ednes of the elect, nor of the punishment of the reprobate. Now of all things which both are hidden from our sight and do farre passe the capacite of our minde, either wee must fetch the credite out of the certaine oracles of God, or we must utterly cast it away. They which assigne to the children of God a thousand yeres to enjoy the inheritance of the life to come, do not marke how great a dishonor they do both to Christ and his kingdom. For if they shall not be clothed with immortalitic: then neither is Christ himselfe, to whose glory they shalbe newly fashoned, receeived into the immortal glorie. If their blessednesse shall haue any end: then the kingdom of Christ, upon the steadfastnes whereof it standeth, endureth but for a time. Finally, either they are most vnskilful of all matter concerning God, or they go about with crooked maliciousnes to overthrow the whole grace of God & power of Christ, the fulfilling wherof is no otherwise perfect; but when sinnen being blotted out & death swallowed vp, eternal life is fully restor'd. But very blind men may see how fondly they play the fooles: which feare that they should ascrible to God too grate crueltie if the reprobate be condemned to everlafting paines. The Lorde foreby shal doe wrong, if hee deny his kingdom to them which haue by their vnthank-fulnesse made themselves vnworthy of it. But (lay they) their sinnen endure but for a time. I graunte, but y maiestie, yea & the rightoufnes of God which they have offended by sinning, is eternall. Worthy therefore the remembrance of iniquitie dieth not: But so the paine exceedeth the measure of the fault. This is a blasphemie not to be suffered, when the maiestie of God is so little set by, when the despifing thereof is esteemed at no greater value than the destruction of one soule. But let vs leave these trifles, least contrary to that which we haue before faide, we may seeme to judge their dotages worthy of contemptation.

6 Beside these, there haue bin two other doring errors brought in by men peruersely curious. The one forsooth thought, as though the whole man died, that the soules shall rife againe with the bodies. The other forasmuch as they graunte that the soules be immortall spirites, say that they shalbe clothed with new bodies: whereby they deny the resurrection of the fleth. Of the first sort, because I haue touched somwhat in speaking of the creation of man, it shalbe enough for me to warne the readers againe, howe beastily an error it is to make of a spirit fashioned after the image of God, a vanifhing blaff which doth nothing but quicke the bodie in this fraile life, & to bring the temple of the holy Ghost to nothing: Finally, to spoile that parte of vs wherein diuineneffe chiefly shineth & markes of immortalitie appeare, to spoile it (I say) of this gift; so that the estate of the body shal be better & more excellent than y estate of the soule. The Scripture teacheth far otherwise, which compar eth the bodie to a corage, out of which it fayeth that wee remove when we die, because it esteemeth vs by that parte which maketh vs differing from brute beasts. So Peter beeing nece to death, fayeth that the time is come, when he must lay away his tent. And Paul speaking of the faithfull, after that he hath said: That when our earthly houfe shalbe disfolued, there is a building for vs in heauen, adioyneth that wee are wayfaring from the Lorde so long as wee abide in the bodie, but doe desire the presence of God in the abfence of the bodie. If the soules doe not ouelie the bod-

Xx. dies,

dies, what is it that hath God present when it is secur'd from the body? But the Apostle taketh away all douring, when he teacheth that we are joyned in fellowship to the spirits of the righteous. By which wordes he sheweth, that we are joyned in fellowship to the holy fathers, which eu'n being dead do keepe the same godliness with vs, so that we cannot be the members of Christ vnlesse we growe together with them. Vnlesse also the soules being vnclad of the bodies, did keepe still their substance and were able to receive blesse'd glorie, Christ would not have said to the thicke: This day thou shalt be with me in paradifi. Having to cleare testimonies, let vs not doute after the example of Christ when we are dying, to condemn our soules to God, or after the example of Stephen, to commit them to Christ to keep, which not vnworthily is called a faithfull shepheard and Bishop of them. To enquire of their meane state, is neither lawful nor expedient. Many doe much comber themselues with disputing what place they keepe, and whether they do now enjoy the heauenly glorie or no. But it is folly & rashnes, to search deepelie of vnknowne things, than God doth giue vs leave to knowe. When the Scripture hath said that Christ is present with them, and receiued them into paradifi that they may enjoy comfort, on the other side that the soules of the reprobate doe suffer such paines as they have deserved: it goeth no further. What teacher or master shall nowe open to vs that which God hath hidden: Of the place, the question is no lesse fonde & vain, forasmuch as we know that there is not the same dimension of soules which is of the bodie. Whereas the blessed gathering together of holy spirits is called the bosome of Abraham, it is enough for vs after this wayfairing to be receiued of the common father of the faithfull, that he may communicate with vs the frite of his faith. In the meane time fis the Scripture everywhere where biddeth vs to hang upon the expectation of Christ's coming, and differreth the crowne of glorie til then: let vs bee content with these bonds appointed of God; namely, that the soules of the godly haung ended the labour of their warfare do go into a blessed rest, where with happy and fulness they looke for the enjoying of the promised glorie; and that so al things are holden in suspence til Christ the redeemer appeare. As for the reprobate, it is no dout that they haue the same estate which Iude assigneth to the devils, to be holden bound with chineis, til they be drawn to ypunishment whereunto they are condemned.

No lesse monstrous is their ciuior, which imagine that soules shall not receive againe the same bodies wherewith they are now closed, but shall haue newe and other bodies. And the reason of the Manichees was very trifling, that is, that it is not meete that flesh which is uncleane should rise againe. As though there were no uncleanenesse of soules, which yet they debarred not from the hope of euerlastinge life. It was therefore all one as if they should say that that which is infccted with the filch of sinne cannot be cleansed by God. For I now passe ouer that dotage, that flesh was naturally uncleane, because it was creat of the Duitel. Onely I shewe that whatsoever is now in vs vnworthie of heauen, it hindereth not the resurrection. And first whereas Paul biddeth the faithfull to cleanse themselves from al defling and put the spirit to eare, and so receiue the life unlesse the soule receiue againe the same body.

Cap. 28.
The grace of Christ.

Lib. 3.

which he in an other place prouencth, that every man shall receive by his body either good or euill. Wherewith agreeeth that which he writeth to the Corinthians, That the life of Jesus Christ may be openly shewed in our mort-tall flesh. For which reason in an other place hee doth no lesse praye that God preserve the bodies whole vnto the day of Chrifi, than the soules and spirites. And no maruell, because it were a most great absurditie that the bod-dies which God hath dedicates to be temples to himselfe, shoule should awa y into rottenflesse without hope of rising againe. What say we to this, that they are also the members of Christ? that GOD commanded all the partes of them to be sanctified to himselfe? that hee willceth his name to be prayfed with tongues, pure handes to be lifted vp to him, sacrifices to bee offered?

What madnesse is it therefore that that parte to which the heavenly judge hath vouchsafed to grant so great honour, should be brought from a mortall man into dust without any hope of restoring? Likewise when Paul exhorteth us to suffer the Lorde as well in body as in soule, because both belong to God, verily he suffereth not that which hee-chalengeth to God as holy, to be adjudged to eternall rottenflesse. Neither is there a plainer determination of the Scripture for any thing, than for the rising againe of this fleshe which we beare. This corruptible (sayth Paul) must put on vn corruption, and this mortall must put on immortality. If God did make newe bodies, where is this changing of quality? If it had bin sayd y we must be redeemt, the dout-falle speche paraduentes ought haue given occation to their caullation.

But nowe when pointing with his finger to the bodies wherewith we are clo-ched, he promiseth to them vn corruption, he plainly enough denieth any newe bodies to be made. Yea he could not (sayth Tertullian) speake more plainely, vnlesse he had holden his owne skinne in his hande. And they can by no caullation escape from this, that where in an other place he sayth that Christ shalbe the judge of the worlde, he allegateh this testimonie of Esay, I liue (sayth the Lorde)every knee shall bow to me: for almoast as he plainly pronouncth that they to whom he speakeh shall be subject to yield an accoant of their life, which could not agree, if newe bodies should e be brought before the judgement seate. Nowe in the wordes of Daniel there is no doubtfulness:

And many of them that sleepe in the earth of duste, shall awake, some to eter-nall life, and some to reproches and to euertlasting contempt: sicke he fetcheth not newe matter out of the foure elements to make men, but calleth dead men out of their graves. And this very plain reason teacheth. For if mortality which tooke beginning at the fall of man, be accidentall: then the repaying which Christ brought, pertaineth to the same body which beganne to bee inmortall. And truely, whereas the Athenians laughed when Paul affirmed the resurrection, thereupon we may gather what maner of resurrection he pre-ched: and that same laughing not finally availeth to strengthen our faith.

The saying of Christ also is worthy to bee noted: Feare not them which kill the body, & can not kill the soule: but feare him which can throwe both the soule and the body into hell fire. For there is no caufe to feare, vnlesse the body which we nowe beare be subject to punishment. And no lesse plaine is an other saying of the same Christ. The house commeth, when all they that are in graves, shalbe the voyce of the sonne of God, and shall come

forth: they that have done good, into the resurrection of life: but they which have done evil, into the resurrection of judgment. Shall we say that souls rest in the graves, that they lying there may hear Christ? and not rather that at his commandment the bodies shall return into the lineline of which they had loft? Moreover if we shall have new bodies given vs, where is the like fashioning of the head and the members? Christ rose again: was it with forging to himself a new body? No, but as hee had so doo before, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will build it vp: he tooke againe the same body which he hadde before borne mortall, For he had not much profited vs, if a newe body being put in place, the old body had beene destroyed which was offerd vp for a sacrifice of satisfactory cleansing. We must also hold fast that fellow-shipp which the Apostoe preached: That wee rise againe, because Christ hath risen againe: for nothing is lesse probable than that our flesh in which we beare about the mortifying of Christ, should be depruied of the resurrection of Christ. Which verily appeared by a notable example, when at the rising againe of Christ many bodies of the Saintes came out of the graves. For it can not be denied that this was a foreshewing, or rather an earnest of the last resurrection which wee hope for: such as was before in Enoch and Elias, whom Tertullian calleth New possessor of the resurrection: because they being in body and soule delverted from corruption, were receiued into the keeping of God.

8 I am ashamed in so cleare a matter to spend so many wordes: but the readers shall contentedly beare this trouble with me, that no hole may be open for sowerde and bolde wittes to deceiue the simple. The fleeing spirits with whom I now dispute, bring forth a fained intension of their owne braine that at the resurrection there shall be a creation of newe bodies. What reason moueth them to thinke so, but because it seemeth to them incredible, that a carion consumed with so long rottennesse should returne into his auncient state? Therefore onely vnbelieve is the mother of this opinion. But vs on the other side: y Spirit of God eth where in the Scripture exhorteth to hope for the resurrection of our flesh. For this reason baptisme (as Paul wittnesseth) is to vs a scale of the resurrection to come: and likewise the holy Supper allureth vs to the trust thereof, when wee receive with our mouth the signes of spiritual grace. And truely the whole exhortation of Paul, that wee give our members to be weapons unto the obedience of righteousness, should be coldely vnlesse that were joyned which he addext afterwards: He that hath raised vp Christ from the dead, shall quicken also your mortall bodies. For, what should it profitte to applye our feete, hands, eyes, and tongues unto the service of GOD, vnlesse they were partakers of the fruite and reward? Which thing Paul plainly confirmeth with his owne wordes, saying: The bodie not to fornication, but to the Lord: and the Lord to the bodie. And he that hath raised vp Christ, shall also raise vp vs by his power. More plaine are those wordes which followe: that our bodies are the temples of the holy Ghost and the members of Christ. In the mean time wee see howe he joyneth the resurrection with chaittie and holinesse, as a little after he sayeth that the price of redemption pertaineth also to the bodies. Nowe it were not reasonable that the body of Paul, in which hee hath should loose the reward of the crowne. Whereupon also came that glorying, we looked for the redeemer from heaven, which shall make our vile body like fashioned to the bodie of his brightnes. And if this be true, that we must by many afflictions enter into the kingdom of God, no reason suf-fretreth to debarre the bodies from this entrée, which God both exercised vnder the standerde of the crose, and honoreth with the praise of victorie.

Therefore of this matter there arose among the Saints no douting, but that they hoped to be companions of Christ, which remoueth into his own person all the afflictions wherewith we are prooued, to teache that they bring life. Yea and vnder the lawe he exerciseth the holy fathers in this faith with an outward ceremony. For to what purpose serveth the vmage of burying, as we have already shewed, but that they should knowe that there is newe life prepared for the bodies that are layd vp? Hereunto also tended the spieces & other signes of immortalitie, wherewith vnder the lave the darknes of faith was holpen euen as it was by the sacrificies. Neither was that manner brede by superstition, forasmuch as we see that the Spirit doeth no leffe diligently rehearse burials than the chiefe mysteries of faith. And Christ commendeth that worke as a speciall worke, truely for none other reason but because it lifteth vp our eyes from beholding of y grave which corrupteth & destroyeth all, to the fight of the renuing. Moreover the so diligent obseruing of the ceremonie which is praiseth in the Fathers, sufficiently proueth that it was to them a rare and precious helpe of faith. For neither would Abraha have so carefully provided for the burying place of his wife, vnlesse there had bene set before his eyes a religion and a profete hyer than the world, namely that garnishing the dead bodie of his wife with the signes of the resurrection he might conforme both his owne faith and the faith of his houhholde.

But a clearer proofe of this thing appeareth in the example of Iacob, which to testifie to his posteritie that the hope of the promised lande was not euyn by death fallen out of his minde, commanded his bones to be carried thither. I beseech you, if he was to be clothed with a newe body, shoulde he not haue given a fonde commandement concerning dust that should bee brought to nothing? Wherefore if the authoritie of the Scripture be of any force with vs, there can be required of no doctrine either a more cleare or more certaine proofe. For this euyn children understand by the words of resurrection and raising vp againe. For neither can we call it the resurrection of that which is nowe first created, neither shoulde that saying of Christ stand fast, Whatsoever the Father hath given me, it shall not perish, but I will raise it vp in the last day. To the same purpose serveth the wordes of Sleeping, which pertaineth onely to the bodies. Whereupon also burying places were called Cæmeteria, Sleeping places. Nowe it remaineth that I speake somewhat of the manner of the resurrection. I vse this worde, because Paul calling it a mystery, exhorteath vs to sobriete, and bridethe the libertie to dispute like Philosophers freely & suttelie of it. First we must holde, as we haue saide, that wee shall rise againe in the same flesh which wee bære, as touching the substance, but the qualitie shall not be the same. As when y same flesh of Christ which had bene offered for sacrifice, was raised vp againe, yet it excelled in other qualities as if it had been altogether another flesh. Which thing Paul declareth by familiar examples. For as there is all one substance of the flesh of a man, & of a beast, but not all one quality: as all stars have like matter, but not like brightness: so he teacheth that though we shall keepe still the substance of our body, yet there shall be a change, that the state of it may be much more excellent. The body therefore, that we may be raised up againe, shall not perish nor vanish away: but putting off corruption, it shall put on vncorruption. But forasmuch as God hath all the elements ready at his beck, no hardinesse shall hinder him, but he may command both earth & waters & fire, to render that which seemeth to bee consumed by them.
Which also Ezechiel testifieth though not without a figure, where he saith, Behold, the Lord shall go forth of his place, that he may visit the iniquity of the earth: & the earth shall discontinue her bloud, & shall no more hide her dead.
But there is to be noted a difference betweene them that have beene dead long before, and those whom that day shall finde alive. For wee shall not all sleepe (as Paul faith) but we shall all be changed: that is to say, it shall not bee of necessitie that there be a distance of time between death & the beginning of the second life: because in a moment of time, & in the twinkling of an eye, the sound of the trumpet shall peale, to raise vp the dead vncorruptible, and with a soudaine change to fashioned againe the living into the same glorie.
So in another place he comforteth the faithfull which must die: because they which shall then remaine alive shall not go before the dead, but rather they shall first arise againe which have slept in Christ. If any object that saying of the Apostle, that it is appointed to all mortall men once to die, it is asked to answer it with saying that when the state of nature is changed, it is but a kind of death, and is fitely so called. And therefore these things agree well together, that all shall be reued by death when they shall put of their mortall body: & yet that it is not necessarie that there be a seperation of the body & the soule where there shall be a soudaine changing.

9 But here ariseth a harder question: by what right the resurrection which is the singular benefit of Christ is common also to the wicked and the accut fed of God. We knowe that all were in Adam condemned to their death. Christ came the resurrection & life. Came he to give life to all mankind vniuersally without choice? But what is more against reason, than that that they shoulde by their obstatute blindness noe obtaine that which the godly worshippers of God do obtaine by onely faith? Yet this remaineth certaine, that there shall be one resurrection of judgement, and another resurrection of life, and that Christ shal come to seuer the Lambs from the Goates. I answerde, that this ought not to seeme strange, the likenesse whereof we see in daily experience.
We see that in Adam wee were depriued of the inheritance of the whole world, & that we are by no leffe iust reason debarred from commone foode, than from the eating of the tree of life. Whence then commeth it to passe, that God doth not onely make his sunne to rise vpon the good & evil, but also as touching the vses of this present life, his inestimable liberalitie continually floweth foorth to them with large plentifulnesse? Hereby verryly we knowe that those things which properly belong to Christ and his members, do also overflowe to the wicked, not that it is their rightfull possesion, but that
that they may be made the more inexusable. So the wicked do oftentimes finde God beneficall, by more than meane proues, ye such as sometime doe darken all the blessings of the Godly, but yet doe tune to their greater damnation. If any man obiect, that the resurrection is not fitte compared to fading and earthly benefitee : here also I answer were that so soone as they were estranged from God the fountaine of life, they deferred the death of Diuel, whereby they shoule be utterly destroyed: Yet by the marveilous counself of God there was founde a meane state that out of life they might live in death. No more absurditie ought it to seeme, if the resurrection happen to the wicked, which draweth them against their willes to the judgement seat of Christ, whom nowe they refuse to heare for their maister and teacher. For it were a small paine to bee confumed away with death, if they were not to suffer punishment for their obstinacie, brought before judge, whose vengeance they haue without ende and measure provoked against themselves. But although wee must holde that which wee haue faide, and which that notable confession of Paul before Felix containeth, that he looketh for the resurrection of the righteous & wicked: yet the Scripture oftentimes meteth forth election together with the heauenly glorie to the onely children of God: Because Christ properly came not to the destrucution, but to the saluation of the worlde. Therefore in the Creed there is made mention of the blessed life only.

10 But forasmuch as the Prophecie of death swallowed vp by victorie, shall then and not till then be fulfilled: let vs alway haue in minde the eternall felicitie, the ende of the resurrection: of the excellencie whereof, if all things were spoken which the tongs of men were able to speake, yet scarcely the smallest parcel thereof should be expressed. For howsoever we truly heare that the kingdome of God shalbe stuffed full with brightnesse, ioy, felicitie, and glorie: yet those things that are spoken of are most farre removed from our sense, and remaine as it were wrapped in darke speaches, untill that day come when he himselfe shal giue vs his glorie to be seen face to face. We knowe (Faith John) that wee are the children of God, but it hath not yet appeared. But when we shalbe like to him, then we shall see him such as he is. Wherefore the Prophets, because they could by no words express the spirituall blessednesse in it selue, did in a manner grossly portray it out vnnder bodily thinges. But forasmuch as the ferventnesse of desire must with some taft of that sweetenesse be kindled in vs, yet vs chieflye continue in this thought, that if God do as a certaine fountain which cannot be dren drie, containe in him the fulnesse of all good things, nothing is beyond him to bee couerted of them that tende toward the soueraigne good & the full perfection of felicitie: as wee are taught in many places. Abraham, I am thy rewarde exceeding great. With which saying accordeth David, The Lorde is my portion, the lot hath very well fallen to mee. Againe in another place, I shalbe satisfied with thy countenance. But Peter pronounceth that the faithfull are called to this ende, that they may be made partakers of the nature of God. How fo? because he shalbe glorified in all his faintes, and shalbe made wonderfull in them that have beleued. If the Lorde will enterparten his glory, power, & righteoussnesse with his elect, yea & will giue himselfe to them to be enjoyed, and (which is better) will after a certaine manner growe into one with them: let vs remember that vnder this benefit is contained all kinde of felicite. And when we have much profited in this meditation, let vs acknowledge that we are yet stay beneath at the bottome of the roote of the conceiuing of our minde be compared with the highnest of this mysterie. Wherefore in this behalfe we must keepe sobrietie, least with how much greater boldnes we shall fly vp on hie being vnmindful of our owne small measure, so much more the brightnesse of the heauenly glory overwhelme vs. We feel also howe the vnmearable gredinesse to knowe more than is lawfull, tickleth vs: from whence both trifling & hurtfull questions do spring from time to time: trifling I call those of which there can no profit be gathered. But this seconde kinde is worse, because they which giue themselfes to them, do entangle themselfes with pernicious speculations, and therefore I call them hurtfull. Thait which the Scriptures doe teach, ought to be out of all dout with vs: namely that as God diueryly distributing his gifts to the Saints in this worlde, doeth unequally enlighten them, so the measure of glory shall not be equal in heauen where God shall crowne his gifts. For neither doth this belong indifferently to all which Paul faith, Ye are my glorie and crowne in the day of Christ: nor also that saying of Christ to the Apostles: Ye shall sit judging the twelve tribes of Israel. But Paul (which knew that as God enricheth the holy ones with spiritual gifts in earth, so hee beautifieth them with glorie in heauen) dooth not that there is a peculiar crowne layde vp for him according to the rate of his labours. And Christ to fet foorth to the Apostles the digniti of the office which they did beare, telleth them that the fruite thereof is layde vp for them in heauen. So Daniel also sayeth, But the wise shall shine as the brightnesse of the firmament, and they which justifie many, as Starres to the worldes ende and for ever. And if a man heedfully consider the Scriptures, they doe not onely promise eternall life to the faithful, but also speciall warrds to every one. Whereupon commeth that saying of Paul, The Lorde render to him in that day. Which the promie of Christ confirmeth, Ye shall receive a hundred folde in the eternall life. Finally, as Christ beginneth in this worlde the glorie of his body with manifold diuerse gifts, and encreaseth it by degrees: so he shall also make it perfect in heauen.

But as all the godly will receive this with one consent, because it is sufficiently testified by the worde of God: fo on the other side leaving crabbed questions, which they shall know to be a hinderance to them, they will not passe their appointed boundes. As for my part, I do not onely privately forbearke superfluous searching of unprofitable things, but I also thinke that I ought to beware that I do not with answeraing nourish the lightnesse of other. Men hungrie of vaine knowledge do ask howe great shall be the distinct betweene the Prophetes and the Apostles, and againe betweene the Apostles and the Martyrs: howe many degrees Virgines differ from married folkes: finally, they leave no corner of heauen unsearched. Then it commeth in their mindes to enquire to what purpose serveth the repairinge of this

this so great and incomparable plenty: but shalbe like to the Angels, whose not eating is a signe of the eternall blessednesse. But I answere that in the very sight there shalbe so great pleasantnesse, so great sweetnesse in the onely knowledge without any vse, that this felicitie shall farre passe all the helps wherewith we be now holpen. Let vs imagine our felues to be sette in the most wealthie coast of the worlde, and where we shal want no pleasure: yet who is there whom his fickenesse do not sometime hinder and not suffer to vse the benefits of God? Who is there whose course his owne intemperance doth not oft brake in sunder? Whereupon followeth that a cleare enjoying and pure from all faults, although there be no vse of corruptible life, is the perfection of felicitie. Some go further & ask whether drosses and other corruptions in mettals, be not farre from restoring and are contrarie to it. Which though in some respectes I grant them, yet I looke with Paul for the repairing of these faults which tooke their beginning at sinne, towards which repaying they grone and are in travaile. Yet they proceeve further, and ask what better estate is prepared for man, & the blessing of issue shall then be at an ende. This knot is also easie to bee loosed. Whereas the Scripture so honorably setteth out that kind of blessing, that is referred to the encreses wherewith God continually draweth forwarde the order of nature her marke: but in the perfection it is knowned that there is an other manner. But sith the vnware are easilly taken with allurements, and then the maze draweth them in depliier, & at length when evry mans deuises please himselfe there is no end of striving; therefore let this be a short way for vs, to bee contented with the glasse & darke speech untill we shall see face to face. For fewe of a great multitude care which way they may go to heauen: but all do before their time couet to knowe what is done there. All being commonly sluggish and slowe to enter into battailes, do already paint out to themselues imagined triumphes.

Nowe because no description can match the grievousnesse of the vengeance of God upon the reprobate, their tormentes and paines are figured to vs by bodily things, namely by darkeness, weeping, gnathing of teeth, unquenchable fier, and a worme endlessely gnawing the hearte. For by such manners of speech it is certaine that the holy Ghost meant to trouble our fancies with horror: as when it is sayde that there is prepared from eternitie a deepe Hell, that the nourishments thereof are fire and muche woode: that the blast of the Lorde, as a streame of brimstone, doeth set it on fire. As by such thinges wee must be holpen after a certaine manner to conceive the miserable state of the wicked, so we ought cheefely to fasten our thought vpon this howe wretched a thing it is to be estranged from the fellowship of God: and not that onely, but also to feele the majestie of God so bent against thee, that thou canst not escape but be fast straine of it. For first his displeasure is like a most violent fire, with touching whereof all things are devoured and swalowed vp. Then, all creatures for ferue him to execute his judgement, that they to whom he the Lorde shall so shewe his wrath, shal feele the heauen, earth, sea, & beastes, as it were with cruell indignation enflamed against them and armed to their destruction. Wherefore it is no small thing that the Apostle pronounceth when he faith that the unbelieving shall suffer eternall punishment by dying from the face of the Lorde, & from the glorie of his power. And so oft as the Prophete doe cast vs in feare with bodily figures, although they speake nothing exceptfully for our dulleffe, yet they add adewtewings of the judgement to come, in the sunne and the moone and the whole frame of the world. Wherefore the vnhappy con-

cinde, from feeling themselues to be torne in peeces by God being angerly bent against them, from being pearced and launced with deadly stings, from trembling at the lightning of God, and being brooded with the weight of his liande: so that it is much more easie to enter into all bottomlesse depths and denouing pittes, than to stand one moment in those terrours. What & how great then is this, to be pressed with everlasting and never ceasing siege of him? Of which thing the 90. Pfalme containeth a notable sentence: that although with only sight he scatter abroad all mortall men and bring them to nought, yet his worshippers, how much more searefull they are in the world, so much more he enforce them and pricke them forward laden with the crosse, untill he be all in all.

THE FOURS TH BOOKE

OF THE INSTITUTION OF

CHRISTIAN RELIGION,

which intreateth of the outward meanes or helps, whereby God allureth vs into the fellowship of Christ and holdeth vs therein.

The first Chapter.

Of the true Church with which we ought to keepe untie, because it is the mother of all the godly.

Hat by Faith of the Gospel Christ is become ours, and we be made partakers of the fluation brought by him and of eternal blessednes is already declared in y last booke. But because our rudenes, & flouthefulness, yea and vanity of wit, doe need outward helps whereas Faith in vs may may both be engen-dred, and growe & encrase in proceeding toward the mark wherunto it tendeth: God hath also added the therby to provide for our weaknes. And y the Preaching of the Gospel might florith, he hath left this treasure with y Church. He hath appointed Psalmes & teachers, by whose mouth he might teach them y be his: he hath furnished the with auorty, finally he hath left nothing undone that might averse to the holy consent of faith and right order. First of all he hath ordained Sacramentes, which we feele by experience to be more than profitable helps to nourish & conforme Faith. For because beeing enclosed in the prison of our flesh, wee doe not yet attaine to the degree of Angels, God applying himself to our capacity according to his wonderfull wonderfull Prudience, hath appointed a meane whereby we being farre distant from him might come vnto him. Wherefore the order of teaching requireth that now we entreate of the Church, and of the government, orders and power of it, and then of the Sacraments, and lastly of the civil order: & therewithall that we call away the godly reads from those corruptions where with Satan in the Pappacie hath depraved all things that God hath appointed for our salvation. I will beginne at the Church, into whose bosome God will haue his children to be gathered together, not onely that they should by her helpe and ministerie be nourished while they are infants and young children, but also be ruled by her motherly care till they growe to riper age, and at length come to the marke of faith. For it is not lawfull that those things be seuered which God hath conioyned, that to whom hee is a Father, the Church be also their mother: and that not onely vnnder the lawe, but also since the comming of Christ, as Paul witnesseth, which teacheth that we are the children of the new and heavenly Hierusalem,

2. In the Creede, where we professe that we beleue the Church, that is not spoken onely of the visible Church whose we now entreate, but of all the elect of God, in whose number they are also comprehended that are departed by death. And therefore this word Belcleeue is there set, because oftentimes there can no other difference bee noted betweene the children of God and the vngodly, betweene his peculiar flocke and fawge beasts. For whereas many doe interlace this word, in, that is without probable reason, I graunt indeed that it is the more commonly vued, and also wanteth not the consenting testimonie of antiquity, forasmuch as euuen the Nicen Creed, as it is reported in the Ecclesiastical historie, addeth the preposition, in. But there withall wee may marke by the writings of the ancient Fathers, that it was received without controversy to say, that they beleued the Church and not in the Church. For Augustine, and that ancient writer, whatsoever he was, whose work remayneth vnnder the name of Cyprian concerning the exposition of the Creede, doe not onely so speake themselves, but also doe expressly note that it shoulde be an vnproper manner of speaking if the preposition were addyned, & they confirme their opinion with no trilling reason. For we therefore testifie that wee beleue in God because vpon him as a true speaker our mind repeth it selfe, and in him our confidence refeth which could not so conveniently be spoken to saye in the Church no more than it could be saide, I beleue in the forgiveness of sines, or in the resurrection of the flesh. Therefore although I would not untrue about words, yet I had rather followe the proprie of speaking that shoulde be fittest to express the matter, than curiously to seeke for formes of speach whereby the matter may without caufe be darkened. But the end is, & we should know that although the devil attempt al meanes to overthrow the grace of Christ, and though the enemies of God be carried with violent rage to the same intent, yet it cannot be extinguished, nor the bloode of Christ be made barren, but that it will bring forth some fruitle. And so is both the secrete election of G. O. D and his inwarde calling to bee considered: because hee alone knoweth who bee his, and holdeth them inclosed vnnder a seale as Paul tearmeth it: saying that they beare his tokens whereby they may bee Ephe.1.13.

feuerely known from the reproubates. But because a small and contemptible number lieth hid under a huge multitude, and a few grains of wheate are couered with a heape of chaffe, to God onely is to be lefte the knowledge of his Church, the foundation whereof is his secrete election. But it is not sufficient to conceiue in thought and minde the multitude of the electe, vnlesse we thinke vpon such an vnitie of the Church into which wee be truely perswaded that we our felues be ingraffed. For vnlesse we be vnder our head Christ vnited together with all the rest of his members, there abideth for vs no hope of inheritance to come. It is therefore called Catholike or Vniversal, because we cannot find two or three Churches but that Christ must bee torn in sunder, which cannot be done. But all the elect of God are so knit together in Christ, that as they hang vpon one heade, so they may growe together as it were into one bodie, cleaung together with such a compacting of ioyntes as the members of one selue body: being truely made one, which with one hope, Faith, Charitie, with one selue Spirit of God doe live together, being called not onely into one inheritance of eternall life, but also into one partaking of one God and Christ. Wherefore although the sorrowfull desolation that on eche side presenteth it selue in sight, crieth out that there is nothing left of the Church, yet let vs knowe that Christes death is fruiteful and that God manuellously as it were in secrete corners preferueth his Church. As it was said to Elias, I haue kept to my selue seuen thousand men that haue bowed their knee before Baal.

Which parcell, although commonly the olde writers doe leave it out, yet is it not to bee neglected: because it verie well expresseth the qualitie of the Church: as if it had beene sayde that the Saintes are gathered together into the fellowship of Christ with this condition, that whatsoeuer beneficeth God beftoweth vpon them, they shoulde continuallie comminicate therewith to an other. Whereby yet the diversitie of graces is not taken away, as we know that the gifts of the holy Ghost are diuerflly distributed: neither is the order of civil governement disturbed, by which it is lawfull for every man privately to enjoy his owne possession, as it is necessary, that for preseruation of peace among men, they shoulde have among themselues peculiar and diuided properties of things. But there is a communitee affirmed such as Luke describeth of the multitude of these believers there was one hart & one soule: & Paul, when he exhorrith the Ephesians to be one body, one Spirit, as they be called in one hope. For it is not possible, if they be truly perswaded God is the common father, & Christ the common head to the al, but being conjoined among the felipes with brotherly loue, they shoulde continually communicate those things that they haue. Nowe it much behoueth vs to know what profite thereupon returneth vnto vs. For wee beleue the Church to this ende, that wee may be certainly perswaded that wee are the members of it. For by this meanes our salvation resteth vpon sure found steues, that that it, although the whole frame of the world be shaken, can not come to ruine and fall downe. First it standeth with goddes election, neither can it vary or faile but together with his eternall Providence. Then, it is after a certaine manner joyned with the stedfaftneffe of Chrifl, which will no more suffer his faithfull to be plucked from him, than his owne members to be rent and torne in pceces. Besides that, we are assured that truthe shal alway abide with vs, fo long as we are holden in the bofome of the Church. Last of all that we feele that these promises belong to vs, there shalbe saluation in Syon, God shall for euer abide in Hierusalem, that it may not at any time be moved. So much can the partaking of the Church doe, that it holdeth vs in the fellow-hippe of God. Also in the very worde Communion is much comforte: because while it remaineth cermine, that whatsoever the Lorde giueth to his and our members, belongeth to vs, our hope is by all their good things confirmed. But in such sort to embrace the vnitie of the Church, it is not needful, as we haue already sayde) to see the Church it selfe with our eyes, or feele it with our handes: but rather by this that it confifteth in Faith, we are admonished, that wee ought no leffe to thinke it to bee, when it paffeth our understanding, than if it openly appeared. Neither is our faith therefore the worse, because it conceiueth it vnknownen: for as much as wee are not herein, commanded to This or that to the reprobate from the elect (which is the office of God onely, and not oures) but to determine assuredly in our minds, that all they that by the mercifull kindenesse of God the father through the effectuall workinge of the holy Ghoste, are come into the partaking of Chrifl, are seuered into the peculiar right and proper possession of Chrifl: and that, for as much as we bee in the number of those, wee are partakers of so great a grace.

4 But sith it is now our purpose to entreat of the visible Church, let vs learne euyn by this one title of Mother, how much the knowledge thereof is profitable, yea necessary for vs: for as much as ther is no other entry into life, vnlesse the conceiue vs in her wombe, vnlesse the bringinge vs forth, vnlesse the feedinge vs with her breastes, finally vnlesse the keepe vs under vs, in custody and governaunce, vntill such time as being vnclotted of mortall flesh we shalbe like unto Angels. For our weakenesse suffereth vs not to be dissimulated from schoole, till we have beene scholers throughout the whole course of our life. Besides that out of her bosome there is no forgivenes of sinnes, and no saluation to be hoped for, as witnesseth Ezechiel and Joel, with whom agreeeth Ezechiel when he declareth they shal not be in the number of Gods people whom he putteth away from the heavenly life. As on the contrary side, they are sayd to write their names among the citizens of Hierusalem, y turne themselves to the followinge of true godlinesse. After which manner it is also sayd in an other Psalm: Remember me, Lorde, in the good will of thy people: visite me in thy saluation that I may fee the benefites of thy elect, that I may bee merry in the mirth of thy people, that I may reioyce with thy inheritance. In which words the fatherly favoure of God, & the peculiar testimonie of the Spiritual life is restrained to his flockes, so ye the departing from the Church is alway damnable.

5 But let vs proceed to prosecute that which properly belongeth to this place,
Eph. 4,11. Paul writeth that Christ, that he might fulfill all things, gave some Apostles, some Prophets, some Evangelists, and some Pastors and teachers, to the restoring of the holy ones, into the works of ministry, unto the edification of the body of Christ, until we all come into the unity of Faith, and of the acknowledging of the sonne of God, unto a perfect man, and to the measure of the full grown age of Christ. We see howe God, which was able to make them that be his perfect in a moment, yet will not have them growe into manly age but by the bringing vp of the Church. We see the meaning, for that vnto the Pastors is enjoyned the preaching of the heavenly doctrine. We see howe all, not one excepted, are brought into one rule, that they shoulde with mild Spiritue and willing to learn, yeeld themselves to the teachers appointed for that vse. And by this marke Esay had long before set out the kingdom of Christ, where hee sayeth: My Spiritue which is in thee, and the words that I haue put in thy mouth shall never departe, neither out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seede and thy childrens children. Whereupon followeth that they are worthie to persifie with famine and pining hunger, whosoeuer they be that refuse the Spirituall meate of the soule reached vnto them of God by the handes of the Church. GOD doeth breath faith into vs, but by the instrument of his Gospell, as Paul sayeth that faith is by hearing. As also with God remaineth his power to save, but (as the same Paul witteth) he vttreth and displayeth the fame in the preaching of the Gospell. For this reason in olde time he willed that there should be made holy assemblies to the sanctuarie, that doctrine vttreth by the mouth of the Priest should nourish the consent of faith. And to no other ende those glorious titles haue respect, where the temple is called the rest of God, and the sanctuarie his house, where he is sayde to sit betweene the Cherubines, but to bring estimation, love, reverence and dignitie to the ministerie of the heavenly doctrine, which otherwise the sight of a mortall and despised man would not a little diminish. Therefore that we should knowe, that out of earthen vessels is brought forthe vnto vs inestimable treasure, God himselfe commeth forth, and in as much as he is author of this degree, so he will have himselfe to be acknowledged present in his institution. Therefore after that he hath forbidden his to give themselves to judgement by flying of birds, to south sayings, magical artes, necromancy and other superstitions, he immediately addeth that hee will give them that which ought to suffice in stead of all, that is to say, that they shall never be defitute of Prophete. But like as he sent not the olde people to Angels, but raised vp teachers out of the earth, which might truely performe the office of Angels: so at this day also his will is to teach vs by men. And as in the olde time hee was not contente with the onely lawe, but added Priestes for expostors, at whose lippes the people should enquire for the true meaning thereof: so at this day he not only willeth vs to be heedfully bent to reading, but also appointeth maistres oute vs, by whose travaile we may be holpen: whereof commeth double profitte. For on the one part by a very good triall it proueth our obedience, where we heare his ministers speaking even as it were himselfe. On the other side it also provideth for our weakenesse, while after the manner of mene he hadde rather speake vnto vnto vs by interpreters to allure vs vnto him, than with thudding driue vs away from him. And truely howe expedient this familiar manner of teaching is for vs, all the goodly doe seele by the scare wherwith the maiefic of God doth worthily astonish them. But they that thinke that the authoritie of the doctrine is abaced by the conquest of the men that are called to teach, doe bewray their vnthankfulness: because among so manie excellent gifts wherewith God hath garnished mankinde: this is a singular prerogative, that he vouchfaeth to consecrate the mouthes and tongues of men to himselfe, that his owne voice should be sounded in them. Wherefore on our behalues let vs not bee grieved obediently to embrace the doctrine of salvation set forth by his commandement and by his owne mouth: because although the power of God is not bound to outwarde meanes, yet he hath bounde vs to the ordinarie maner of teaching: which whyle phrentike men refuse to kepe, they wrapppe themselves in many deadly snares. Either pride, or disdainfulness, or enuie moueth many to perswade themselves that they can sufficietly profite by their owne private reading and studie, and so to despise publike assemblies, and to accompte preaching fuberious. But fith they doe as much as in them is loose or breake in fonder the holy bonde of vnitie, no man escapeth the due punishment of this divorce, but hee bewitcheth himselfe with pestilent errors and most wicked dotages. Wherefore, that the pure simplicitie of faith may flourish among vs, let vs not be grieved to vs this exercise of godlinesse, which God by his institution hath shewed to be necessarie for vs and to earnestly commendeth. But there was never yet found any even of the most wonton dogges which would say that we ought to stoppe our ears against God: But in all ages the Prophets and godlie teachers have had a harde strife against the wicked, whose stubbornesse can never come under this yoke, to be taught by the mouth of the ministerie of men. Which is as much as to blotte out the face of God which shineth vnto vs in doctrine.

For in olde time the faithfull were commanded to seeke the face of God in the Santuarie, and the same is so ofte repeated in the lawe for no other cau[e] but for the doctrine of the law and the exhortations of the Prophets were to them a liuely image of God: as Paul affirneth that in his preaching shineth the glory of God in the face of Christ. Howe much the more detestable are the Apostates, which greedily seeke to deuide Churches, as though they did drue sheepe from their foldes and cast them into the mouthes of wolves. But we must holde that which he hath alledged out of Paul, that the Church is no otherwife builded but by outwarde preaching, and that the holy ones are holden together with no other bonde but when with learning and profiting with one consent they keepe the order appoynted by God to the Church. To this ende principally, as I have saide, the faithfull in olde time vnder the lawe were commanded to resorte to the santuarie. Because when Moses speakeoth of the dwelling place of God, hee doeth therewithall call it the place of name, where God hath set the memorie of his name. Whereby he plainly teacheth that without the doctrine of godlinesse there is no vse thereof. And it is not doubeful but that for the same reason Davuid with great bitternesse of Spirite complayneth that hee is by the tyrannous crueltie of his enemies kepte from envying into the Tabernacle. It seemeth commonly to many a childish lamentation, because it should be but a very small house, and also no great pleasure should be gone thereby, to want the entrie of the temple, so that there were enough of other delightful things. But he bewayled this one green, anguish and sorrow, he is fretted and vexed and in a manner wasted. For nothing is of greater estimation with the faithful than this helpe whereby God by degrees lifteth vp his on his. For this is also to be noted, that God in the mirror of his doctrine alwaies shewed himself to the holy Fathers, but the knowledge was spiritual. Wherefore the temple is called not onely his house, but also (to take away all superstition) his footstool. And this is that happy meeting into vntrie of faith, while from the highest even to the lowest all do aspire to the head. All the temples that ever the gentiles upon any other purpose builded to God, were but a mere prophaneing of his worship: whereunto though not with like grossenesse, yet somewhat the Jews fell. Whereof Stephen out of the mouth of Eliy reprocheth them where hee faith, that God dwelleth not in temples made with handes. Because onely God doeth by his word sanctifie to himselfe temples to the lawfull vs. And if we rashly attempt any thing without his commandement, by and by to an euill beginning do cleave new deuises by which the euil is spread abroad without measure. Yet Xerxes, when by the counsell of the Magicians hee burned vp or plucked downe all the temples of Greece, vnsecretly faile, that the gods to whom all things ought to be freely open were inclosed within walls and tiles. As though it were not in the power of God, to the entente he might bee neere vs, after a certaine manner to descende vnto vs, and yet neither to change place, nor to fasten vs to earthly meanes: but rather by certaine chariots to carrie vs vp to his heavenly glory; which with the inmeasurable greatness thereof filleth all things, yea and in height surmounteth the heavenes.

6 Nowe forasmuch as at this time there hath beene great strife about the effectualnesse of the ministerie, whyle some excessively amplifie the dignitie thereof; and some other affirm that that which is properly belonging to the holy Ghost is wrongfully giuen away to mortall man, if wee thinke that ministers and teachers do perce to the minde and heartes, to amend as well the blindness of the minde as the hardnesse of heartes: it is meete that we give a right determination of this controversie. All that they contend on both partes that easilye be accorded by expressly noting the places where God the author of preaching joyning his spirituifermitas thereosor again, when feuring himselfe from outward helps he challenged to himselfe alone as wel the beginnings of faith as the whole course thereof. It was the office of the seconde Elias (as Malachi winneffeth) to enlighten the minde, and to wine the heartes of Fathers to the children, and vnbelieuers to the wisdome of the righteous. Christ pronounced that hee sendeth the Apostles, that they should bring fruite of their labor. But what that fruite is Peter shortlye defineth, saying that wee be regenerate with incorruptible feede. And therefore Paul glorifieth that hee by the Gospell begat the Corinthians, and that they were the seale of his Apostleshippe: yea that hee was not a literall minister, such as did onely beate the eares with with sound of voice, but that there was given him an effectual office of Spirit, that his doctrine should not be unprofitable. In which meaning also in another place he saith, that his Gospel was not in words only, but in power. He affirmeth also that the Galatians by hearing receiv'd the Spirit of truth. Finally in many places he maketh himself not only a worker together with God, but also assigneth himself the office of giving salvation. Truely he never brought forth all these things to this extent to glue unto himself any thing were it neuer so little severally from God: as in another place he shortly declareth, saying, our labour was not unprofitable in the Lord, according to his power mightily working in me. Againe in another place, he that was mightie in Peter toward the circumcision, was also mightie in me towards the Gentiles. But how he leaueth nothing severally to the ministers, appeareth by other places, as he that planteth is nothing, and he that watereth is nothing, but God that giveth the encrease. Againe: I have laboured more than all: not I, but the grace of God that was with me. And truely we must holde fast those sayinges, where God ascribing to himself the enlightening of the mind, and the renewing of the heart, teacheth that it is a robbere of God if man take upon himself any parte of either of them, in the meane time if any man offer himselfe to the ministers whom God ordaineth, willing to learne, he shall knowe by the fruit, that this maner of teaching not in vaine pleased God, and that this yoke of modestie was not in vaine layde upon the faithfull.

7 But as for the Church visible and which is within the compass of our knowledge, what judgement is meete to be giuen thereof, I thinke it alreadie appeareth evidently by that which we have before saide. For we have saied, that the holy Scripture speakeoth of the Church after two sortes. Sometime, when it nameth the Church, it meaneth that Church which is in deed before God, into which none are receiued but they that are both by grace of adoption the children of God, and by sanctification of the Spirit the true members of Christ. And then truely it comprehended not only the holy ones that dwell in earth, but also all the elect that have beene since the beginning of the worlde. But oftentimes under the name of the Church it signifieth the vniverall multitude of men scattered abrode in the world, which professeth that they worship one God and Christ, by Baptisme enter into his faith, by partaking of the supper testifie their vnitie in true doctrine & charitie, have an agreement in the worde of the Lord, and for the preaching thereof to keepe the ministerie ordain'd by Christ. In this Church there be manie hypocrites which have nothing of Christ but the name and outwarme thereof: there be many ambitious, covetous, envious, euill speakers, some of vncreane life: which be suffi'd for a time, either because they cannot by lawfull order of judgement be convinced, or because there is not alway in vre that severitie of discipline that ought to be. Therefore as wee must needes beleue that the Church which is vnsummerable, is to be seene with the eyes of G O D: onely: so are wee commended to regard this Church which is called a Church in respect of men, and to keepe the communion of it.

8 Therefore so much as behooved vs to knowe it, the Lord hath set it out by certaine markes and as it were signes vnto vs. This is indeede the singular prerogatitue of God himselfe, to knowe who be his, as wee have already alleaged out of Paul. And truely that the rashness of men shoule not crepe fo farre; it is proued, by the very sucesse of thinges dayly put-ing vs in minde, howe farre his secret judgements do surmount our unverstanding. For even they that seemed most desperate, and accounted vter-ly past hope, are by his goodnesse called backe into the way: and they that semed to stand fast in comparison of other, do oftentimes fall. Therefore according to the secret predestination of God (as Augustine sayeth) there be many sheepe without, and many weules within. For he knoweth them, and hath them marked that knowe neither him nor themselves. But of those that openly bare his badge, his onely eyes doe see who be both holy without faining, and who will continue euen to the ende, which is the very chief point of saluation. Yet on the other side, forasmuch as hee forefaw it to be somedale expedient, that we should knowe who were to bee accounted his children, he hath in this part applied himselfe to our capacitie. And because the certaintie of faith was not necessarie, he hath put in place thereof a certaine judgement of charitie: whereby we should acknowledge for members of the Church those that both with confession of faith, and with example of life, and with partaking of sacramentes, doe profess the same God and Christ with vs. But as for the knowledge of the body thereof, howe much more that he knewe it to be necessarie for our saluation, with so much the more certaine markes he hath set it out.

9 Loe hereupon groweth & ariseth vnto vs, a face of the Church visible to our eyes. For wheresoeuer we see the word of God to be purely preached and heard, and the sacraments to be minisitred according to the institution of Christ, there it is in no wise to be doubted that there is som church of God; forasmuch as his promise can not deceiue. Wheresoeuer two or thre are gathered together in my name, there I am in the middes of them. But y we may euidently understand the summe of this matter, we must proceede by these as it were degrees: that is to say, the universall Church is a multitude gathered together out of all nations wheresoever they be, which being sundered & senceullly scattered by distances of places, yet doth agree in one truth of godly doctrine, & is bound together with the bondage of one self religion: And that we under this are comprehended all particular Churches, which are in all townes & streetes according to the order of mens necessitie, so that every one of them may rightfully have the name & authoritie of a Church: And that all particular men which by profession of godlines are reckoned among such Churches, although they be in deede strangers from the Church, yet do after a certaine manner belong vnto it, til by publicke judgment they be banished out of it. Howbeit there is somewhat a divers maner in judging of private men and of Churches. For it may fall in experience, that such men as we fhall thinke not to bee altogether worthie of the company of the godly, yet we must vfe like brethren, & account the among the faithfull, for the common consent of the Church, whereby they are fur-fared and borne withall in the bodie of Christ. Wee do not by our testimonie allow such to be members of the Church: but wee leue them the place that they have among the people of God, till it be by orderly right of Lawe taken away from them. But of the verie multitude wee must otherwise think, which if not hath and honoreth the ministerie of the Word, & the administration of Sacraments, it is deceitfull without doubt to bee esteemed and judged a Church; because it is certaine that those things are not without fruite. So we doe also preferue to the vnersall Church her vnitie, which duellish spirits have alwaye travailed to cut in sunder: neither do wee destrauze of their authority those lawfull assemblies which are disposed according to the fitnesse of places.

10 We haue set for signes to discerne the Church by, the preaching of the Word, and the obseruing of the Sacraments. For those can be no where but they must bring forth fruite, and bee proopered with the blessing of God. I do not say, that wherefoever the word is preached, there by and by springeth vp fruite; but I say that now where it is reccievéd and hath a stayed seate, but that it bringeth forth the effectuallitie thereof. Where the preaching of the Gospell is reuerently heard, and the Sacramentes are not neglected, howsoever it be, there for that time appeareth a not deceitfull and not doutfull face of the Church, whereof no man may unpunished either despise the authoritie, or refuse the admonitions, or refieth counsels, or mocke at the corrections: much leffe to departe from it, and to brake in sunder the vnitie of it. For the Lorde doth biely esteemeth the Communion of his Church, that he counteth him for a traiterous runaway and forswacker of Religion, whosoever shall stubbornely estrange himselfe from any Chriftian fellowship, so that it bee such a one as hath the true ministerie of the Word and Sacramentes. He doth commendeth the Churches authoritie, that when it is violate, he judgeth his owne diminished. Neither is it of small importance, that the Church is called the piller and strong stay of truth and the house of God. By which words Paul signifieth, that to the end the truth of God shoulde not decay in the world, the Church is a faithful keeper thereof, because Gods will was to have the preaching of his word kept pure and to shew himselfe vnto vs a father of our holde by her ministerie and labour, while shee feedeth vs with spiruittall nourishmentes, and procureth all things that make for our salvation. It is also no slender praise, that it is saide that shee is chosen and suuered by Christ to be his spouse, that shoulde be without wrinkle and spot, the body and fulnesse of him. Wherupon followeth, that departing from the Church is a denying of God & of Christ. Therefore so much the more wee must beware of so wicked disagreement. For while wee go about, so much as in vs lieth, to procure the ruine of Gods truth, wee are worthy that hee shoulde sende downe his lightning with the whole violent force of his wrath to destroy vs. Neither can there be imagined any fault more hainous, than with wicked breach of faith to defile the marriage that the onely begotten Sonne of God hath vouchsafed to contract with vs.

11 Wherefore let vs diligently keepe these markes emplainted in our minde, and let vs estimate them according to the Lorde's will. For there is nothing that Satan more endelouseth than to take away and abolish one of these, or both: sometime that when these markes are raised and blotted our, he may take away the true and natural distinction of the Church: sometime that when they are brought in contempt, he may with open falling away plucke vs from the Church. By his craft it is brought about, that in certaine ages past, the pure preaching of the worde hath vanished away: and nowe he doth with as great importunacie trayaille to overthrow the ministerie, which yet Christ hath so established in the Church, that when it is taken away, the edification of the Church perisheth. But nowe, howe daungerous, yea howe deadly a tentation is it when it doth but come in our minde to depart from that congregation, wherein are seene the signes & tokens by which the Lorde thought his Church sufficiently described: We see how great heed is to be taken on both sides. For, that we should not be deceived under the title of the Church, every congregation that pretendeth the name of the Church must be examined by that maner of trial, as by a touchstone. If it haue in the word and Sacraments the order appointed by the Lord, it will not deceive vs: let vs boldly yelde vs to the honour due to Churches. But contrariwise if it boast itselfe without the worde and Sacraments, wee must no lesse with fearfull conscience beware of such deceites, than on the other side we must flee rashnesse and pride.

Where as wee say that the pure ministerie of the worde & the pure vsage in celebrating the Sacraments, is a sufficient pledge & earnest, so that we may safely embrace as the Church any fellowship wherein both these shalte: this extendeth so farre, that it is never to be call of, so long as it shall continue in those, although it swarme full of many other faultes. Yea & there may some faultineffe creep into it, in the administration either of doctrine, or of the Sacraments, which ought not to estrange us from the Communio of it. For all the articles of true doctrine be not of one fort. Some be so necessarie to be knowne, that they ought to be certaine and vndouted to all men, as the proper principles of Religion: of which fort are, That there is one GOD. That Christ is God, and the Sonne of God: that our salvation consisteth in the mercie of God: and such like. There bee other that being in controversie betwene Churches, yet doe not break the unity of faith. For those Churches that disagree about this one point, if without luft of contention, without stubbornnesse of affirming, the one thinke that foules when they departe from the bodies doe flee vp into heaven, and the other Church dare determine nothing of the place, yet yet certainly holdeth that they live to the Lorde. The worldes of the Apostle are: Let all vs that bee perfect thinke all one thing: but if ye thinke any thing otherwise, this the Lorde shall also reuile vs to you. Doeth he not sufficiently shewe that diversitie of opinions about these matters, that bee not so necessarie, ought to bee no grounde of disa greement among Christians? It is in deed a principal point, that wee agree in all things. But for as much as there is no man that is not wrapped with some little close of ignorance: either wee must leave no Church at all, or we must pardon a beeing deceived in such things as may be unknowen without violating the summe of religion, and without losse of salvation. But I meane nor here to defend any errors be they never so little, so as I would thinke that they shoulde bee cherished with flattering and winking at them: but I say that wee ought not rashly rashly for every light dissension for sake the Church, in which at least that Doctrine is receiv'd safe & uncorrupted, wherein standeth the sateic of god- lines, and the use of Sacraments is kept as it was institute by the Lord. In y meane time if we endeavouer to amend that which displeaseth vs, we do ther- in according to our dutie. And hereunto belongeth that saying of Paul: If any thing better be revealed to him that setteth, let the first hold his peace.

Whereby it is evident, that all the members of the Church are every one charged with endeavouer to publike edification, according to the measure of his grace, so that it be done comely and according to order: that is, that wee neither do forfeake the communion of the Church, nor abiding in it, do trouble the peace & well ordered discipline thereof.

13 But in bearing with the imperfection of life, our gentle tenderneffe ought to go much further. For herein is a very sliperie easinesse to fall: and herein with no small deuises doth Satan lay waye for vs. For there have ben alwaye some, which filled with false perisuation of perfect holinesse as though they were alreadie made certaine airy spirits, defpised the company of all men, in whom they sawe remaining any thing of the nature of man. Such in olde time were the Cathary, and they that were as mad as they, the Donatistes. Such at this day are some of the Anabaptistes, which would seeme to haue profited aboue the rest. Some there be that offende more by an vn- discrete zeale of righteousneffe, than by that mad pride. For when they fee among them to whome the Gospel is preached, the fruite of life not agreably answearing to the doctrine thereof, they by and by judge that there is no Church. It is in decea a most iuft displeasure, and such a one whereunto in this most miserable age of the world, wee giue too much occasion.

Neither may we excuse our accursed slothfulnesse, which the Lord will not suffer unpunished: as euen alreadie he beginneth with grievous scourses to chastifie it. Wo therefore to vs, which with so dissolute licentiousnes of wicked dooings, make that weake conscience be wounded by reason of vs. But in this againe they offende whom I have spok'd of, because they cannot measure their being displeased. For where Lord requireth clemé- cie, they leaving it, do giue themselves wholly to immeasurable rigoroufnes. For, because they thinke there is no Church where there is no found pure- neffe & vprighteneffe of life, for hatred of sinnes they depart from the lawful Church, while they thinke that they swarue from a company of wicked men. They alllege that the Church of Chrift is holy. But that they may alfo vnderstande that it is mingled of good & euill men, let them heare this parable out of the mouth of Chrift, wherein it is compared to a nette, in which fishes of all kinde are gathered together: and are not chosen out till they be laide abroade vpon the shoare. Let them heare that it is like vnto a corne field, which being sowed with good graine, is by the enimies fraude scattered with tares, of which it is not cleaned vntill the cropp be brought into the barren floore. Finally, let them heare that it is like vnto a floore, wherein the wheat is so gathered together, that it lieth hidden un- der the chaffe, till being cleansed with fanne and by it be at length laide vp in the grainer. If the Lord pronounce that the Church shall euen to the day of Judgement bee troubled with this euill, to bee burdened with

14. But they cry out that it is an intollerable thing, that the pestilence of vices do rangeth abroad. What if the laying of the Apostle do here alfo aunswer their? Among the Corinthians not onely a feue had gone out of the way, but the infectious had in a manner possessed the whole body: there was not onely one kind of sinne, but many: neither were they light offences, but certaine horrible outrageous doings: it was not onely corruption of manners, but also of doctrine. What in this case faith the holy Apostle, that is to say, the instrument of the Holy Ghost, by whose testimonie Church standeth and faileth? Docth he require a diuision from them? Docth he banish them out of the kingdom of Christ? Dooth he strike them with the extreme thunders of curse? Hee not only doth none of all these things: but he both acknowledgeth and reporteth it a Church of Christ & fellowship of saints. If there remain: a Church among the Corinthians, where contentions, feetes, and enmious partakings do broyle: where quarelis & brawlings be in vre, with a greediness of hauing, where that wicked dooing is openly allowed, which were abominable among the very Gentiles: where Pauls name is vnjustly railed at, whom they ought to have honoured as their father: where some commence at the resurreccion of the dead, with nine whereof the whole Gospel falleth: where the gracious gifts of God are use to ambition, and not to charitie: where many things are vncomely and vn-orderly done: and if therefore there still remain a Church, because the ministrye of the worde and of the Sacramentes is not refused, who dare take away the name of the Church from them that cannot be charged with the tenth parte of these faultes? They that with so great preciseness deal so cruelly against the Churches of this present time: what(I pray you) would they have done to the Galathians, which were almost vnter forakers of the Gospel, among whom yet the same Apostle found Churches?

15. They obiect also, howe that Paul grievously rebuketh the Corinthians for suffering in their company a man that was a hainous sinner, and then he setteth a generall sentence wherein he pronounceth, that it is unlawfull even to eate bread with a man of reprochfull life. Here they cry out: If it be not lawfull to eate common bread, howe may it be lawfull to eate with them the bread of the Lorde? I confesse in deede that it is a great dishonour, if hoggis and dogges have place among the children of God: it is also a much more dishonour if the holy body of Christ be giuen foorth to them. And truly if they bee well ordered Churches, they will not suffer wicked men in their bofoome, and will not without choice admitte both worthie and unworthie togethers to that holy bancker. But forasmuch as the Pastours doe not alway so diligently watche, yea and sometimmes are more tender in behaing with men than they ought to bee, or are hindered so that they can not vfe that seueritie that they would it commeth to passe that such they that are openly euill, are not alway thrust out of the company of the holy ones. This I graunt to bee a faulte: neither will I di-minish it, sith Paul dooth so sharply rebeke it in the Corinthians. But although the Church be slacke in her dutie, it shall not bee therefore immedi-immediately in the power of every private man, to take upon himself the judgement to seuer him. I doe in deede not denie that it is the doing of a godly man to withdrawe himselfe from all private companie of evil men, to entangle himselfe in no willing familiaritie with them. But it is one thing to flee the companie of evil men, and an other thing for hatred of them to for-sake the communion of the Church. But where as they thinke it sacrilege to be partakers of the Lordes bread with them, they are therein much more rigorous than Paul is. For where he exhorteth vs to a holy and pure partaking, he requireth not that one should examine another, or every man the whole Church, but that they should ech one proue himselfe. If it were vnlawfull to communicate with an vnworthy man, then truely Paul woulde bid vs to looke circumspectly whether there were any in the multitude, by whose vncleanesse we might be defiled. Nowe when he requircth onely of every man the prove of themselfes, he sheweth that it nothing hurteth vs if anie vnworthie doe thrust themselfes in among vs. And nothing else is meant by this which he sayeth afterward. He that eateth vnworthily, eateth and drinketh judgement to himselfe. He doth not saye to other, but to himselfe. And rightfully. For it ought not to stand in the choice of every particular man, who be to be received, & who to be rejected. The knowledge hereof belongeth to the whole Church, which knowledge can not be had without lawfull order, as hereafter shall be sayde more at large. Therefore it should be vrighteous, that any private man shoulde be defiled with the vnworthinesse of an other, whom he neither can nor ought to keepe backe from comming to it.

16 But although by this vndiscreet zeale of righteousnesse this tentation doth sometime also enter into good men: yet this we shall find that too much precifenesse growtheth rather of pride, disdainesfulnesse, and false opinion of holinesse, than of true holinesse and true zeale thereof. Therefore they that are bolder than other, and as it were standard bearers to make any departing from the Church, for the most part doe it vpon no other cause, but in defying of all men to boast themselfes to bee better than other. Therefore Augustine sayeth well and wisely: When godly order and manner of Ecclesiasticall discipline ought principally to haure regarde vnto the vitie of Spiritu in the bonde of peace: which the Apostle commanded to be keept by bearing one with another: and which being not kept, the medicine of reuenge is proud to be not onely superfluous, but also pernicious, and therefore now to be no medicine at all: those euill children, which not for hatred of other mens iniquities, but for affection of their owne contentions, do greedily labour either wholly to drawe or at least to divide the weake common people entangled with the boasting of their name, swelling with pride, madde with stubbornnesse, traitorous with slaunderes, troublesome with seditions, leaft they should feeme to want the light of truth, doe pretend a shadow of rigorous sectarie: and those thinges that are in the holy Scriptures commanded to be done with a gentler kinde of healing, sauing the sectarie of love, & keeping the vitie of peace, to correct the faultes of brethre, they abuse it to sacrilege of schisme, and to occasion of cutting of. But to godly and quiet men he giueth this counsell, that they mercifully correct... that which they can, and that which they can not, patiently bear, and grope and mourne with loue, untill God either amend and correct them, or at the lastleft roote vp the tares, and fanne out the chaffe. Let the godly travail to fortifie themselves with these armes, leaft while they seeme to themselves strong and courageoues reuengers of righteousness, they departe from the kingdom of heauen, which is the onely kingdom of righteousness. For fiue it is Gods will to have the communion of his Church to bee kept in this outwarde fellowship: he that for hatred of euill men doth breake the token of that fellowship, entreteth into a way whereby is a slippery falling from the communion of Saints. Let them thinke that in a great multitude there be many truly holy and innocent before the eyes of the Lord, whom they see not. Let them thinke that euie of them that be diseased there be many that do not please or flatter themselves in their faultes, but being now & then awakened with earnest fear of GOD doe aspire to a greater vprightnesse. Let them thinke that judgement ought not to be giuen of a man by one deede: forasmuch as the holieft do sometime fall away with a most greuous fall. Let them thinke that to gather a Church there lyeth more weight both in the miniftrie of the worde and in the partaking of the holy misteryes, than that all that force should vanish away by the fault of some wicked men. Last of all let the consider, that in judging the Church, the judgement of God is of greater value than the judgement of man.

17 Where allo they pretende ye the Church is not without cause called holy, it is meeke to they with what holinesse it excelleth: leaft if we will admit no Church but such a one as is in all pointes perfect, we leaue no Church at all: It is true in deede which Paul saith, ye Christ gaue himselfe for the Church to sanctifie it: that he cleanfed it with the lauer of water with the word of life, to make her vnto himselfe a glorious spouse having no spot or wrinkle, &c. Yet this is also nothing lesse true, that the Lord daily worketh in smoothing her wrinkles and wiping away her spots. Whereupon fellowtheath that her holines is not yet fully finished. Therefore the Church is so holy, that it daily profireth and is not yet perfect: daily proceedeth, and is not yet come to the mark of holines: as also in an other place shall be more largely declared. Whereas the Prophets prophesie that there shall be a holy Hierusalem, through which strangers shall not passe: and a holy temple whereinto vncleanes men shall not enter; lest vs not so take it, as if there were no spot in the members of the Church: but for that with their whole endeauour they aspire to holinesse and sourde purenesse, by the goodness of God cleanliness is ascribed to them, which they have not yet fully obtained. And although oftentimes there be but rare tokens of such sanctification among men yet we must determine that there hath bene no time since the creation of y worlde wherein in the Lord hath not had his Church, & that there shall also be no time to the very end of the worlde, wherein hee shall not haue it. For all be is immediately from the beginning the whole kinde of men is corrupt and defiled by the sinne of Adam: yet out of this, as it were a polluted masse, God alway sanctified some vesselles vnto honour, that there should be no age without feeling of his mercie. Which he hath testified by certaine promisses: as these: I haue ordained a testament to my elect. I haue sworn to David my servant.
servant, I will for ever continue thy seede: I will builde thy seate in generation and generation.

4. Against the Lorde hath chosen Sion, he hath chosen it for a dwelling to himselfe: This is my rest for euer, &c. Against these things faith the Lord which gought the Sunne for the light of the day, the Moone & stars for the light of the night. If these lawes shall faile before me, then the seede of Israel shall also faile.

18. Hereof Christ himselfe, the Apostles, and in manner all the Prophets have giuen vs example. Horrible are those descriptions wherein Esay, Hieremie, Ioe, Abaue, and the other doe lament the sickenesles of the Church of Hierusalem. In the common people, in the magistrate, in the Priestes all things were so corrupt, that Esay doubteth not to match Hieralem with Sodom and Gomorrha. Religion was partly despifed, partly defiled: in their maners are commonly reported theftes, extractions, breaches of faith, murthers and like mischeues. Yet therefore the Prophets did neither ereft to them selues new Churches, nor builde vp newe altars on which they might haue eueryall sacrifices: but of whatsoever maner men they were, yet because they considered, that God had lefte his word with them, and ordained Ceremonies whereby he was there worshipped, in the middest of the assembly of the wicked they held vp pure handes vnto him. Truely if they had thought that they did gather any infection thereby, they would rather haue died a hundred times than haue suffifed themselues to be drawn thereunto. Therefore nothing withheld them from departing, but desire to the keeping of vnity. But if the Prophets thought it against conscience, to estrange them selues from the Church for many and great wicked doings, not of one or two men, but in maner of the whole people: then we take too much vpoun vs, if we dare by and by departe from the communie of the Church, where not all mens maners do satisfie either our judgement, yea or the Christian profession.

19. Nowe what manner worlde was there in the time of Christ and the Apostles? And yet that desperate vngodlines of the Pharifese, and the disolute licentiousnes of living, which then eche where reigned, could not hinder, but that they used the fame Ceremonies with the people, and assembled with the rest into one temple to the publike exercise of religion. Whereof came that, but because they knewe that the fellowhippe of euill men did not defile them, which with a pure conscience did communicate at the same Ceremonies? If any man bee little moued with the Prophets and Apostles, let him yet obey his authoritie of Christ. Therfore Cyprian welsaith though there be euene tares or vnclene vessels in the Church, yet there is no cause why we shoulde departe from the Church: we must oncely labour that we may bee wheare: we must vsse diligence and industrie as much as we may that we may be a golden or filuer vessell. But to breake the earthen vessells, is the onely worke of the Lorde, to whom alfo is giuen an iron rodde. And let no man challenge to himselfe that which is properly belonging to him. So oncely, to bee able alone to fame the floore, and cleanse the chaffe, and seuer all the tares by mens indgement. This is a proude obstinacie, and presumptiion full of sacrileg, which a peruers furer taketh to it selfe, &c. Therefore let both these things remaine certainly fixed. First that the hath no excuse, that of his owne will forsaiketh the outward communion of the Church. Where the worde of God is preached and the sacramentes ministred: then that the faults of a fewe or of many are no hindrance, but that we may then in rightly professeth our faith by the Ceremonies institute by god: because a godly conscience is not hurt by y vnworthines of any other either pastor or priuie man, and the mysteries are to holy & vright man neuertheles pure and holsome because they are together handled of vnclene me.

20 Their preciounesse and disdainfulnesse proceedeth yet further because they acknowledge no Church but such a one as is pure from all spots be they never so small: yea they are angrie with good teachers, for that in exhorting the faithfull to goe forwarde, they teach them all their life long to grone vnder the burden of vices, and to fleevnto pardon. For they prate that by this meane men be led from perfection. I grant in deed, that in earnest calling upon perfection we ought not flowly or coldly to trauell, much leffe to be idle: but to fill our mindes with confidence thereof while we be yet in our course, I say, it is a diuelfh intention. Therefore in the Creede the forciounesse of sinnes is aptly joyned next after the Church. For none doe attaine it, but only they that are citizeuns and of the houfhood of the Church as it is read in the Prophet. Therefor the building of the heavenly Hierusalem ought to goe before, wherein afterward this mercifulnes of God may have place, y whatsoeuer come vnto it, their iniquitie may be taken away. I say that it ought first to be builded, not for that there can be any Church without the forciounesse of sinnes, but because the Lord hath not promiseth his mercie but in the Communion of Saints. Therefore the first entrie for vs into the Church and kingdome of God, is the forciounesse of sinnes, without which wee have no couenaunt or conioyning with God. For thus hee faith by the Prophet, In that day I will strike you a couenaunt with the beaft of the fielde, with the foule of the aire, and with the vermine of the earth. I will breake the swordes of warre out of the earth, and I will make men to sleepe without feare. I will espoufe you vnto me for eu er. I will espoufe you (I say) in righteousnes, in judgemeat, in mercie, & in compensations. We see how by his mercie the Lorde reconcileth vs to himselfe. And so in another place, when he foresaith y the people shall be gathered together againe, whom hee had scattered abroad in his wrath, he faith, I will clene them from all wickednesse wherewith they haue sinned against me. Wherefore by the signe of washing we enter into the fellowhippe of the Church, whereby we may bee taught that there is no entrie open for vs into the houyhode of God, vnhles our filthines be first wiped away with his goodnes.

21 But by the forciounesse of sinnes the Lord doth not onely receive & adopt vs once into the Church, but by the same he also preferueth & maintaineth vs still in it. For to what purpose were it, to haue such a pardon granted vs, as should fesse for no vs? But every one of the godly is a witness to himselfe that the mercie of God shoulde be vaine and mocking, if it shold be granted onely but once: because there is none that is not in his owne conscience priuate through out his whole life of many weakenesesses, which need the mercie of God. And truely not in vaine God promiseth this grace peculiarly to them of his owne houyhode: and not in vaine hee commandeth the same message of reconciliation to be daily offered unto them. Therefore as throughout all our life wee cate about vs the remaintes of sinne, vsleffe wee be sustaine with the continual grace of the Lorde in fouling our sinnes, we shall fearfully abide one moment in the Church. But the Lorde hath called his vs to eternal salvation. Therefore they ought to thinke that there is pardon alwaies ready for their sinnes. Wherefore we ought to hold assuredly, that by the liberalitie of God by meanes of Christes desiruing through the Sanctification of the Spirite, Sinnes hath beeene and are daily pardoned to vs which be called and graffed into the body of the Church.

22 To deal: this benefite vs, the keyes were giene to the Church. For when Christ gave the Apostles commanndement, and deluered them power to forgive sinnes, he meant not this onely, that they should loose them from sinnes that were from vs godlines converted to the faith of Christ; but rather that they should continually execute this office among the faithful full. Which thing Paul teacheth, when he writeth that the embassage of reconciliation was left with the minifters of the Church, whereby they hold oftentimes in Christes name exhorte the people to reconcile themselves to God. Therefore in the Communion of Saints, by the ministerie of the Church it selfe, sinnes are continually forgiven vs, when the Priests or Bis hops, to whom that office is committed, doe with the promyse of the Gospell confirme godly confinences in hope of pardon and forgiuenes: and that as well publikly as privatly, according as necessitie requireth. For there be verie many, which for their weakenee do need a singular atonement. And Paul reporteth that not onely in common preaching, but also in houses hee had testified the Faith in Christ, and feuerally admonished every one of the doctrine of salvation. Therefore wee have here three things to be noted. First that with howe great holinesse fouter the children of God doe excell, yet they bee alway in this estate, so long as they dwell in a mortall body, that without forgiuence of sinnes they can not staonde before God. Secondly, that this benefite is so proper to the Church, that we cannot otherwise enjoy it, but if wee abide in the Communion thereof. Thirdly, that it is distributed vs by the minifters and Paf tors, either by preaching of the Gospell, or by ministring of the Sacramentes: and that in this behalfe principallly appareth the power of the keyes, which the Lorde hath giuen to the fellowship of the faithful full. Wherefore let every one of vs thinke this to bee his due, no where else to seek forgiuences of sinnes, than where the Lord hath fett it. Of publike reconciliation which belongeth to discipline we shall speake in place fit for it.

23 But forasmuch as those phentike spirites that I have spoken off, doe go about to plucke away from the Church this onely anchor of salvation, confinences are the more strongly to be confirmed against a so pestilent opinion. The Nouatians in old time trouble the Church with this doctrine: but not much unlike to the Nouatians our age alfo hath many of the Ana baptistes which fall to the same dotages. For they faine that the people of God are in Baptisme regenerate into a pure and Angelike life, that is corrupted with no flichtinesse of the fleece. But if any man offende after baptism, they leave vs to him nothing but the unappeasable judgemen of God. Briefly they grant no hope of pardon to a sinner fallen after grace received: because they acknowledge no other forgiveness of sins but that whereby we see bee first regenerate. But although there bee no lie more clearly confuted by the Scripture: yet because these men finde some whom they may deceive (as also in old time Noutatus had many followers) let us shortly shewe howe mad they bee to their owne and others destruction. First, whereas by the commaudement of the Lord, the holy ones doe daily repeate this praiere, forgive vs our dettes: truely they doe confess themselves detters. Neither doe they craue it in vayne because the Lord hath alway appointed no other thing to be asked, than that which hee himselfe woulde giue. Yea whereas he hath testified that the whole prayer shall bee hearde of his father, yet he hath also sealed this absolution with a peculiar promise. What will we more? The Lord requireth of the holy ones all their life long a confession of sinnes, yea and that continuall, and promiseth pardon. What boldnesse is it, either to exempt them from sinne, or if they have stumbled, yetterly to exclude them from grace? Nowe whome doeth he will vs to forgive seuentie times seuen times? nor to our brethren? To what ende did hee command it, but that we shoulde followe his clemencie? He forgiveth therefore, not once or twife: but as often as being striken downe with the acknowledging of sinnes they sigh vnto him.

24 But that we may beginne in a manner at the verie swadling cloutes of the Church: the Patriarches were circumcised, being allured into partaking of the covenant, hauing vndoubtedly by their fathers diligence bene taught righteousnes and innocencie, when they conspird to murther their brother: this was a mischeuous acte, to be abhorred euon of the most desperate theues. At the last being meekened with the monitions of Iudas, they folde him: this was also an intollerable haynousnesse, Simeon and Leui, with wicked reuenge, and such as was also condemned by their owne fathers judgement, vsed crueltie against the Sichemites. Ruben with most vnchaine lust defiled his fathers bed. Iudas when hee woulde giue himselfe to fornication against the lawe of nature, went in to his sones wife. And yet so farre are they from being wiped out of the choosen people, that they be rather raised vp to be heades of it. But what did David? when he was a governour of justice, with howe great wickednesse did hee by shedding of innocent bloode open the way to his blinde lust? Hee was already regenerate and among the regenerate garnished with notable praises of the Lorde: neuertheless hee committted that haynous offence, which is horrible euon among the Gentiles: and yet hee obtayned pardon. And (that wee may not tarie vpon single examples) howe many promises there are in the lawe and the Prophets of Godd mercie toward the Israelites, so oft it is proued that the Lorde sheweth himselfe appeasable to the offences of his people. For what doth Moses promise to come to passe, when the people being fallen into Apostasie shall returne vnto the Lorde? Hee shall bring thee backe out of captuittie, and shall haue mercie on thee, and shall gather thee together out of the peoples to whom thou haft beeene deforfed. If thou bee scattered euon to the borders of the heaven, I will from thence againe gather thee together.

Prophets are full of such promises, which do yet offer mercie to the people couered with infinite wicked doings. What offence is there more hainous than rebellion? for it is called a diuorce betweene God and the Church. But this is overcome by the goodnesse of God. What man is there (sayth he by Jeremy) that if his wife give foorth her body in common to adulterers, can abide to returne into fauour with her? but with thy fornications all the wayes are polluted, O Iuda, the earth hath bin filled with thy filthy louses. But returne vnto me, and I will receive thee. Returne thou turne away, I will not turne away my face from thee: because I am holy, and am not angry for euere.

And truely he can be no otherwise minded, which affirmeth that he will eth not the death of a sinner, but rather he should be converted & liveth. Therefore when Salomon did dedicate the temple, he appointed it also to this vis, that the prayers made for obtaining pardon of sinnes should be hearde from thence. If (sayde he) thy sonnes shall sinne (for there is no man that sinneth not) and thou being angry shalt deliver them to their enemies, and they shall repent in their heart, and being turned shall entreat thee in their captivity, saying, we have sinned, we have done wickedly, and shall pray toward the lande which thou hast giuen to their fathers, and towards this holy temple: thou shalt heare their praiers in heauen, and shalt be made mercifull to thy people that hath sinned against thee, and to all their wickednesse wherewith they have offended thee. And not vaineely the Lord ordained in the law daily Sacrifices for sinnes. For if the Lord had not foreseen that his people should be troubled with continuall diseases of sins, he would never have appointed these remedies for them.

26 Was this benefite taken away from the faithful, by the comming of Christ, wherein the fulnes of grace was shewed foorth, so that they dare not now pray for pardon of sinnes? that if they offend the Lorde they may not obtaine any mercie? What shall this be els, but to say that Christ came to the destruction of them that be his, and not to their salvation, if that mercifullnesse of God in pardoning sinnes which in the olde testament was continuallly ready for the holy ones, be now fayd to be vterly taken away? But if we beleeue the Scriptures which expressly cry out, y in Christ only the grace and kindnes of the Lord fully appeared, that the plentifulnes of mercy was powred out, that the reconciliation of God and men was fulfilled: let vs not dout that there floweth vnto vs a more bountiful mercifullnes of the heavenly father, than that it is cut of or shortned. And herof there want not examples. Peter which had heard that he should be denied before the Angels of God that confessed not the name of Christ before men, denied him thrice in one night, and that not without execution: yet hee was not put away from pardon. They that liued inordinately among the Thessalonians are so chastised, that yet they be gently called to repentance. Even Simon the Magician himselfe is not cast in desperation, but he is rather commaunded to hope well, when Peter counselleth him to flee to prayer.

27 Yea most hainous sinnes have sometime possesed whole Churches, out of which Paul rather gently vnwrapped them, than pronounced them accrued. The falling away of the Galathians was no meane offence. The Corinthians were so much lesse execulable than they, as they abounded in mo mo and those nothing lighter sins: yet neither of them are excluded from the mercy of God. Yet even they that had sinned above the rest in vnchaste-ness, fornication & vniclarity, are namely called to repentance. For the co-tent of the Lord remaineth and shall remaine for ever inuolable, which he solemnly made with Christ the true Solomon and his members; in these words: If his fones shall for sake my law, shall not walke in my judgements, if they shall defile my righteousnesse, and not keepe my commandements, I will visit their iniquities with a rod, and their sins with stripes: But my mercie I will not take away from him. Finally by the very order of the Creede we be taught, that there remaineth in the Church of Christ continual pardon of sins: for that when the Church is as it were established, yet forgivennesse of sins is adioyned.

28 Some that be somewhat wiser, when they see the doctrine of Nouatus fo be confused with so great plainnesse of Scripture, make not every sinne unpardonable, but wilfull transgressing of the law, into which a man witting-ly and willingly falleth. Now they that say so, do vouchsafe to grant pardon to no sinne, but where a man hath erred by ignorance. But whereas the Lorde in the lawe commanded the one sort of Sacrifices to be offred for cllening of the wilfull sinnes of the faithfull, and other to redeeme their ignorances: how great lewdnesse shall it be to grant no cllenning to wilful sinne? I say that there is nothing plainer, than that the onely Sacrifice of Christ auailenth to forgiue the wilfull sinnes of the holy ones: forasmuch as the Lord hath testifed the fame by earell Sacrifices as by signes. Againe who can excuse Dauid by ignorance, whom it is euident to have bin so well instructed in the lawe? Did Dauid not know how great was the fault of adultery and manslaughter, which dayly punished the same in other? Did brother slauhter seeme to the Patriarkes a lawfull thing? Had the Corinthians so ill profited, if they thought that wantonnesse, vnclanes, whordome, hatredes and contentions pleasid God? Did Peter being so diligently admonished not know how great a matter it was to forswear his master? Therefore let vs not with our owe enuiousnesse stop vp the way against the mercie of God that so gently vthereth it selfe.

29 Truely I am not ignorant that the olde writers expounded those sins that are daily forgien to the faithfull, to be the light offensyes that creepe in by weakenesse of the flethe: and that they thought that the solemne repentance which was then required for hainous misdeedss might no more bee iterate than Baptisme. Which saying is not so to bee taken, as though they would either throwe them downe headlong into desperation that after their first repentance hadd fallen againe, or extenuate those other sinnes as though they were small in the sight of G O D. For they knewe that the holy ones doe oftimes times stagger by infidelity, that superfluous others doe sometimes fall from them, that they nowe and then are chafed unto anger, yea that they break out euen into manifest raylinges, and besides these bee troubled with other euilles which the Lorde not sedulyly abhorreth: but they so called them, to put a difference betweene them and publike crimes that with great offence came to the knowledge of the Church. But whereas they did so hardly pardon them that had committed any thing worthie of Eccle.
The 2d Chapter.

A comparison of the false Church with the true Church.

O f howe great value the ministry of the worde and Sacramentes ought to be with vs, and howe farre the reverence of it ought to procede, that it be vs to vs a perpetuall token whereby to discerne the Church, it hath bin already declared. That is to say, wheresoeuer that ministry abideth whole and vncorrupted, there the faults or diseases of nianers are no impediment put that it may beare the name of a Church. Then, that the very ministry it selfe is by small errors not so corrupted, but that it may be esteemed lawfule. Moreover we have shewd that the errors that ought so to be pardoned are those whereby the principall doctrine of religion is not hurt, whereby those cheefe pointes of religion that ought to bee agreeably holden among the faithfull are not destroyed, and in vs Sacrament, those that do not abloste nor compaire the lawfull institution of him that ordained them. But so soone as lying is broken into the cheefe tower of religion, so soone as the summe of necessarie doctrine is perverted, and the vs of the Sacramentes falleth: truely the destruction of the Church followeth: like as a mans life is at an ende, when his throne is thrust through or his heart deadly wounded. And this is clearly prooved by the wordes of Paul, when he teacheth that the foundation of the Church is laid upon the doctrine of the Apostles and Prophets, Christ himself being the head, or corner stone. If the foundation of the Church be the doctrine of the Prophets and Apostles, by which the faithfull are commanded to repose their salvation in onely Christ: then take away that doctrine, and howe shall the building stande any longer? Therefore the Church must needs fall downe where that summe of religion falleth which is onely able to uphold it. Againe, if the true Church bee the piller and stay of the truth, it is certaine, that there is no Church, where lying and falsehoods have vpstumbled the dominion.

2. Sith it is in suche case under the Papistrie, wee may understand howe much of the Church is there remaining, in stead of the ministrie of vs word, there reigneth a pernicious government and made of lies mingled together, which partly quencheth and partlychoseth the pure light: into the place of the Lordes Supper is entered a most filthie sacrilege: the forme of wor-worshipping God is deformed with a manifold and intolerable heap of superflities: the doctrine, without which Christianitie cannot stande, is altogether buried and driven out: the publike assemblies are the schools of idolatry and vngodlinesse. Therefore there is no peril least in departing from a damnable partaking of so many mischiefes; we be plucked from the Church of Christ. The communion of the Church was not ordained to this ende that it should be a bond whereby we should be intangled with idolatry, vngodlinesse, ignorance of God, and other kindes of evils; but rather whereby we should be fast holden in the feare of God and obedience of truth. They doe indeed gloriously set out their Church vnto vs, that there should seeme to bee no other Church in the world; and afterwaed, as though the victorie were gotten, they decreed that all the Schismatikes that dare withdrawe themselves from the obedience of that Church that they paint out; and that all be heretikes that dare once mutter against the doctrine thereof. But by what prooves doe they confirme that they have the true Church? They alledge out of the auncient Chronicles, what in olde time was in Italie, in Fraunce, in Spaine. They say that they fetch their beginning from those holy men that with sound doctrine founded and raised vp Churches, and stablished the same doctrine and edifying of the Church with their blood. And that so the Church hath beene among them to confecrate both with spiritual gifts, and with the bloode of martyrs, and preferuered with continual succession of Bishops, that it might not fall away. They rehearte how much Ireneeus, Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, and other esteemed this succession. But howe trilling these things be, and howe they be but very mockeries, I will make them verie easie to understande that will be content a little to woe them with me. Truely I woulde also exhorte themselves earnestly to take heed hereunto, if I did trust that I might any thing preuade with them by teaching. But for as much as they, leaving all regard of truth, doe bend themselves to this onely purpose, by all the wayes that they can, to defende their owne cause, I will onely speake a fewe things whereby good men and those that love the truth, may winde themselves out of their futile contemplations. First I aske of them, why they doe not alledge Aphuic, and Egypt, and all Asia? Even because in all those countries this holy Succession of Bishops hath ceased, by meane whereof they boast that they have preferuered Churches. They come therefore to this point to say, that they therefore have a true Church, because since it first began to be, it hath not beene destitute of Bishoppes: for in perpetuall course they have succeeded one another. But what if I cast Greece in their way? Therefore I aske againe of them, why they say that the Church is lost among the Grecians, among whome that succession of Bishoppes was never interrupted, which in their opinion is one ly keeper and preterer of the Church. They make the Grecians Schismatikes, but by what right? because in departing from the Apostolike sea, they have lost their privileg: what? Doe not they much more deserv to lose it that depart from Christ himselfe? It followeth therefore, that the presence of succession is but vaine, vnsle he the posterite doe keepe fast & abide in the truth of Christ, which they have receuied of their fathers from hand to hand.
Therefore the Romanists at this day doe all se nothing else but which it appeareth that the Iewes in old time alledged when they were by the Prophets of the Lord reproved of blindness, vngodliness and idolatry. For they gloriously boasted of the temple, Ceremonies & priesthoods, by which they, by great reason as they thinke they meared the church. So in fteede of the Church, they shewe certaine outward visors, that oftentimes are farre from the Church, and without which the Church may very well stand. Therefore we neede to confute them with no other argument, then that wherewith Hieremy fought against the foolish presupptuousnes of the Iewes: that is, that they should not boast in lying wordes, saying, The temple of the Lorde, the temple of the Lorde, it is the temple of the Lorde. Forasmuch as the Lord doeth no where acknowledge any thing for his, but where his word is hearde and reuerently observered. So when the glory of God did sit betweene the Cherubins in the Sanctuary, & hee had promisedit them that that should be his fedfaft seat: yet when the Priestes once corrupted the worshipping of him with perfec superstitious, he removed else where, & left the place without any holiness. If the same temple which seemed to be holyly appointed to the perpetual dwelling of God, might be forsaken of God and become unholy: there is no cause why these men should have faine to vs that God is so bounde to persons or places, and so fast tied to outward observations, that he must needs abide with them that have only the title and shewe of the Church. And this is it about which Paul contendeth in the Epistle to the Romanes, from the 9. chapter to the 12. For this did fore trouble weake confidences, that the Iewes when they seemed to be the people of God, did not onely refuse the doctrine of the Gospel, but also persecute it. Therefore after that he hath set out the doctrine, hee remoueth this dout, and denieth that those Iewes being enemies of the truth are the Church, houlooeuer they wanted nothing that otherwise might be required to the outward forme of the Church. And therefore he denieth it, because they embraced not Christ. But somewhat more expressely in the Epistle to the Galathians: wherein comparing Ismael with Isaac, he saith that many hold place in the Church, to whence the inheritance belongeth not, because they are not begotten of the free mother. From whence also he defendeth to the comparison of two Hierusalems. Because as the lawe was given in the mount Sina, but the Gospel came out of Hierusalem. So many being feruilely borne and brought vp do without douting boast themselues to be children of God and of the Church, yea they proudly despise the natural children of God, when themselues be but bastards. On the other side also, when we heare that it was once pronounced from heauen: Caft out the bond woman and her sonne, let vs standing vpon this inviolable decree, boldly despise their vnauary boastinges. For if they bee proud by reason of outwarme profession, Ismael was also circumcised: if they contende by antiquitie, hee was the first begotten, and yet we see that he is put away. If the cause be demaunded, Paul as signeth it, for that none are accounted children, but they that are begotten of the pure lawfull seede of doctrine. According to this reason God denieth that he is bounde to wicked priestes by this that he cozenanted with their Father Leui that he should be his Angel or interpreter.
yea, he turneth against themselves their false boasting, wherewith they were wont to rise vp against the Prophets, that the dignity of Priesthood was to be had in singular estimation. This he willingly admeteth, and with \\n\\nthe same condition he debateth with them, because he is readie to keepe his couenant, but when they do not mutually performe their parte to him, they desire to be reiectcd. Loe what succession asaileth, vnlesse therewithall bee also ionyed an imitation and euen continuing cause; euen to this effect the successors, so soone as they be proued to haue swarued from their originall, be deprived of all honor. Unlesse perhaps because Caiphas succeeded many godly Bishops (yea there was eu? from Aaron to him a continual vnbroken course of succession) therefore that same midstious assembly was worthie the name of the Church. But this were not tolerable eu? in earthly dominions, that the tyranny of Caligula, Nero, Heliogabalus and such other, should be called a true state of Common weale, for that they succeeded the Brutcs, Scipions, & Camilles. But specially in the government of the Church there is nothing more fonde, than leaving the Doctrine to set the succession in the Persons onely. But neither did the holy doctors whom they falsely thrust in vnto vs, meane any thing lesse, then to proue that precisely as it were by right of inheritance Churches be there where Bishops are successuUy placed one after another. But where as it was then out of controversie, that from the very beginning to that age nothing was changed in Doctrine, they alleged that which might suffice to make an ende of all newe errors, that is, that by those was that doctrine oppugned, which had beene euen from the Apostles constantly and with one agreeing consent retained. There is therefore no cause, why they should any longer go forward to deceiue by pretending a false colour vnder the name of of church which wee do reuerently esteeme as becommeth vs: but when they come to the definition of it, not onely water (as the common saying is) cleaueth vnto them, but they sticke faile in their owne myre because they put a thinking harlot in place of the holy spouse of Christ. That this putting in of a changeling should not deceiue vs, beside other admonitions, let vs remember this allo of Augustine. For speaking of the Church, he saith: It is it that is sometime darkened, & couered with multitude of offences as a cloude: sometime calmesse of time appeareth quiet & free: sometime is hidden and troubled with waues of tribulations and temptations. He bringeth forth examples, that oftentimes the strongest pillars either valiantly suffred ba\nishment for the faith, or were hidden in the whole world.

4 In like maner the Romanistes do vexe vs, and make astraide the igno\nant with the name of the Church, whereas they be the deadly enemies of Christ. Therefore although they pretend the temple, the priesthood & the other such outward shewes, this vaine glistering wherewith the eyes of the simple be daseled ought nothing to moue vs to graunt that there is a church where the Word of God doeth not appeare. For this is the perpetual mark wherewith God hath marked them ye be his. He that is of the trueth (sayth he) heareth my voice. Againe, I am that good shepe heard, & I knowe my shepe, & am known of them. My shepe hearde my voice, & I knowe them, & they follow me. And a little before he had said, that the shepe follow their shepe. shepheard, because they knewe his voice: but they follow not a stranger, but runne away from him because they knew not the voice of strangers. Why are we therefore wilfully mad in judging the Church, whereas Christ hath marked it with an undoufull signe, which whersoever it is seene can not deceive, but that it certainly sheweth the Church to bee there: but where it is not, there remaineth nothing that can give a true signification of the Church. For Paul rehearseth that thy church was builded, not upon the judgements of men, Ephe. 2.20, nor upon priesthooles, but upon the doctrine of the Apostles and Prophets. But rather Hierusalem is to be seuerally known from Babylon, & the Church of Christ from the conspiracy of Satan, by a difference wherwith Christ hath made them different one from the other. He that is of God (faith he) heareth the words of God. Ye therefore heare not, because ye are not of God. In a sum, forasmuch as the church is the kingdom of Christ, and he reigneth not but by his word, can it be now doufull to any man, but those be the words of lying, by which Christ's kingdom is fained to be without his scepter, that is to say without his holy word?

5 But now where as they accuse vs of Schismes & heresies, because we both preach a contrary doctrine to them, and obey not their lawes, and have our assemblies to Prayers, to Baptisme, to the ministration of the Supper, & other holy doings, seuerally from the: it is in deede a very sore accusation, but such as needeth not a long or laborsome defence. They are called heretikes and schismatikes, which making a division, do breake in sunder the communion of the Church. And this communion is holde together with true bonds, that is to say, the agreement of true doctrine, and brotherly charitie. Whereupon Augustine putteth this difference between heretikes and schismatikes, that heretikes in deede do with false doctrines corrupt the purenes of faith, but the schismatikes sometime euene where there is like faith, do breake the bondes of fellowship. But this is also to be noted, that this conjoyning of charitie so hangeth upon the vnitie of Faith, that Faith ought to be a beginning thereof, the end, and finally the only rule. Let vs therefore remember that so oft as the vnitie of the Church is commended vnto vs, this is required, that while our minds agree in Christ, our wils also may be joined togethre with mutual wel willing in Christ. Therefore Paul, when he exhorteeth vs to that wel willing, taketh for his foundation that there is one God, one Faith, and one Baptisme. Yea whersoever he teacheth vs to be of one minde, and of one will, he by and by addeth in Christ, or according to Christ: meaning that it is a factious company of the wicked, and not agreement of the faithfull which is without the wordes of the Lord.

6 Cyprian also following Paul deu resembl the whole fountaine of the agreement of the Church, from the only bishopriek of Christ. He afterward addeth the Church is but one, which spredeth abroade more largely into a multitude with encreafe of fruitefulnessse: like as there be many sunne beames, but one light: and manie braunches of a tree, but one bodie grounded vpon a fast roote: And when many streames do flowe from one fountaine, although the number seeme to be fearted abroade by laregenesse of overflowing plentie, yet the vnitie abideth in the orinall. Take away a beame of the sunne from the body, the vnitie can suffer no diviision. Break a branch from the tree, the broken branch can not spring. Cut of the streame from the spring head, being cut off it drieth vp. So also the church being overspreading with light of the Lord, is extended over the whole world: yet there is but one light that is shed everywhere. Nothing could be said more fitly to express that indivisible knitting together, which all the members of Christ haue one with another. We see howe he continually calleth us backe to the very head. Wherupon he pronounceth that hereties & schismes doe arise hereof, that men do not return to the original of truth, nor do seek every light, nor kepe the doctrine of the heavenly matter. Now let them goe and cry, ‘we be heretics that haue departed from their church: such there hath bin no cause of our estranging from them but this one, that they can in no wise abide the pure professing of the truth: but I tell not how they haue druen us out with cursings and cruel expectations. Which very selfe doing doth abundantly enough acquire vs, vselves they will also condemn the Apostles for Schismatikes, with whom we haue all one caufe. Christ (I say) did forsake to his Apostles the time should come when they should be cast out of the Sinagogues for his names sake. And those Sinagogues of which he speaketh, were then accounted lawfull Churches. Sith therefore it is euident that we be cast out, and we be ready to shew that the same is done for the names sake of Christ, truly the cause ought first to be inquired of, before that any thing be determined upon vs, either one way or other. Howbeit if they wil, I am content to discharg the of this point. For it is enough for me, that it behoved that we shoulde depart from them, that we might come to Christ.

7 But it shall appeare yet more certainly in what estimation we ought to haue all the Churches whom the tyranny of that Romish idol hath possessed, if it be compared with the olde Church of the Israellites, as it is described in the Prophetes. There was then a true Church among the Iewes and Israellites, when they continued in the lawes of the covenant, for they obeyed those things by the benefit of God, wherupon the Church consisteth. They had the truth of doctrine in the lawe: the ministerie thereof was among the Priestes and the Prophetes: with the signe of circumcision they entred into religion: by other Sacramentes they were exercised to the confirmation of faith. It is no doubt that those titles wherewith the Lorde hath honored his Church, fitly pertained to their fellowship. After that, forsaking the lawe of the Lord, they went out of kind to idolatrye and superstitioun, they partly left that prerogative. For who dare take away the name of the Church fro them, with whom God hath left the preaching of his word and observation of his mysteries? Againe, who dare call that the Church without any exception, where the worde of the Lord is openly and freely troden vnder foote? where the ministerie thereof, the chiefe flowing, yea the very soul of the Church is destroyed?

8 What then will some may say: was there therefore no parcel of a Church remaining among the Iewes after that they fell away to idolatry? The answer is easie. First I say that in the very falling away there were certaine degrees. For wee will not say that there was all one fall of Juda, and Israell, at such time as they both first swarne from the pure worshipping of God. When Iarobeam first made calues, against the open prohibition of God, and did dedicate... dedicate an unlawful place for worshipping, he did viscerly corrupt religio. The Jewes did first defile themselves with wicked and superstitious manners before they wrongfully changed the order in the outward forme of religion. For although vnder Rechabeam they had alreadie gotten them many puerile Ceremonies: yet because there carried at Hierusalem both the Doctrine of the Law, and the Priesthood, & the Ceremonious vriages in such sorte as God had ordained them; the godly had there a tolerable state of Church. Among the Israelites vnto the reign of Ahab, there was no amendment of things, and from thence forth they fell from worse to worse. They that succeeded afterward, to the verie destruction of the kingdom, partly were like vnto him, & partly (when they minded to be somewhat better than he) they followed the example of Iarobeam; but they al every one were wicked and idolaters. In Jewry there were now & then divers changes, while some kings perverted the worshipping of God with false & forged superstitions, some other restored religion that was decayed: vntill the verie priests themselves defiled the temple of God with prophane and abominable vriages.

9 Nowe let the Papistes if they can howe much sooner they extenuate their owne faults, deny that among them the state of religion is as corrupt and defiled as it was in the kingdom of Israel vnder Iarobeam. But they have a groser idolatry: and in doctrine they are not one drop purer: vnlesse par- adventure euin in it also they be more vnpure. God, yea all men that are endued but with a meane judgement, shalbe witness with me, & the thing itselfe also declareth, how herein I tell nothing more than truth. Nowe when they will drue vs to the communion of the Church, they require two things of vs: first, that we shoulde communicate with all their prayers, sacraments, and Ceremonies; then that we sooner honor, power and jurisdiction Christ giueth to his Church, wee shoulde give the fame to their Church. As to the first point, I grant that all the Prophets that were at Hierusalem, when things were there very much corrupted, did neither se- curally sacrifice, nor had assembly to pray severall from other men. For they had a commandement of God, whereby they were commanded to come together into Salomons temple; they knewe that the Leuitical priests, howe sooner they were vnworthie of that honor, yet because they were ordained by the Lord ministers of the holy Ceremonies, and were not as then depo- sed, did yet still rightfully possesshe that place. But (which is the chiefeste point of this question) they were compelled to no superstitious worshipping, yea they tooke in hand to do nothing but that which was ordained by GOD. But am- mong these men, I mean the Papistes, what like thing is there? For we can scarcely have any meeting together with them, wherein we shal not defile our selves with open idolatry. Truely the principall bond of their commu- nion is in the maffe, which we abhorre as the greatest sacrilege. And whether we do this rightfully or wrongfully, shalbe seeene in another place. At this present it is enough to shew that in this behalfe wee are in other case than the Prophets were; which although they were present at the Ceremonies of the wicked, were not compelled to beholde or vse any Ceremonies but such as were institute by God. And, if they willeedes have an example alo-

As the outward means gether like, let us take it out of the kingdom of Israel. After the ordinance of Circumcision remained, the sacrifices were offered, the law was accounted holy, the same God was called upon whom they had received of their Fathers: for the forged & forbidden forms of worshipping, God disallowed and condemned all that was there done. Shew me one Prophet, or any one godly man that once worshipped or sacrificed in Bethell. For they knewe they could not do it, but that they should defile themselves with some sacrilege. Wee haue then thus much, that the communion of the Church ought not so farre to be of force with the godly, that if it should degenerate to prophan and filthie vsages, they should forthwith of necessity follow it.

10 But about the other point we contende yet more earnestly. For if the Church be so considered to be such, whose judgement wee ought to re-uerence, whose authority to regard, whose monitions to obey, with whose chastisements to be mouted, whose communion in all things wee ought religiously to obserue, then we cannot grant them a Church, but that wee must of necessity be bound to subjection & obedience vnto it. Yet we will willingly grant them that which the Prophets granted to the Jewes & Israelites of their time: when things were there in as good, yea or in better state. But wee see how else where they cry out, that their assemblies are vnholie, to which it is no more lawfull to consent than it is to deny God. And truely if those were Churches, it followeth therefore that in Israel Helius, Micheas and such other: in Iurie, Egie, Jeremie, Osee and other of that sort, whom the Prophets, priests and people of that time hated & detested worse than any vnreconciled men, were strangers from the Church of God. If those were Churches, then the Church was not the pillar of truth, but the stay of living not the tabernacle of the living God, but the receptacle of idols. Therefore it was needful for them to departe from the content of those assemblies, which was nothing else but a wicked conspiracie against God. In like manner if any man acknowledge the assemblies at these dayes being defiled with idolatry, superstition and wicked doctrine, to be such in whose full communion a Christian man ought to continue euen to the content of doctrine, hee shall greatly erre. For if they bee Churches, then they haue the power of the keyes. But the keyes are vsed parably knit with the worde, which is from thence quite driven away. Again, if they be Churches, then the promise of Christ is of force among them, whatsoever ye bind, &c. But they contrariwise doe banish from their communion all such as doe professe themselves not handly the seruants of Christ. Therefore either the promise of Christ is vaide, or at least in this respect they are not Churches. Finally in stead of the ministrie of the worde they haue scholes of vngodly men, and a sinke of all kindes of errors. Therefore either in this respect they are not Churches, or there shall remaine no token wherby the lawfull assemblies of the faithfull may bee severally known from the meetings of Turkes.

11 But as in the olde time there yet remained among the Jewes certaine peculiar prerogatives of the Church, so at this day also wee take not from the Papistes such steps as it pleased the Lord to have remaining among them.
them after the dissipation of the Church. The Lorde had once made his covenant with the Iewes. That same rather being upheld by the strength of his selfe did continue with straining against their vngodlinesse, than was preferred by them. Therefore (such was the assuredness and constancie of Gods goodnesse) there remained the covenant of the Lorde, neither could his faithfullnesse be blotted out by their unfaithfullnesse: neither could Circumcision be so prophaned with their uncleane hands, but that it stil was the signe and sacrament of that covenant. Whereupon the children that were borne of them, the Lorde called his owne, which vnless it were by speciall blessing, belonged nothing to him. So when he hath left his covenant in France, Italy, Germany, Spaine, Englande: since those provinces have beene oppresed with the tyranny of Antichrist, yet that his covenant might remaine inviolable, first he there preferrde Baptisme, the testimonie of his covenant, which being consecrate by his owne mouth retaineth her owne force notwithstanding the vngodlines of man: then, with his providence he hath wrought that there should remaine other remnantes, left the Church shoulde be utterly destroyed. And as oftentimes buildinges are so pulled downe, that the foundations & ruines remaine: so he hath not suffred his Church either to be overthrown by Antichrist from the very foundation, or to be layd even with the grounde (howsoever to punishe the vnhonnestable of men that had despised his worde, he suffred a horrible shaking and dissipation to chance) but even after the very wafting hee willed that the building halfe pulled downe should yet remaine.

2. Whereas therefore we will not simply grant unto the Papistes the title of the Church, we do not therefore deny that there be Churches among thee: but only we contend of the true and lawfull ordering of the Church: which is required in the communion both of the sacramentes which are the signes of profession, but also specially of doctrine. Daniel and Paul foretold that Antichrist should sitte in the temple of God. With vs wee account the Byshoppe of Rome the captain and standard bearer of that wicked and abominable kingdome. Whereas his feate is placed in the temple of G O D, thereby is meant that his kingdome shalbe such as can not abolish the name of Christ nor of his Church. Hereby therefore appeareth, that we doe not deny but that even under his tyranny remaine Churches, but such as he hath prophaned with vngodlinesse full of sacrilege, such as he hath afflicted with outrageous dominion, such as he hath corrupted and in manner killed with euill and damnable doctrines, as with poisened drinks: such wherein Christ lieth halfe buried, the Gospeell overwelmed, godlinesse banished, the worshipping of God in a manner abolished: such finally wherein all things are so troubled, that therein rather appeareth the face of Babylon than of the holy citie of God. In a summe, I say that they be Churches, in respect that the Lorde there maruellously preferrd the remnaunt of his people howsoever they were dispearsed and scattered abroade, in respect that there remaine some tokens of the Church, specially these tokens, the effectualnesse whereof neither the craft of the devill, nor the malitiousnesse of man can destroy. But on the other side because these markes are blotted out, which in this discourse we ought principally to have respect vnto, I say that

The iii. Chapter.
Of the teachers and ministers of the Church, and of their election and office.

Now it is meete that we speake of the order, by which it was the Lordes will to have this Church governed. For although in his Church hee only must rule and reigne, yea and beare preeminenc or excell in it, and this government to be vied or executed by his onely worde: yet because he dwelleth not among vs in visible presence, so that hee can presently with his owne mouth declare his will unto vs, we have sayne that in this he vseth the ministerie of men, and as it were the trauaile of deputies, not in transferr ferring his right and honour vnto them, but onely that by their mouth hee might doe his owne worke, like as a workeman to doe his worke vseth his instrumente. I am compelled to repeate againe those thinges that I have already declared. He might in deed doe it either by himselfe without any other helpe or instrument, or also by meane of Angelles: but there are many causes why he had rather doe it by men. For by this meane first he declareth his good will towardes vs, when he taketh out of men them that shall doe his meaflage in the worlde, that shalbe the interpreters of his secrete wil, finally that shal represent his owne person. And so by experience he pro-oueth that it is not vaine that commonly hee calleth vs his temples, when out of the mouthes of men, as out of his sanctuarie, he giveth aunswere to men. Secondly, this is the best and most profitable exercitse to humilitie, when hee accustomed vs to obey his worde, howe souer it bee preached by men like vnto vs, yea sometime our iuferious in dignitie. If hee himselfe spake from heauen, it were no marueile if his holy Oracles were without delay recurently receiued with the cares and mindes of all men. For who would not decreed his power being in presence? who would not be thrown downe at the first sight of so greate majestie? who woulde not be confounded with that infinite brightnesse? But when some silly man rised out of the dust speakest in the name of G D, herewith verie good testimonie we declare our godlineffe and recurent obedience towardes God himselfe, if to his minister we yeelede our selues willing to learn, which yet in nothing excel-leth vs. Therefore for this cause also hee hath hidden the treasure of his heavenly wisedome in brickle and earthen vesseles, that he might haue the certaine proofe howe much he is esteemed of vs. Moreover there was nothing fitter for the cherishing of mutuall charitie, than that men shoulde be bound togetherto one to another with this bonde, when one is made a pastor to teach the reft, and they are commanded to be schoolers receive all one doctrine at one mouth. For if every man were able enough to serve himselue, and needeth not the heipe of on other: such is the pride of mans nature, that every one woulde despise other, and shoulde againe be despised of them. Therefore the Lorde hath bounde his Churche with that knotte, which he foresaw to be the strongest knotte to houlden unitie together, when he hath left with men the doctrine of saluation, and of eternall life, that by their their hands he might communicate it to the rest. Hereunto Paul had re-Eph. 4. 14.
spect when he wrote to the Ephesians. One body one spirit, as also ye be called in one hope of your calling. One Lorde, one faith, one Baptisme. One God, and the father of all, which is above all, and by all, and in vs all. But unto every one of vs grace is giuen according to the measure of the gifte of Christ. Wherefore he sayeth: When he was gone vp on hie, he ledde cap-tuutie capturing, he gaue giftes to men. He that went doone is the felle fame he, that went vp, that he might fulfill all things. And the same hath giuen some to be Apostles, and some Prophets, and some Evangehiltes, and other some Pastors and teachers, unto the restoring of the holy ones, to the worke of miniftiration, to the edifying of the body of Christ, vs all we come all into the vnittie of faith, and of the knowledge of the Sonne of G G D, into a perfect man, into the measure of full grown age: that we be no more children that may bee carried about with every winde of doctrine: but following truth in charitie, let vs in all thinges growe into him that is the head, eexen Christ, in whom the whole body conioyned and compacted together by all the ijoint of subminiftiration, according to the working in measure of euerie parte, maketh encrease of the body, unto the edifying of it felle by charitie.
2 By these wordes he sheweth, that that miniftorie of men, which God v-seth in governing his Church is the chiefe fitte, whereby the faithful cleave together in one body: and alfo he sheweth that the Church can not otherwise be preferved farte, but if it be vpholden by these staines, in which it pleased the Lorde to repofe the faluation of it, Chrift(fayth he) is gone vp on hie, Eph. 4.10. that he might fulfill all things. This is the maner of fulfilling, that by his minifters, to whom he hath committed that office, and hath giuen the grace to execute that worke, he disposeth and distributeth his giftes to the Church, and after a certaine manner giueth himfelfe present, with extending the power of his spirit in this institution, that it should not be vaine or idle. So is the restoring of the holy ones performed: fo is the body of Chrift edified so doe we by all thinges growe into him that is the head, and doe grow together among our felues; fo are we all brought into the vnittie of Chrift, if prophecie flourish among vs, if we receive the Apostles, if we refuse not the doctrine miniftered vs. Therefore he goeth about the disipation, or rather the ruine and destruction of the Church, whosoeuer he be that either ende-oureth to abollish this order of whom we speake, & this kinde of government, or minifteth the estimation of it as a thing not fo necessarie. For neither the light & heat of the sun, nor meat and drinke are fo necessary to nourish and sustaine this present liffe, as the office of Apostles and pastors is necessary to preserue the Church in earth.
3 Therefore I have aboue admonished, that God hath oftentimes with such titles as he could, commended the dignitie thereof vs, that wee should have it in most by honour and price, as the most excellent thing of all. He teftifieth he giueth to men a singular benefite, in raising them up teachers, where he commangeth the Propheete to criue out that faire are the secte, and blessed is the comming of them that bring tidings of peace:
Eph. 5. 2, 7.
and when he calleth the Apostles the light of the worlde, and fante of the and 14.

neither could this office be more honorable adaunced, than it was when he layde: He that heareth you, heareth me. He that despiseth you, despiseth me. But there is no place more plain, than in Paul in his seconde Epistle to the Corinthians, where hee as it were of purpose entrateh of this matter. He affirneth therefor, that there is nothing in the Church more excellent or glorious than the ministery of the Gospell, forasmuch as it is the administration of the Spirit, and of righteoussse, and of eternal life. These and like sayings seme to this purpose, that that order of governing and preserving the Church by ministers, which the Lord hath stablished for ever, hold not growe out of effination among vs, and so at length by very contempt grow out of vs. And howe great is the neceffity thereof, he hath declared not onely by wordes, but also by examples. When his will was to shine more fully to Cornelius with the light of his truth, he sent an Angel from heaven to sende Peter vnto him. When his will was to call Paul to the knowledge of himselfe, and to engraffe him into the Church, he spake not to him with his owne voyage, but sent him to a man, of whom hee should receive both the doctrine of salvation, and the sanctification of Baptisme. If it bee not done: without cause, that an Angel, which is the interpreter of God, do himselfe assiste in from declaring the will of God, but commandeth that a man be sente for, to declare it: and not without cause that Christ the onely schoolmaster of the faithfull committeth Paul to the scholing of a man, yea euen that same Paul whom he had determined to take vp into the third heauen, and to vouchsafe to grant him miraculous revelation of things vnpeekeable: who is there nowe that dare despise that ministerie, or passe it ouer as a thing superfuous, the vfe whereof it hath pleased God to make approyed by such examples?

4 They that haue rule of the government of the Church according to the institution of Christ, are named of Paul first Apostles, then Prophetes, thirdly Evangellites, fourthly Pastors, last of all teachers. Of which, the two laft alone haue ordinarie office in the Church: the other three the Lorde raised vp at the beginning of his kiondome, and sometime yet also raised vp, as the necessitie of times requireth. What is the Apostles office, appeareth by that commendantment: goe, preach the Gospell to every creature. There are not certaine bounds appointed vnto them: but the whole world is assigned them, to be brought into the obedience of Christ: that in spreading the Gospell among all nations wherefoever they shall bee able, they may eche where raise vp his kiondome. Therefore Paul, when hee wente about to prooue his Apostleshippe, rehearseth that hee hath gotten to Christ not one citie, but hath farre and wide spread abroad the Gospell: and that hee hath not layde his handes to an other mans foundation, but planted Churches where the name of the Lorde hadde neuer beene heard of. Therefore the Apostles were sent to bring backe the worlde from falling away, vnto true obedience of GOD, and eche where to stablish his kiondome by preaching of the Gospell: or (if you like that better) as the first builders of the Church, to lay the foundations thereof in all the worlde . Prophetes he calleth, not all expostors of Goddes will whatsoever they bee, but those that by singular revelation excelled, such as at this time either bee none, or are leffe notable. By Evangelistes I understand those, which when in dignitie they were leffe than the Apostles, yet in office were next vnto them. yea and occupied their roomes. Such were Luk, Timothie, Titus and other like: and paraduendure also the seuentie Disciples, whom Christ appointed in the second place after the Apostles. According to this exposition (which seemeth to mee agreeable both with the worthes and meaning of Paul) those three offices were not ordained in the Church to this ende that they should be perpetuall, but onely to serve for that time wherein Churches were to be erected, where were none before, or at least to bee remoued from Moses to Christ. Albeit I denie not, but that afterward also the Lorde hath sometime raised vp Apostles, or at least in their places Evangelistes, as it hath ben done in our time. For it was needfull to haue such to bring backe the Church from the falling away of Antichrist. Yet the office it selfe I doe neweth those call extraordinarie, because it hath no place in the Churches alreadie well set in order. Next after these are Pastors and Teachers, whom the Church may never lacke: betwene whome I thinke that there is this difference, that the Teachers are not appointed to beare rule of discipline, nor for the ministration of Sacramentes, nor admonishments or exhortations, but only to expounde the Scripture, that pure and sounde doctrine may bee kepe among the faithfull. But the office of Pastor conteneth all these things within it.

5 Now we haue, which were those ministries in the Church that continued but for a time, and which were those that were ordened to endure perpetually. If we joyn the Evangelistes with the Apostles, we shall haue remaining two couples after a certaine manner auniting the one to the other. For as our Teachers are like to the olde Prophets, in such sorte are our Pastors like to the Apostles. The office of Prophets was more excellent, by reason of the singular gift that they had of revelation: but the office of teachers hath in a manner like order, and altogether the same end. So those xij. whom the Lord did choose, that they should publish abroad to the world the new preaching of the Gospell, in degree & dignitie went before the rest. For although by the meaning and propicte of the word, all the ministers of the Church may be rightly called Apostles, because they are sent of the Lord, & are his messengers: yet because it was much behoynfull, that there should be a certaine knowledge had of the sending of them: ye should bring a thing newe and vnhearde of, it was necessarie that those xij. (to whose number Paul was afterward added) should be garnished with some peculiar title above the rest. Paul himselfe indeed in one place giuen this name to Andronicus and Junias, whom he faith to haue bene notable among the Apostles: but the he meaneth to speake properly he refereth it to none other but to that principal degree. And this is the common vse of the Scripture. Yet the Pastors (having that eck of them do governe severall Churches appointed to them) have all one charge with the Apostles. Now what manner of thing this is, let vs yet heare it more plunely.

6 The Lorde therefore when he sent the Apostles, gave them commandement (as we faide euene now) to preach the Gospell, and to baptize them that believe unto forgiveness of sinnes. Hee had before commanded, that they should shoulde distribute the holy signes of his bodie and blode, as he had done.
Loce here is a holy, inviolable and perpetuall lawe laid vppon them that succeed in the Apostles place, wherby they receive commandement to preach the Gospell, and minster the Sacramentes. Whereupon wee gather, that they which neglect both these things, doe falsely say that they beare the person of the Apostles. But what of the Pastors? Paul speaketh not of himselfe onely, but of them all, when hee faith: let a man so esteem vs as the ministers of Christ, and distributors of the mysteries of God. Againe in another place, a Bishoppe must be a fast holder of that faithfull word which is according to doctrine: that he may bee able to exhort by sounde doctrine, and to convince the gainayers. Out of those and like places, which are ech where to be founde, we may gather, that also in the office of the Apostles these bee the two principall partes, to preach the Gospell, and to minster the Sacraments. As for the order of teaching, it consisteth not onely in publike Sermons, but belongeth also to private admonitions. So Paul calleth the Ephesians to witnesse that he hath not fled from doing of any of those things that were for their profit, but that he preached and taught them both openly and in euerie house, testifying both to the Iewes and Grecians, repentance and faith in Christ. Againe a little after: that hee hath not ceased with teares to admonish every one of them. Neither yet belongeth it to my purpose at this present to expresse all the qualities of a good Pastor, but onely to point out what they profeffe that call themselves Pastors: that is, that they are so made rulers of the Church, not that they shoulde have an idle dignitie, but that they shoulde with the doctrine of Christ instruct the people to true godlinesse, minster the holy mysteries, and preserve and exercise uprigh discipline. For whosoever be set to be watchmen in the Church, the Lord declareth vnto them, if any by their negligence perish through ignorance, hee will require the blode at their handes. That also pertaineth to them all, which Paul faith of himselfe: woe to me vnlesse I preach the Gospell, forasmuch as the distributing thereof is committed to mee. Finally what the Apostles performed to the whole worlde, the same ought euerie Pastor to performe to his flocke, to which he is appointed.

7 Albeit when we affigne to every one their feuerall Churches, yet in the meane while we do not denye but that he which is bound to one Church may helpe other Churches, if any troublesome thing doe happen that requireth his presence, or if he be asked counsel of any darke matter. But for as much as for the keeping of the peace of the Church, this policy is necessarie, that there be set foorth to every man what hee shoulde doe, least all be confusedly disordered, runne about without calling, or rashly runne altogether into one place, and least such as are more careful for their owne commoditie than for the edification of the Church, shoulde at their owne will leave their Churches vacant: this ordering ought commonly to be kept so neere as may bee, that every man contented with his owne boundes shoulde not breake into an other mans charge. And this is no invention of man, but the ordinarie of God himselfe. For we reade that Paul and Barnabas created Priests in all the feuerall Churches of Liftra, Antioche, Iconium: and Paul himselfe commanndeth Titus that he should appoint Priests in in every town. So in one place he speaketh of the Bishoppes of Philippiess, and in another place of Archippus Bishop of the Colossians. And there remaineth a notable Sermon of his in Luke, to the Priests of the Church of Ephesus. Whosoever therefore shall take upon him the government and charge of the Church, let him knowe that hee is bounde to this lawe of gods calling: not that as bounde to the soule (as the lawyers terme it) that is, made bounde and fastened vnto it, hee may not once moue his foot from thence, if the common profite doe so require, so that it be done well and orderly: but hee that is called into one place ought not himselfe to thinke of remouing, nor seeke to be delivered as hee shall thinke to bee good for his commoditie. Then, if it be expedient that any bee remoued to an other place, yet he ought not to attempt it of his owne private aduice, but to tare for publike authoritie.

8 But whereas I haue without difference called them Bishoppes, and Priests, and Pastors, and minifters, that rule Churches; I did that according to the vfe of the scripture, which indifferentely vseth these wordes. For whosoever doe execute the miniftrie of the worde, to them hee giueth the title of Bishops. So in Paul, where Titus is commanded to appoint Priests in every town, it is immediately added. For a Bishop must be unreproueable, &c. So in another place he salueth many Bishoppes in one Church. And in Acts it is rehearsed, that he called together the Priests of Ephesus, whom he himselfe in his owne sermen calleth Bishoppes. Here nowe it is to bee notted, that hitherto we have recited none but those offices that stande in the ministry of the worde: neither doth Paul make mention of any other in that fourth chapter which we have alleaged. But in the Epistle to the Romanes, and in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, he reconteth vppon other offices, as powers, the gift of healing, interpretation, government, caring for the poore, of which I omitted those that endured but for a time, because it is to no profitable purpose to tary vpon them. But there are two that doe perpetually abide, that is to say, government and care of the poore. Government I think were the Elders chosen out of the people, that should together with the Bishoppes, have rule of the judgement of manners, and the vifing of discipline. For a man cannot other wise expounde that which he sayth: let him that ruleth doe it with carefulnesse. Therefore at the beginninguerie Church had their Senate, gathered of godly, grave and holy men: which had that same jurisdiction in correcting of vices, whereas we should speake hereafter. And that this was the order of more than one age, experience it selde declareth. Therefore this office of government is also necessarie for all ages.

9 The care of the poore was committed to the Deacons. Howbeit to the Romanes there are set two kindes. Let him that giueth (faith Paul in that place) doe it in simplicitie; let him that hathe mercy, doe it in chearefulnesse. Rom. 12. 9. For alinuch as it is certain that he speaketh of publike offices of the Church, it must needs be that there were two seuerall degrees. Vnlesse my judgement decreuie mee, in the first point hee meaneth Deacons, that distributted the almes: in the other he speaketh of them that had giuen themselves to looking to the poore and sick: of which sort were the widowes of whom bee maketh mention to Timothie. For women could doe execute no other publike office, but to giue themselues to the service of the poore. If we grant this, (as we must needes grant it,) then there shalbe two sortes of Deacons: of which one sort shall seuer in distributing the things of the poore, the other in looking to the poore of the Church themselves. But although the very worde Diaconia, Deaconrie extendeth further: yet the Scripture specially calleth them Deacons, to whom the Church hath given the charge to distribute the almes, and to take care of the poore, and hath appointed them as it were stewarde of the common treaurie of the poore: whose beginning, institution and office, is described of Luke in the Acts. For when a murmuring was raised by the Grecians: for that in the ministerie of y poore their widowes were neglected, the Apostles excusing themselves with saying that they could not serue both offices, both the preaching of the word and the ministring at tables, required of the multitude, that there might bee choosen seuen honest men, to whom they might comit that doing. Lo what manner of Deacons the Apostolike Church had, and what Deacons it were meeete for vs to have according to their example.

10 Nowe whereas in the holy assemblie all things are to be done in order and comely, there is nothing wherein that ought to bee more diligently obserued, than in establishing the order of government: because their is no where greater perill if any thing be done vnorderly. Therefore to the ende that vnquiet and troublesome men (which otherwise would happen) should rashly thrust in themselues to teach or to rule, it is expressly prouided, that no man shoulde without calling take vpon him a publike office in y Church. Therefore y a man may be judged a true minister of the Church, first he must be orderly called: then hee must answere his vocation, that is to say, take vpon him and execute the duttie specified to him. This we may oftentimes mark in Paul: which when he meaneth to approoue his Apostleship, in a manner alway with his faithfulnesse in executing his office hee allegeth his calling. If so great a minister of Christ dare not take vpon himselfe the authoritie that hee shoulde be hearing in the Church, but because hee both is appointed thereunto by the commaundement of the Lorde, and also faithfully performeth that which is committed vnto him: how great framefulnesse shall it be, if any man wanting both or either of these, shal challenge such honour to himselfe? But because wee haue aboue touched the necessitie of executing the office, nowe let vs entreate onely of the calling.

11 The discouer thereof standeth in four pointes: that wee shoulde knowe, what manner of ministers, howe, and by whom ministers ought to bee instituted, and with what vantage or what ceremonie they are to be admitted. If speake of the outward and solmeane calling, which belongeth to publike order of the Church: as for that secrete calling, whereof every minister is priuie in his owne conscience before God, and hath not the Church witnesse of it, I omitte it. It is a good witnesse of our hearts, that not by any ambition, nor couteousnesse, nor any other greedi desire, but with pure feare of God and zeale to edifie to the Church, wee receive the office offered vnto vs. That indeede is (as I haue saide) necessarie for every one of vs, if wee will approoue our ministerie allowable before God. Neuerthelesse hee is right-rightly called in presence of the Church, that commeth vnto it with an euil conscience, so that his wickednes be not open. They are wont also to say yt even private men are called to the ministerie, whome they see to be meete and able to execute it: because verily learning joyned with godlinesse and with the other qualities of a good Pastor, is a certaine preparation to the very office. For whome the Lord hath appointed to so great an office, he first furnisheth them with those armours that are required to fullfil it, that they shoule not come emptie and vnprepared vnto it. Whereupon Paul also to the Corinthians, when he meant to dispute of the verie offices, first rehearsed the gifts which they ought to have that execute the offices. But because this is the first of those nother pointes that I haue propounded, let vs now go forward vnto it.

12 What manner of Bishoppes it is meete to choose, Paul doth largely declare in two places, but the summe commeth to this effect, that none are to be choosen, but they that are of so sound doctrine, and of holy life, and not notable in any vice, which might both take away credite from them, & procure slander to the ministerie. Of Deacons and Elders there is altogether like consideration. It is alway to be looked vnto, that they bee not vnable or vnfit to beare the burden that is laide vpon them, that is to say, that they may be furnished with those powers that are necessary to the fulfilling of their office. So when Christ was about to sende his Apostles, he garnished them with those weapons and instrumentes which they could not want. And Paul when hee had painted out the image of a good and true Bishop, warned Timothie, that he would not defile himselfe with choosing any man that differeth from it. I refere this worde Howe, not to the Ceremonie of chooing, but to the reverent feare that is to be kept in the chooing. Herevpon come the fastings and prayers, which Luke reciteth that the faithfull vsed when they made Priestes. For whereas they understood that they medled with a most earnest matter, they durst attempt nothing, but with great reverence and carefulness. But they cheefly applied themselves to prayers, whereby they might crave of God the spirite of counsell and direction.

13 The thirde thing that we haue set in our division was, by whom ministers are to be chosen. Of this thing no certaine rule can bee gathered out of the institution of Apostles, which had some difference from the common calling of the rest. For because it was an extraordinarie ministerie, that it might be made discernable by some more notable marke, it behooved that they which should execute it, shoulde bee called and appointed by Lords owne mouth. They therefore tooke in hande their doing, beinge furnished by no mans election, but by the onely commandement of God & of Christ. Herevpon commeth that when the Apostles would put an other in the place of Judas, they durst not certainly name any one man, but they brought forth two, that the Lorde shoule declare by lot, whether of them hee woulde haue to succeede. After this manner also it is meete to take this, that Paul in Gal. 1. 12, denieth that he was create Apostle of men or by man, but by Christ & God the father. That first point, that is to say of men, he had common with all the Godly ministers of the worde. For no man coulde rightly take vppon him that execution, but he that were called of God. But the other poynte was was proper and singular to himself. Therefore when hee glorifieth of this, he doth not onely boast that he hath that which belongeth to a true & lawfull Pastor, but also bringeth forth the signes of his Apostleshippe. For when there were some among the Galathians, which travelling to diminish his authoritie, made him some meanes difciple, put in office under them by the principal Apostles: he, to defend in particular the dignitie of his preaching, which hee knewe to be shot at by those futile deceits, needed to shewe himselfe in all points nothing inferior to the other Apostles. Therefore he affirmeth that hee was chosen, not by judgement of men, like some common Bishoppe, but by the mouth and manifest Oracle of the Lord himselfe.

14 But no man that is sober will deny, that it is according to the order of lawful calling, that Bishops should be appointed by men: forasmuch as there are so many testimonies of the scripture for proofe thereof. Neither doeth that saying of Paul make to the contrarie, as it is saide, that hee was not sent of men, nor by men: forasmuch as he speaketh not there of the ordinarie choosing of ministers, but chalentge to himselfe that which was speciall to the Apostles. Howebeit God also so appointed Paul by himselfe by singular prerogative, that in the mean time hee vseth the discipline of Ecclesiasticall calling. For Luke reporteth it thus, when the Apostles were fasting and praying, the Holy Ghost said: Separate vnto me Paul and Barnabas to the worke to which I have seuerally chosen them. To what purpose served that separation and putting on of handes, sith the Holy Ghost hath testified his owne election, but that the discipline of the Church in appointing ministers by men, might be preferred: Therefore the Lorde could by no plainer example approue such order, than he did when having first declared that he had ordained Paul Apostle for the Gentiles, yet hee willeth him to be appointed by the Church. Which thinke we may see in the choosing of Mathias. For because the office of Apostlechippe was of so great importance, that they durst not by their owne judgement choose any one man into that degree, they did set two men in the midst, vpon the one of whom the lot should fall: that so both the election might have an open testimonie from heaven, and yet the policie of the Church should not bee passe over.

15 Nowe it is demanded whether the minister ought to bee chosen of the whole Church, or onely of the other of the same office, and of the Elders that have the rule of discipline, or whether he may be made by the authoritie of one man. They that give this authoritie to one man, allledge that which Paul faith to Titus: Therefore I have left thee in Creta, that thou shouldst appoint in every town: Priests. Againe to Timothie: lay not hands quickly vpon any man. But they are deceived if they thinke, either Timothie at Ephesus, or Titus in Creta, vseth a kingly power, either of the shold dispose all things at his owne will. For they were above the rest, only to goe before the people with good and holome counsels: not that they ouerly, excluding all other, should doe what they listed. And that I may not seeme to faine ame thing, I will make it plaine by a like example. For Luke reheareseth that Paul and Barnabas appointed priests in divers Churches: but hee also expresseth the order or manner howe, when hee faith that it was done by voices: voices: ordaining Priests (although he) by lifting up of hands in every Church. Therefore they two did create them: but the whole multitude, as the Greeks manner in elections, did by holding up their hands, declare whom they would have. Even in like manner the Romaine histories doe oftentimes say, that the Consul which kept the assemblies, created new officers, for none other cause but for that he received the voices and counted the people in the election. Truly it is not likely that Paul granted more to Timothee and Titus than he took to himself. But we see that he was wont to create Bishops by voices of the people. Therefore the places above are so to be understood, that they minish nothing of the common right & libertie of the Church. Therefore Cyprian sayeth well, when he affirmeth it is commeth from the authoritie of God, that the Priest should be chosen in presence of the people before the eyes of all men, and should by publicke judgement and testimonie be allowed for worthie and meete. For wee see, this was by the commandement of the Lord observed in the Leuiticall Priests, that before their consecration they should be brought into the sight of the people. And no otherwise is Mathias added to the fellowship of the Apostles: and no otherwise the seven Deacons were created: but the people seeing & allowing it. These examples (as Cyprian) do shewe, that the ordering of a Priest ought not to be done, but in the knowledge of the people standing by: that the ordering may be just and lawfull, which hath been examin'd by the witnesse of all. We are therefore come thus farre, this is by the word of God a lawfull calling of a minister, when they that seem meete are created by the consent & allowance of the people. And other pastors ought to beare rule of the election, that nothing be done amiss of the multitude either by lightnesse, or by evil affections, or by disorder.

16 Now remaineth the forme of ordering, to which we assigned the last place in the calling. It is euident that the Apostles vsed no other ceremonie when they admitted any man to the ministrie, but the laying on of hands. And I thinke that this vsage came from the manner of the Hebrues, which did as it were present vnto God by laying on of hands that which they would have blessed and hallowed. So when Jacob was about to bless Ephraim and Manasse, he laid his hands upon their heads. Which thing our Lord followed, when he prayed over the infants. In the same meaning (as I thinke) the Iewes, by the ordinance of the lawe, layde hands vppon the Sacrifices. Wherefore the Apostles by laying on of hands did signifie that they offered him to God, whome they admitted into the ministrie. Albeit they vsed it also upon them, to whom they applied the visible graces of the Spiritue. Howsoever it be, this was the solemn vsage, so oft as they called any man to the ministrie of the Church. So they consecrated Pastors and teachers, and so also Deacons. But although there be no certaine commandement concerning the laying on of hands, yet because wee see that it was continuallly vsed among the Apostles, their so diligent observing of it ought to be vs in stead of a commandement. And truly it is profitable, that by such a signe, both the dignitie of the ministrie shoulde be commended to the people, and so that he which is ordered shoulde be admonished, that he is not nowe at his owne libertie, but made bonede to God and the Church.

Moreover it shall not be a vaine signe, if it be restored to the natural beginning of it. For if the Spirit of God, hath ordained nothing in the Church in vaine, wee must thinke that this Ceremonie, if it proceed from him, is not unprofitable, so that it be not turned into a superstitious abuse. Last of all this is to be holden, that not the whole multitude did lay their handes upon the ministers, but the Pastors onely. Howbeit it is vnconcinse whether many did alwaye lay on their handes or no. But it is evident that that was done in the Deacons, in Paul and Barnabas, and a fewe other. But Paul himselfe in an other place reporteth, that he, and not many other, did lay his handes upon Timothee. I admonish thee (faith he) that thou receiue the grace which is in thee, by laying on of my handes. For, as for that which in the other Epistle is spoken of the laying on of the handes of the degree of Priests, I doe not so take it, as though Paul did speake of the company of the Elders, but I understannde by that wordes the vnie ordinance it selfe: as if hee had sayde: Make that the Grace, which thou haft receiued by laying on of hands when I did creat thee a priest, may not be voide.

The iiiij. Chapter.

Of the state of the olde Church, and of the maner of governinge that was in use before the Papace.

Hither we haue intreated of the order of governinge the Church, as it hath beene delivered vs out of the pure worde of God, and of the ministries, as they were instituted by Christ. Nowe that all these things may be more clearely and familiarly opened, and also be better fastened in our mindes: it shalbe profitable in these things to consider the forme of the olde Church, which shall represent to our eyes a certaine image of gods institution. For although the Bishops of those times did set forth many Canons, wherein they seemed to express more than was expressd in the holy Scripture; yet they with such heedfulnessse framed all their order after the onely rule of Gods worde, that a man may easily see that in this behalfe they had in a manner nothing disagreeing from the worde of God. But although there might be somewhat wanting in their ordinances, yet because they with fynecer zeale endeavoured to preserve Gods institution, and they swarved not much from it, it shalbe very profitable here shortly to gather what manner of observation they had. As we haue declared that there are three sortes of ministries commended vnto vs in the Scripture: so all the ministers that the olde Church had, it devided into three Orders. For out of the order of Elders were partly chosen Pastors and teachers: the rest of them had the rule of the judgement and correction of manners. To y Deacons was committed the care of the poore, and the distributing of y almes. As for the Readers and Acoluthes, were not names of certaine offices: but those whome they called Clerkes, they trained from their youth upward in certain exercises to serue the church, that they might the better understand to what purpose they were appointed, and might in time come the better prepared to their office: as I shall by & by shew more at large. Therefore Hierom, when when he had appointed five orders of the Church, reckoning up Bishops, Priests, Deacons, Bishops, and Cathedralmen to the rest of the Clergy and monks he gave no proper place.

2. Therefore to whom the office of teaching was enioyed, all them they named Priests. In every city they chose out of their own number one man, to whom they specially gave the title of Bishop; that distinctions should not grow of equalitie, as it is wont to come to passe, Yet the Bishop was not so above the rest in honor and dignitie, that he had a dominion over his fellows. But what office the Consul had in the Senate, to propound of matters, to aske opinions, to go before the other with counselling, monishing, and exhorting, to gouerne the whole action with his authority, and to put in execution that which is decreed by common counsell: the same office had the Bishop in the assembly of the Priests. And the olde wryters themselves confess, that the same was by mens content brought in for the necessitie of the times. Therefore Hierome upon the Epistle to Titus faith: The same was a Priest which was a Bishop. And before that by the institution of the Diuill, there were dissensions in religion, and it was laid among the people, I am of Cephas: Churches were governed by common counsell of Elders. Afterward, that the seeds of dissensions might be plucked vp, all the care was committed to one man. As therefore the Priests do know, that by custome of the Church they are subject to him that is set over them: so let the Bishops know, that they are above the Priests, rather by custome, than by the truth of the Lords disposing, and that they ought to gouerne the Church in common together. But in another place he teacheth, how auncient an Episod Eucharistic institution it was. For he saith that at Alexandria, from Marke the Evangelist even to Heraclius and Dionisius, the Priests did always choose out one of themselves, & set him in a hyer degree, whom they named a Bishop. Therefore every city had a company of Priests which were Pastors and Teachers. For they all did execute among the people that office of teaching, exhorting and correcting, which Paul appointeth to the Bishops: and that they might leave seede after them, they trauailed in teaching the younger men, that had profeeded themselves soundeours in the holy warfare. To every city there was appointed a certaine countrey, that should take their Priests from thence, and be accounted as it were into the bodie of that Church. Euerie company (as I haue before sayde) only for preseruation of Policy and Peace were under one Bishop: which was so about the rest in dignitie, that he was subject to the assemblie of his brethren. If the compasse of ground was under his Bishoprike was so great, that hee could not suffice to serve all offices of a Bishop in every place of it, in the countrey it selfe there were in certaine places appointed Priests which in small matters should execute his authority. Them they called countrey Bishops, because in the countrey they represented the Bishop.

3. But so much as belongeth to the office, whereof we now speake, as well the Bishops as the Priests were bound to apply the distributing of the worde and Sacraments. For it was ordained only at Alexandria, (because Arrius had there troubled the Church) that the Priest should not preach to the people, as Socrates sayth in the 9. booke of the Tripartite hystorie. Which yet

Hierome
Hierom confesseth that hee misliketh not. Truly it should be counted monstrous, if any man had giuen out himselfe for a Bishop, that had not also in very deed shewed himselfe a true Bishop. Therefore such was the feueritie of those times, that all ministers were driven to the fulfilling of such office, as the Lord requireth of them. Neither do I rehearse the manner of one age alone: For euem in Gregories time, when the Church was now almost decayed (certainly it was much degenerate from the antient pureness) it had not bin tolerable if any Bishop should abstinence from preaching. And in another place: When Paul confesseth that he is clean fro the bloud of all: in this saying we be convinced, wee be bounde, we be shewed to be gily, which are called Priests, which beside the euils that wee haue of our owne, adde also the deathes of other: because we kill so many as we being luke warme and silent do daily see to go to death. He calleth himselfe & other sillent, because they were les diligent in their work then they ought to be. Whè he dareth not them, y did halfe performe their duty: what thinke you he would have done, if a man had altogether stidle? Therefore this was a great while holden in the Church, that the chiefe duty of the Bishop was to feede Gods people with the word, or both publikly & priuatly to edifie the Church with sound doctrine.

4 But whereas every province had among their Bishops one Archbishop: also where in the Nicene Synode there were ordained Patriarches, which should in degree and dignity be about the Archbishops, that pertained to the preferring of discipline. Howbeit in this discourse, that which was most rarely vfed may not be omitted. For this cause therefore chieffely those degrees were ordained, that if any thing happened in any Church, that could not well be ended by a fewe, might be referred to a provinciall Synode. If the greatness or difficultie of the matter required a greater discussion, the Patriarches were also called to it with the Synodes, from whò there might be no appell but to a generall Counsell. The government so ordered many called a Hierarchie, by a name (as I think) vnproper, & truly vnued in the Scriptures. For the holy Ghost willed to provide, that no man, should dreame of a principallitie or dominion when y governement of the Church is spoken of. But if, leaving the word we looke upon the thing, we shall finde that the old Bishops meant to forge no forme of ruling the Church, differing from that which the Lorde appointed by his word.

5 Neither was the order of the Deacons at that time any other the it was under the Apostles. For they received the daily offerings of the Faithfull, and the yearly revenues of the Church, to bestow them upon true vses, that is to say, to distribute them to feede partly the ministers, and partly the poore: but by the appointment of the Bishop, to whome also they yearly rendered accounts of their distribution. For whereas the Canons doe every where make the Bishop distributer of all the goods of the Church, it is not so to bee understood, as though he did by himselfe discharge that care: but because it was his parte to appoint to the Deacon, who shoulde bee received into the common almes of the Churche, and of that which remained, to whome it should should be giuen, & how much to every one: because he had an overseing whether the Deacon did faithfully execute that which belonged to his office. For thus it is read in the canons which they acribe to the Apostles: Wee command that the Bishoppe haue the goods of the Church in his owne power. For if he be put in trust with the foules of men, which are more precious, much more it is meeke that he haue charge of money: so that by his power all things may be diuided to the poore by the Elders and Deacons: that they may be al ministred with fear and carefulnes. And in the Council of Antioche it is decreed, that the Bishoppes should be restrained that meddle with the goods of the Church, without the knowledge of the Elders and Deacons. But of that point we neede to make no longer disputacion, sith it is evident by many epiftles of Gregorie, that euene at that time, when other wise the ordinances of the Church were much corrupted, yet this observacion continued, that the Deacons should vnder the Bishop be the stewardes of the poore. As for Subdeacons, it is likeley that at the beginning they were ioyned to the Deacons, that they should vse their service about the poore: but that difference was by little and little confounded. But Archdeacons began then to be created, when the plentie of the goods, required a newe and more exact maner of disposing them: Albeit Hierome doth say, that it was euene in his age. In their charge was the summe of their reueneues, poffeffions, & store, and the collection of the daily offirings. Whereupon Gregory declareth to the Archdeacon of Salon, that he should be holden guiltie if any of the goods of the Church perished either by his fraud or negligence. But whereas it was giuen to them to read the Gospel to the people, & to exhort them to prayer; and whereas they were admitted to deliuer the Cup in the holy Supper, and was rather done to garnish their office, that they should execute it with the more reuence, when by such signes they were admonished that it was no profane baliwike that they exercised, but a spirituall function and dedicate to God.

Hereby also we may judge what vs there was, and what manner of distribution of the Church goods. Ech where both in the decrees of the Synodes, and among the old wryters it is to be found, that whatsoever the Church possesseth either in lands or in money, is the patrimonie of the poore. Therefore oftimes there this sone is sung to the Bishops and Deacons, that they should remember, that they meddle not with their owne goods, but the goods appointed to the necessitie of the poore: which if they vnfaithfully suppreffe or waft, they shalbe guiltie of bloud. Whereby they are admonished, with great feare & reuence, as in the sight of God, without respect of persons, to diuidite them to whom they be due. Hereupon also come those gracie protestations in Chrysostome, Ambroxe, Augustine, & other like Bishops, whereby they affirme their owne vertuyness to the people. But sith it is equitie, and esstablished by the law of the Lord, that they which em ploy their service to the Church, should bee fed with the common charges of the Church, and also many priestes in that age, confecrating their patrimonies to God, were willingly made poore: the diuiditing was such, that neither the minifters wanted sustenance, nor the poore were negletted. But yet in the meane time it was prouided, that the minifters themselves, which ought ought to give example of honest sparing to other, should not have so much, whereby they might abuse it to riotous excess or deliciousnes, but only where with to sustain their owne neede. For those of the Clergie (faith Hierome) which are able to live of the goods of their parents, if they take that which is the poorses, do commit sacrilege, and by such abuse they eate and drinke to themselues damnation.

7 First the ministration was free and voluntarie, whereas the Bishops and Deacons were of their own will faithful, and vprightness of conscience and innocencie of life were to them in stead of the lawes. Afterward when such examples grew of the greedinesse or peruerse affections of some, to correct those faults, the canons were made, which diuided the revenues of the Church into foure parts: of which they assigned one part to the of the Clergie, the second to the poore, the third to the maintenance and reparatiion of Churches, and other holy buildinges, the fourth to the poore as well strangers as of their owne countrey. For whereas the other canons, gave this last part to the Bishop, that varieth nothing from my abouesaid diuision. For they meane not that that part should be his owne, that either he himselfe alone should devoure it, or poore it out, upon whom or what he list, but that it should suffice to mainctine the Hospitallitie which Paul requireth of that order. And so doe Gelafius and Gregory expound it. For Gelafius bringeth no other reason why the bishop should chalenge any thing to himselfe, but that he might give it prisoners and strangers. And Gregory speakeketh yet more plainly. It is the maner (faith he) of the fea Apostololie, to give commandement to the Bishop when he is ordeled, that of all the revenue that ariseth, there be made foure portions: that is to say, the one to the Bishop and his family for Hospitallitie, and entertainment: the second to the Clergie: the third to the poore: the fourth to the repairing of Churches. Therefore it was lawfull for the Bishop to take nothing to his owne use, but so much as were enough for moderate and meane foode and clothing. If any began to exceed, either in riotous expense, or in ostentation & pompe, he was by & by repreffed by his fellowes, and if he obeyed not, he was put from his dignitie.

8 As for that which they bestowed vpon garnishing of holy things, at the first it was verie little. Afterward when the Church became somewhat richer, yet in that behalfe they stil kept a meane. And yet all the money that was bestowed thereupon, remained safe for the poore, if any greater necessitie happened. So when faminepossessed the province of Hierusalem, & the poore could not otherwise be relieved, Cyrilus sold the vessels & garments and spent them vpon sustentation of the poore. Likewise Acatius bishop of Amida, when a great multitude of the Persians, in a maner starved for hunger, called togither the Clergie, and when hee had made that notable oration, Our God needeth neither dishes nor cupsles, because he neither eateth nor drinkeeth, hee molt the vessels, to make thereof both meat and ranforme for men in misterie. Hierom also, when he inueyeth against too much gorgoeusness of temples, both with honour make mention of Exuperius bishop of Tholosa in his time, which caried the Lords bodie in a wicker basket, and his blood in glasse, but suffred no poore man to be hungie. That which I now sayd of Acatius, Ambrose rehearseth of himselfe. For when the Arrians char-charged him, for that he had broken the holy vessels to ransom prisoners, he cried thus most godly excuse: He sent the Apostles without gold, gathered cap. 18. Churches together without gold. The Church hath gold, not to keepe it, but to bestowe it, and to give reliefe in necessities. What neede is to keepe that which helpeth not? Do we not know, how much gold & silver the Assyrians took out of the temple of the Lorde? Doth not the Priest better to melt the for the sustenancce of the poore, if other relieves do fail, than an enemy a robber of God to bear them away? Will not the Lorde say: Why hast thou suffred so many neede to dy for hunger? and verily thou hadst gold whereof thou mightst have ministred them sustenancce. Why were so many led away captive, & not ransom? why were so many flaine by the enemy? It had bin better that thou shouldest saue the vessels of living men, than of metalles. To these thinges thou shalt not bee able to aunfwer. For what wouldst thou say? I feared left Gods temple should want garnishing. He would anfwer: Sacramentes require not gold: neither do those thinges plesse with gold are not bought with gold. The ransoming of prisoners is a garnishing of Sacramentes. In summe, we fee that it is most true which the same man sayeth in an other place, that whatsoeuer the Church then possessed was the store of the needie. Againe: that a Bishop hath nothing that is not the poore.

9 These that we have rehearsed were the ministeries of the Old Church. For the other of which the Ecclesiasticall writers make mention, were rather certaine exercises and preparations, than appointed offices. For those holy men, that they might leave a store for the Church after them, received into their charge, governance and discipline, young men which with the consent and authoritie of their parents, professed them selves souldiers of the spiritual warfare: and they so framed the from their tender age, that they should not come vnskilfull & rawe to the executing of their office. But all they that were instructed with such beginnings, were called Clerkes. I woulde in deede that some other proper name had rather beene giuen the. For this name grew in error, or of corrupt affection: for as much as Peter calleth the whole Church the Clergie, that is to say, the Lords inheritance. But the institution it selue was very holy and profitable, that they which would consecrate them selves & their service to the Church, should be brought vp under the keeping of the bishop, that none should minister to the Church, but he that were well informed aforehand, & that had from his very youth both sucked holy doctrine, and by sever discipline put in a certaine continuing qualitie of grauitie and holy life, & were estranged from worldly cares and were accustomed to spirituall cares & studies. But as yong fouldiers are by certaine counterpart skirmishes instructed to learne true and earnest fight, so there were also certaine rudimentes, whereby they were exercised while they were Clerkes, before that they were promoted to the very offices. Therefore first they committed to the Clerkes the charge to open and shut the Church, & they named them Officiij, doorkeepers. Afterward they called them Acoluthi, folowers, which waited vp on the Bishop in his hou hold servises, and did continually accompanie him, first for honors sake, & then that no suspicion should arise of the. Moreover that by little & little they might become known to the people, and get to themselues commendation: also that they might learn to abide the sight of all men, and to speake before all men: that being made priests, when they came forth to teach, they should not be abashed with shame: therefore place was appointed the to read in the pulpet. After this manner they were promoted by degrees, to shew proofe every one of their diligence in all their severall exercises, till they were made subdeacons. This only is my meaning, that those were rather grosse beginnings, than such offices as were accounted among the true ministers of the Church.

10 Wheras we said, the first and second point in the calling of ministers, are, what manner of men they ought to choose, & how great a religious carefullnes they ought to vs in that matter: wherein the olde Church hath folowed the prescribed order of Paul, & the examples of the Apostles. For they were wont to come together to choose the pastors with most great reverence, & careful calling upon the name of God. Beside this they had a forme of examination, whereby they tried the life & doctrine of them, that were to bee chosen by the rule of Paul. Only they somewhat offended herein with too great severitie, because they would require more in a Bishop than Paul required, & specially in process of time they required unmarried life. But in the other points their obseruation was agreeing with Pauls description. But in this which we made the third point, that is to say, who ought to institute ministers, they kept not alway one order. In olde time, none was receiued into a company of clerkes, without the consent of all the people: insomuch that Cyprian laboureth earnestly to excuse that he appointed one Aurelius to be a Reader without asking advise of the Church, because that was done beside the custome, though not without reason. For this he faith before: In ordering of clerkes, dere brethren, we are wont first to ask you advise, & by common counsell to wey the maners and deserings of evy one. But because in these lesser exercises there was not much peril: because they were chosen to a long prooue, & not to a great office, therefore the consent of the people therein effered to be asked. Afterward in the other degrees also, except the Bishop-priike, the people commonly left the judgement & choise of them to the Bishop and the priestes, that they shoulde examine who were meete & worthie: fauing peraduenture when new Priestes were appointed for paroches: for then it behooved that the multitude of that place namely should consent. Neither is it any maruel, that the people in this behalfe was little carefull in keeping their owne right: For no man was made a Subdeacon, that had not shewed a long prooue of himselfe in his being a Clerk, under that severitie of discipline, which then was vsed. After that he had beene tried in that degree, he was made a Deacon. From thence he came to the honor of priesthood if he had behaved himselfe faithfully. So no man was promoted, of whom there had not beene in deede a triall had many yeres before the eyes of the people. And there were many canons to punish their faultes: so the Church could not be troubled with cun Priestes or Deacons, vnles it neglected the remedies. Howbeit in the Priestes also there was alway required the consent of them of the same citie: which the verie first canon testifieth in the 67. distinction, which is fathered vpo Anacletus. Finally, all the admissions into orders were therefore done at certaine appointed times of the yeare, that no man shoulde priuily crepe in without the consent of the faithfull, or should with too much caineffe be promoted without witnessyes.

11 In choosing of Bishops the people had the libertie long preferued, that none should be thruff in that were not accepted of all. This therefore was forbidden in the counsell at Antioch, that none should be thruff in to them against their will. Which thing also Leo the first doth diligently conforme. Hereupon came these sayings: Let him be choosen, whom the Clergye, and the people, or the greater number shall require. Againe: Let him that shall beare rule over all, be chosen of all. For it must needs be, that he that is made a ruler being unnownen and not examined, is thruff im by violence. Againe, Let him be chosen, that is both chosen by the Clerkes, and desired by the people: and let him be confecrate by them of that Prouince, with the judgemen of the Metropolitane. The holy Fathers took so great heed that this libertie of the people should by no mean be diminished, that when the generall Synode gathered together at Constantinopel did order Nectarius, they would not do it without the allowance of the Clergy and people, as they testified by their epistle to the Synode of Rome. Therefore when any Bishop did appoint a successor to himselfe, it was not otherwise stablished vnlesse the whole people did conforme it. Whereof you have not onely an example, but also the very forme in Augustine in the naming of Eradius. And Theodorite, when hee rehearseth that Peter was named by Athanasius to be his successor, by and by addeth, that the order of Priests confirmed it, and the magistrat, and nobilitie, and the people approued it with their allowing shoue.

12 I grant in deede that this also was by very good reason stablished in the Counsell at Laodicea, that the Election shoold not be left to multitudes. For it scarcely happeneth at any time, that so many heads should wel ordre any thynge with one meaning: and commonly this is true, that the vnconcernt communitie is dividcd into contrarie affections. But for this peril there was vsed a very good remedie. For first the Clerkes onely did choosse: whom they had choosen they presentted to the Magistrate, or to the Senate and chiefes men of the people. They, after consultation hadde, if they thought the election good, confirmed it: if not, they did choose an other, whom they did rather allowe. Then the matter was moved to the multitude, although they were not bounde to those forejudgements, yet thereby they could the lesse be disordered. Or if they began at the multitude: that was don only to learne whom they did chiefly desire. When the desires of the people were heard, then they of the Clergy did chose him. So neither was it lawfull for the Clergy to appoint whom they lifted, neither were they bounde to obey the foolish desires of the people. Leo appointeth this order in an other place, when he sayeth: There are to be looked for, both the desires of the citizens, the peoples testimonies, the judgement of the honorable, and the election of the clerks. Againe, Let there be holden the testimonie of the honorable, the subscription of the clerkes, the consent of the order & community. No reason (sayth hee) sufficeth it to be otherwise done. And nothing else meaneth that decree of the Synode at Laodicea, but that the clergy and chiefe of the people, should not suffer themselves to be caried away by the vnwise multitude: but rather that with their wisedome and gravitie they should repress the peoples foolish affections, if at any time need should so require.
Of the outward means

13 This order of choosing was yet in force in the time of Gregory: and it is likely that it endured long after. There remaine many Epistles of his, that giue evident testimonie of this matter. For so oft as he hath to doe with the creating of any newe Bishop, he wrieth to write to the clergy, to the order, and to the people, & sometyme also to the ruler, according as the government of the citie is appointed. But if by reason of the disordered state of the Church, he committeth to any Bishop adjoyning, the charge of ouerseeing in the election, yet he alway requireth a solemn decree strengthened with the subscriptions of all. Yea and when there was one Constantius create Bishop at Milaine, and that many of the Milaneis were by reason of the invasion of the barbarous nations fled to Genua: he thought that the election could not otherwise be lawful, vnlesse they also were called together & gaue their assent. Yea there are not yet five hundred years past, since Pope Nicolas decreed thus of the election of the Bishop of Rome: that the Cardinal Bishops should beginne, then that they should ioyn to them the rest of the clergy, last of all that the election should be confirmed by the consent of the people. And in the ende he reciteth that decree of Leo, which I even nowe alledge, and commandeth it from thenceforth to bee in force. But if the malice of wicked men shalbe prevalent, that the clerkes to make a true election be compelled to departe out of the citie: yet he commandeth that some of the people be present with them. As for the Emperours consent, so farre as I can perceive, was required only in two Churches, that is, Rome and Constantinople: because there were the two states of the Empire. For whereas Ambrose was sent to Milaine with a power from Valentinian to gouern the election of the new Bishop: that was extraordinarily done, by reason of grievous factions wherewith the citizens then boyled among themselves. But at Rome in old time the Emperours authoritie was of so great force in creating of the Bishop: that Gregory sayeth, that hee was set by his commandement in the government of the Church: when yet by solemnme viole hee was deseased by the people. This was the manner, that when the clergy and the people had appointed any bishop, the clergy should forthwith move it to the Emperor, y he should either by his allowance confirm his election, or by disallowance vndoe it. Neither are the decrees that Gratian gathereth together, repugnante to this custome: wherein is nothing else sayd, but that it is in no wise to be suffred, that taking away the canonical election, a king should appoint a Bishop after his own lust: and that the Metropolitan should consecrate none that were so promoted by violent powers. For it is one thing to spoyle the Church of her right, that all should be transferred to the lust of one man: and an other thing to graunt this honour to a king or an Emperour, that by his authoritie he may confirm a lawfull election.

14 Now it followeth, that we entreat, with what forme the ministers of the Church were admitted into their office after election: this the Latines called Ordination or Consecration: the Greekes haue called it Cheirotonia, lifting of handes, and some time also Cheirothesia, laying on of handes. Howebeir Cheirotonia is properly called that kind of election, where mens consentes are declared by holding vp of their hands. There remaineth a decree of the Nicene councell, that the Metropolitane shoulde meete together with all the Bishops of the prouince to order him which is choosen. But if some of them be hindered either by length of the way, or by sickness, or by any ne-cessitie, that yet three at the leaft should meett: and that they that are absent shoulde by letters testifie their consent. And this Canon, when with discontinuance it grew out of vse, was afterwarde renewed with many Synodes. But all, or at least so many as had no excuse, were therefore commandedd to be present, that they might have the grater triall of the learning and manners, of him that was to be ordered: for the matter was not done without trial. And it appeareth by Cyprians words, that in the olde time they were wont not to be called after the election, but to be present at the election: & to this end they should be as it were governors, nothing should be troublesome done in their multitude. For where he faide the people haue power either to choose worthy Priests, or to refuse unworthy, win a little after he addeth: Wherefore according to vse, and of the Apostles, it is to be diligently kept & holden (which is yet holden vs also & in a maner throughout al prouin-ces) for the right celebration of orderings, if the Bishops adjoyning of the same prouince should come together to that people for which a governour is ordered, & that the Bishop be choosen in presence of the people. But when they were sometime slowly gathered together, and there was peril least some would abuse that delay to occasion of ambitious surving: it was thought that it should be enough if after the election made, they should meet and after allowance upon lawfull examination consecrate him.

15 When this was eche where done without exception, by little and little a divers manner grew in vse, that they which were chosen shoulde resort to the Metropolitane citie to fetch their ordering. Which came to passe rather by ambition, and by deprauation of the first institution, than by any good reason. And not long after, when the authoritie of the see of Rome was now increased, there came in place yet a worse custome, that the Bishops almost of all Italy should fetch their consecration from thence. Which wee may note out of the Epistles of Gregorie. Only a few cities, which did not so easily give place, had their auncient right preferred: as there is an example had of Mil-laine. Paraduenture the only Metropolitane cities kept their priviledge. For all the Bishoppes of the Prouince were wont to come together to the cheefe citie to consecrate the Archbishops. But the Ceremonie was laying on of handes. For I read of no other Ceremonies vscd: sauing that in the Solemn assemblie the Bishoppes had a certaine apparrell whereby they might bee distinctly known from other Priestes. They ordered also Priestes & Deacons with only laying on of handes. But every Bishop with the companie of priestes ordered his owne Priestes. But although they did all the same thing: yet because the Bishop went before, and it was all done as it were by his guiding, therefore the ordering was called his. Whereupon the old writers haue ofte this saying: that a Priest differeth from a Bishoppe in no other thing, but because he hath not the power of ordering.

The
The V. Chapter.

That the Olden forms of Government is utterly overthrown.

By the tyranny of the Papacy.

Now it is good to set before men's eyes the order of governing the Church that the sea of Rome and all the champions thereof do keep at this day, and the whole image of that Hierarchie which they continually haue in their mouth, and to compare it with that order of the first and olden Church which we have described: that by the comparison it may appear what manner of Church they haue, which vs this onely title to charge or rather to overthrow vs. But it is best to be ginne at Calling, that we see both who, and what manner of men, and by what order they be called to this ministry. And then afterwars we shall consider howe faithfully they execute their office. We will give the first place to Bishops: to whom I would to God this might be an honor, to have the first place in this discourse. But the matter itself doeth not suffer mee, once to touch this thing be it neuer so lightly, without their great shame. And yet I will remember, in what kinde of writing I am nowe occupied: and will not suffer my talle, which ought to bee framed onely to simple doctrine, to flow abroad beyonde due bonds. But let some one of the that have not vterly lost al shame, answer me, what manner of bishoppes are at this day commonly choosen. Truely it is nowe grown too much out of vs, to haue any examination had of their learning; but if there be had any respect of learning, they choose some lawyer that can rather brawl in a court, than preach in a Church. This is certain, that these hundred yeres there hath scarcely bin every hundredth man chosen that understand anything of holy doctrine. I doe not therefore spare the former ages, for that they were much better, but because we have nowe onely the present Church in question. If judgement be had of their manners, we shall finde that there have beene fewe or almost none, whom the olde Canons woulde not haue judged vnworthie. Hee that was not a dronkard, was a whoremonger: he that was also cleane from this wickednesse, was either a dyer, or a hunter, or dissolute in some parte of his life. For there be lighter faultes, which by the olde Canons doe exclude a man from being a Bishop. But this is a most great absurditie, that verie children scarcely tenne yeres old, are by the Popes grant made bishoppes. They are grown to such shamelesenes & sensles dulnes, that they dreaded not that extreme yea and monstruous wicked doing, which is vterly abhorrine from the verie sense of nature. Hereby appeareth howe religious their elections were, where the negligence was so careless.

2. Nowe in election, all that right of the people is taken away. Their desirings, their assentinges, their subseribinges, and all such things are vanished, the whole power is transferred to the Canons only. They bestowe the Bishopricke vpon whom they will, and afterwars bring him forth into the sight of the people, but to bee worshipped, not to bee examined. But Leo cryeth on the other side, that no reason suffereth it, and he pronounceth To Salvation.

ceth that it is a violent imposition. Cyprian, when hee teftifieth that it proceeded from the lawe of God that it shoule not bee done but by the consent of the people, sheweth that the contrary manner is repugnant to the worde of God. The decrees of so many Synodes do most feuerely forbid it to bee otherwife done: and if it be done, they command it to be void. If these things be true, there now remaineth in the Papacie no Canonical elecution, neither by Gods lawe nor by the Ecclesiasticall lawe. But although there were no other evil, yet how shall they be able to excuse this that they have so spoiled the Church of her right? But (say they) the corruption of times so required, that because in appointing of bishops, hatreds and affections more prevailed with the people and the Magistrates, than right and sounde judgement, therefore the rule thereof should be given to a fewe. Admit verily that this were the extreme remedie of a mischief in dispaire cafe. But thic the medicine itself hath appeared more hurtfull than the very disease, why is not this newe evil also remedied? But (say they) it is exactly prescribted to the Canons what they ought to followe in the election; but do we dout, but that the people in olde time did understand that they were bounde to most holy lawes, when they saw they had a rule set them by the worde of God, when they came together to choose a bishop? For that onely voice of God, whereby he describeth the true image of a bishop, ought worthily to bee of more value than infinite thoufands of Canons. But notwithstanding the people, corrupted with a most evil affections, had no regarde of the lawe or of equitie. So at this day though there be verie good lawes written, yet they remaine buried in papers. Yet for the most part it is vited in mens maners, yea and allowed as though it were done by good reason, that dronkardes, whoresmongers, dyers, are commonly promoted to this honor: (It is but little that faye) that bishoprike are the rewards of adulteries and bawdries. For when they are given but to hunters and falconers, it is to be thought to be gaily well bestowed. Any way to excuse so hainous indignity, it is too much wicked. The people (say I) had in old time a very good Canon to whome Gods worde prescribted, that a bishop ought to bee vnauproucable, a teacher, no fighter, &c. Why therefore is the charge of chooing removed from the people to these men? Because forsoth the word of God was not heard among the tumults & seditious partakings of the people. And why should it not at this day be removed againe from these men, which not only do breake all lawes, but casting away all Shame, do wantonly, couteously, ambitioufely, mingle and confound Gods and mens matters together?

3. But they ly, when they say, that this was devised for a remedy. We oft read that in old time Churches were in tumults at the chooing of bishops: yet neuer any man durft think of taking away the authority from the people. For they had other wayes whereby they might either prevent these faults, or amend them if they were already committed. But I wil tell what it is. When the people began to bee negligent in making the elections, and did cast that care upon the Priestes as little belonging to them, they abused this occasion to verify a tyranny to themselues, which afterwarde they stablished by new Canons set forth. As for their ordering, it is nothing else but a meere mockery. For the shew of examination that they there set out is so vaine and hun-
grey, that it wanteth even al colour. Therefore whereas in some places Princes have by couenant obtained of 5 bishops of Rome, that they themselves might name bishops, therein the Church suffered no new loss: because the election was taken away, only from the Canons, which had by no right violently taken it, or verily stolen it. Truely this is a most soule example, that out of the court are sent bishops to possesse Churches: and it should be 5 worke of godly Princes to abstaine from such corruption. For it is a wicked spoiling of the Church, when there is thrust vnto any people a bishop, whom they have not desired, or at left with free voice allowed. But vnorderly manner which hath long ago bin in the Churches, gau] occasion to Princes to take the presentation of bishops into their owne hands. For they had rather that it should be their gift, than those mens, to whom it nothing more belonged, and which did no leffe wrongfully abuse it.

4. Loe here is a noble calling, by reason whereof the bishops boast themselves to be the successors of the Apostles. But they say that the authoritie to create Priests belongeth to them only. But in this they most lewdly corrupt the old institution: because they doe not by their ordering create Priests to rule & feede the people, but Sacrifiers to Sacrifice. Likewise when they consecrate Deacons, they do nothing of their true & proper office, but they ordaine them only to certaine Ceremonies about the chalise & the pate. But in the Synode at Chaldcon, it is contrariwise decreed, that the orderings shold not be absolutely gien, that is to say, but that a place should be therewithall assigned to them that are ordered, where they shall exercise their office. This decree is for two causes verie profitable. First, that the Church shoulde not be burdened with superfluous charges: nor that that should be spent vp on idle men which should be gien to the poore: Secondly, that they which be ordered, shoulde thinke that they be not promoted to an honour, but that there is an office committed vnto them, to the execution whereof they are bounde by solemne protestation. But the Romish masters (which thinke that there is nothing in religion to bee cared for, but their bellie) first doe expounde title to be the revenue that may suffice to sustaine them, whether it be by their owne liuelyhood or by benefice. Therefore when they order a Deacon or a Priest, without taking care where they ought to minister, they give them the order, if they bee riche enough to finde themselves. But what man can admit this, that the title which the decree of the Counsell requireth, should be the yearely revenue for their sustenance? But nowe because the later Canons condemned the bishoppes with penaltie to finde them whom they had ordered without sufficient title, by this mean to restraine their too much easie admitting: there hath beeene also a littletie devised to mocke out this penaltie. For hee that is ordered, naming any title whatsoever it be, promiseth that he wilbe content therewith: by this shifte he is drivem from his action for his finding. I passe over a thousand fraudes that are herein vsed: that when some doe falsely name vaine titles of benefices, whereupon they can not make five shillings by yeare: other some vnder secret couenant do borow benefices, which they promise that they will by & by restore againe, but sometime they restore not at all. And such other mysteries.
5 But although these grosser abuses were taken away, is not this alway an absurditie, to appoint a Priest to whom you assigne no place? Also they order no man but to sacrifice. But the true ordinance of a Priest is, to be ca-led to the governement of the Church: and a Deacon to be called to the gathering of the almes: they doe indeede with many pompes shadowe their doing, that in the verie shew it may have a reverence among the simple. But among men that have their sounds wit, what can these disguisings avail, if there be no sound stuffe or truth vnderneath them? For they use ceremonies about it, either fetched out of Lewishines, or fained of them selues: which it were better to forbear. But of true examination, (for I nothing passe upon that shadowe which they retaine:) of the peoples consent, and of other things necessarie, they make no mention. I call a shadowe their foolish gesturings meeete to be laughed at, framed to a sonde and colde coun tering of antiquitie. The bishops have their deputies which before they may enquire of their learning. But whether they can read their masses whether they can decline a common noun, whether they shall light vpon in reading, conjugate a verb, or do know the signification of one word, for it is not necessary they be cunning enough to construe a verse. And yet they be not put back fro Priesthood which faile even in the childish rudiments, so that they bring any mony or commendation of favor. Of like sort it is, when they are brought to the altar to be ordered, it is asked thrice in a tongue not vnder-stood, whether they be worthie of that honour. One auniewereth (which neuer saw them:) but because nothing should want of the forme, he hath that part in the play.) They are worthie. What may a man blame in these re-rende fathers, but that with mocking in so open sacrileges, they doe withouthe flame laugh to fororne both God and men? But because they are in long possession thereof, they thinke that now it is lawfull for them. For whosoever dare once open his mouth against these so euident and so haynous wicked doings, he is forthwith haled by them to punishment of death, as though it were one had in old time disclosd abroad the holy mysteries of Cerces, would they do this if they thought that there were any God?

6 Nowe howe much doe they behaue themselves better in bestowing of benefices: which thing was once ioyned with the ordering, but nowe it is altogether separate? There is among them a diuere manner. For the Bishopes onely doe not conferre benefices: and in those whereof they are saide to haue the conferring, they haue not the full right; but other haue the presentation, and they receiue only the title of collation for honors faile. There are also nominations out of scholes, and resignations, either simple, or made for cause of exchange, commendatorie writings, presentations, and whatsoeuer is of that sort. But they also behaue themselves that none of them can prophes an other with any thing. So I affirmme, that scarcely euery hundredth benefice, is bestowed at this day in the papacie without Simonie, as the olde writers defined Simonie. I doe not say that they all buy them with readie monie: but shew me one of twentie that commeth to a benefice with out some by commendation, some either kinned or alliance promoteth, and some the authority of their parents: some by doing of pleasures doe get themselves favor. Finally benefices are givne to this ende, not to provide for.
Cap. 5. Of the outward meanes for the Churches, but for them that receive them. Therefore they call them benefices, by which words they doe sufficiently declare, that they make no other account of them, but as the benefical gifts of princes, whereby they either get the favour of their souldiers or reward their services. I omitt howe these rewards are bestowed uppon barbars, cooke, moile keepers, and fuch dreggishe men. And nowe judicall cours doe ring of no matters more, than about benefices, so that a man may say that they are nothing else but a pray cast afofe dogges to hunt after. Is this tollerable even to be heard of, that they should bee called Pastors, which haue broken into the possession of a Church as into a ferme of their enemie? y haue gotten it by brawling in the lawe? that haue bought it for monie? that haue deferved it by filthie services? which being children yet scantly able to speake, haue received it, as by inheritance from their uncles and kinmen, and some bastardes from their fathers?

Woulde euer the licentiousnesse of the people, though they had bene never so corrupt & lawleffe, haue gone so farre? But this is also more monftrous, that one man, (I will not say what maner of man, but truely such a one as cannot gouerne himfelfe) is fet to gouerne fieu or fife Churches. A man may fee in these daies in Princes courtes, young men that have three abbaties, two Bishoprikes, one Archbishoprike. But there bee commonly Canons with fieu, fixe or feuen benefices, whereof they haue no care at all, but in receving the reuenues. I will not obiect, that it is ehe where cried out against by the worde of God, which hath long agoe ceased to be of any estimation at all among them. I will not obiect, that there haue bene many moft feueres penall ordinances in manie councils made against this wickednesse: for thos also they boldly defiance as oft as they lift. But I say that both are monftrous wicked doinges, which are eterne against God and nature and his government of the Church, that one robber shall oppresse many Churches at once; and that he should be called a Pastor, which cannot be present with his flock, though he woulde: and yet (such is their shamefulness) they cover such abominable filthinesse with the name of the Church to deliver themselves from all blame. But also (and God will) in these lewdennesse is conteined that holy succession, by the merite whereof they boast that it is wrought that the Church may not perish.

Nowe (which is the seconde marke in judging a lawfull Pastor) let vs see howe faithfully they exercise their office. Of the Priests that be there created, some be Monkes, some bee (as they call them) Secullar. The ifte of these two companies was unkownen to the old Church: and it is so against the profession of Monkes, to have such a place in the Church, that in olde time when they were chosen out of Monasteries into the clergie, they ceased to be Monkes. And Gregorie, whose time had much dregges, yet suffered not this confusion to bee made. For he willed that they bee put out of the Clergie that be made Abbots, for that no man can rightly be together both a Monke and a clearer; yet the one is a hinderance to the other. Nowe if I ask, howe bee hee well filleth his office, whome the Canons declare to bee vnmeet, what I pray you, will they aunswere? They will forsooth alleadge unto none thos vnredly borne decrees of Innocent and Boniface, whereas by Monkes are so receiued into the honour and power of Priesthood, that they might still abide in their Monasteries. But what reason is this, that cun-try vnlearned ass, so foon as he hath once possessed the sea of Rome, may with one worde overthrowe all antiquitie? But of this matter we shall speake hereafter. Let this suffice for this time, that in the purer Church it was holden for a great abfurditie, if a Monke did execute the office of Priesthood. For Hierome fayeth that he doth not execute the office of a Priest, while he is conversant among Monkes, and maketh himfelfe one of the common people to be ruled by the Priests. But, although we graunt them this, what do they of their dutie? Of the mendicantes some do preache: all the other Monkes either sing or mumble vp masses in their dennes. As though either Christ willed, or the nature of the office sufferrth Priests to be made to this purpose. Whereas the Scripture plainly testifieth, that it is the priestes office to rule his owne Church, is it not a wicked prophanation, to turne an other way, yea utterly to change the holy institution of God? For when they are ordered, they are expressly forbidden to doe the things that God commandeth all priests. For this fong is song to them: let a Monke content w his cloifter, not presume to minifter the Sacramentes, nor to execute any thing belonging to publike office. Let them deny, if they can, that it is an open mockerie of God, that any priest should be made to this purpose, to abftraine from his true and natural office: and that he which hath the name, may not haue the thing.

9 I come to the secular priestes which are partly beneficed men, (as they call them) that is to say, haue benefices whereupon to live: and partly do let out their daily labour to hire, in maffing, or finging, and live as it were of a stipend gathered thereupon. Benefices haue either care of soules, as bishopries, and cure of paroches: or they be the stipends of deintie men, that get their luwing with finging, as prebendes, Canonhips, personages, and dignities, chaplainships, and fuch other. Howbeit, since things are nowe turned vpide downe, Abbates and priories are giuen to very boyes, by privilege, that is to say by common and vfitall custome. As concerning the hirelings, that get their luwing from day to day, what should they doe otherwise than they do? that is in fureile and shamefull maner to giue out them selues for gaine, specially fith there is a great multitude as nowe the worlde swarmeth with. Therefore when they dare not beg openly, or forasmuch as they thinke they fhould but fitle profite that way, they go about like hungrie dogges, and with their importunacie, as with barking, they enforce out of men against their wifes somewhat to thurft into their belly. Here if I would go about to exprefse in worde, how great a difhonor it is to the Church, the honor and office of priesthood is come to this point, I shoulde haue no ende. Therefore it is not meete that the readers shoulde looke for at my hande such a long declaration as may be proportionall to fo hainous indignitie. Briefely I fay, if it be the office of priesthood, (as the worde of GOD prescribeth, and the auncient canons require) to feede the Church, and to gouverne the spirittuall kingdome of Christ: all such sacrifecers as haue none other worke or wages, but in making a market of masses, are not enely idle in their office, but also haue no office at all to exercife. For there is no
Of the outward means placed assigned them to teach: they have no flocke to ouerne: Finally, there is nothing left to them, but the altar, wherupon to sacrifice Christ: which is not to offer to God, but to diuels, as we shal see in another place.

10 I do not here touch the outward faultes, but only the inwarde cuill, which sticketh fast by the roote in their institution. I will adde a saying, which will found ill in their care; but because it is true, I must speake it; that in the same degree are to be accounted Canons, Deanes, Chaplines, Provoftes, and all they that are fedde with idle benefices. For what service can they do to the Church? For they have put from themselves the preaching of the worde, the care of discipline, and ministration of Sacramentes, as too much troublesome burdens. What then have they remaining, whereby they may boast themselves to be true priests? Singing forsooth, and a pomp of Ceremonies. But what is that to the purpose? If they allcage custome, or fe, if prescription of long time: I againe on the other side do lay vnto them the definition of Christ, where by he hath expressed vnto vs both true priests, and what they ought to haue that will be accounted such. But if they cannot beare so harde a lawe, to submit themselves to Christes rule; at the least let them suffer this matter to be determined by the authoritie of the Primitive Church. But their case shalbe noother the better, if their state be judged by the olde canons. They that haue degenerate into Canons, should haue become priests, as they were in olde time, that should rule the Church in common with the Bishop, and be as it were his companions in the office of Pastor. Those Chapter dignities as they call them, do nothing at all belong to the governing of the Church: much leffe, chapleinships, and the other dregges of like names. What account then shaull we make of them all? Truely both the worde of Christ, and the vsage of the Church excludeth them from the honour of priesthood. Yet they stiffly holde that they be priests: but wee must plucke of their vsage: so shaull we finde, that their whole profession is so strange and farre remoued from that office of priests, both which y Apostles describe vnto vs, and which was required in the primitive church. Therefore all such orders, with what titles soever they be notified, sith they be newe, being verily neither uphelden by the institution of God, nor by y auncient vsage of the Church, ought to have no place in the description of the spirituall government, which the Church hath received confectrate with the Lordes owne mouth. Or (if we will rather have me to speake more simly and grosse) for as much as chaplaines, canons, Deanes, Provostes, and other idle bellies of the fame sorte, do not so much as with their little finger touch any small parcel of that office, which is neceffarily required in priests, it is not to bee suffied, that in wrongfully taking a false honour upon themselves, they should break the holy institution of Christ.

11 There remaine Bishopps, and perions of Parochez: who, I woulde to God they did strive to receine their office. For wee woulde willingly grant vnto them, that they have a godly and excellent office, if they did execute it. But when they will be accounted Pastors, while they forfake the Churches committed to them, and cast the care of them vpon other, they doe as if it were the Pastors office to doe nothing. If an other that never stired his foote out of the citie, woulde profeile himselfe a plowman, or a keeper of a vine-vineyard: if a soulidour that had bene continually in the bataille and in the camp, and had never scene judicall court or bookes, would boast himselfe for a lawyer, who could abide such stinking folies? But these men do somewhat more abusidly, that will seeme and be called lawfull Pastors of the Church, and yet will not be so. For howe many a one is there, that doeth so much, as in theew, exercise the government of his Church? Many doe all their life long devoure the reveuues of Churches, to which they never come so much as to looke vpon them. Some other do once by yeare either come themselues, or sende their rewardes, that nothing should bee loft in the letting to farme. When this corruption first crept in, they that would enjoy this kind of vacacion, exempted themselues by privileges: nowe it is a rare exemple, to have one resident in his owne Church. For they esteeme them none otherwise than farmes, ouer which they set their vicars as bailies or farmers. But this very natural reason reiecteth, that he should be pastor of a flocke, that neverSee one shepe thereof.

12 It appeareth that eu'n in the time of Gregorie, there were certaine seeds of this multchiefe, that the rulers of Churches, began to be negligent in teaching: for he doeth in one place grievously complain of it. The world (sayeth he) is full of priests: but yet in the harvest there are seldom workers: because in deed wee take vpon us the office of priest, but we fulfill not the worke of the office. Again, because they have not the bowels of charitie, they will seeme Lords: they acknowledge not themselves to bee fathers. They change the place of humilitie into the aduaning of lordliness. Again, but what do we, O pastours, which receive the rewardes, and are no workmen? We are fallen to outwarde busineffe, and wee take in hande one thing, and performe an other. We leave the minitery of preaching: and to our punishment, as I see, we are called Bishops, that keep the name of honour and not of vertue. Sith he vseth so great sharpenesse of wordes against them, which were but leffe continuving and leffe diligent in their office: What I pray you, would he say, if he sawe of the Bishops almost none, or truely very fewe, and of the rest scarcely euery hundreth man once in all his life to goe vp into a pulpit? For men be come to such madness, that it is commonly counted a thing too base for the dignitie of a Bishoppe, to make a sermone to the people. In the time of Bernard, thinges were somewhat more decayed: but we see also with howe sharpe chidings he inuicteth against the whole order: which yet it is likely to have bene much purer than it is nowe.

13 But if a man doe well wye and examine this outwarde forme of ecclesiasticall government that is at this day vnder the papacy, he shall finde that there is no thewth corner werenin robbers do more licentiously range without lawe and measure. Truely all thinges are there so unlike the institution of Christ, yeas so contrary to it, they are so degenerate from the auncient ordinances and manners of the Church, they are so repugnant to nature and reason, that there can be no greater iniurie done to Christ, than when they pretend his name to the defence of so disordered government. Wee (say they) are the pillers of the Church, the chiefe Bishoppes of religion, the vicars of Christ, the heads of the faithfull: because the power of the Apostles is by is by succession come unto vs. They are alway bragging of these follies, as though they talked vnto stocks. But so oft as they shall boast of this, I will ask of them againe, what they have common with the Apostles. For wee speake not of any inheritably descending honour that may be giuen to men euen while they lie sleeping: but of the office of preaching, which they so much flee from. Likewise when we affirm that their kingdome is the tyrann ny of Antichrist, byandby they aunswere, that it is that reuerende Hierar chic, so oft praised of notable and holy men. As though the holy fathers, when they commended the Ecclesiastical Hierarchie or spiritual governem tment, as it was delivered them from hande to hande from the Apostles, did dreame of this mishapen and waste disordered heape, where the Bishops are for the most part, either rude athes, which know not the verie first & com mon principles of faith, or sometime children yet newe come from y nourse: and if any be learned (which yet is a rare example) they thinke a Bishop-rike to be nothing els but a title of gloriosnesse and magnificence: where the persons of Churches thinke no more of feeding the flocke, than a shoe maker doth of plowing: where al things are confounded with more than Ba bilonicall dispersing, that there remaineth no more any one steppe whole of that ordinance of the Fathers.

What if we descende to their maners? where shalbe that light of the world, which Christ requireth? where is the salt of the earth? where is that holinesse, which may be as a perpetual rule to judge by? There is no degree of men at this day more ill spoken of for riot, wantonnesse, deceit, and all fracions, which are become to be nothing els but a title of gloriosnesse and magnificence: where the persons of Churches thinke no more of feeding the flocke, than a shoemaker doth of plowing: where all things are confounded with more than Babylonicall dispersing, that there remaineth no more any one steppe whole of that ordinance of the Fathers.

14 What if we descende to their maners? where shall be that light of the world, which Christ requireth? where is the salt of the earth? where is that holiness, which may be as a perpetual rule to judge by? There is no degree of men at this day more ill spoken of for riot, wantonness, deceit, and all fracions, which are become to be nothing else but a title of gloriosness and that ordinance of the Fathers.

15 Now let the Deacons come forth, and that most holy distributing that they have of the goods of the Church. Howbeit they do not now create their Deacons to that purpose, for they enjoyne them nothing els but to mi nistrate at the altar, to read & sing the Gospel, and do I wote not what trifles, Nothing of the almes, nothing of the case of the poore, nothing of all that function which they in olde time executed. I speake of the very institution.
For if we have respect what they do, in deed it is not to them an office, but only only a steppe toward priesthood. In one thing, they that keepe the Deacons place at the maffe, do represent a void image of antiquitie. For they receive the offerings before the consecration. This was the ancient manner, that before the communion of the Supper, the faithfull did kisse one another, and offer their almes at the altar: so first by a signe, and afterwards by very liberallitie they shewed their charitie. The Deacon, that was the poore mens steward, receiued that which was giuen, to distribute it. Now of those almes, there commeth no more to the poore, than if they were throwen into the sea. Therefore they mocke the Church with this lying Deaconrie. Truely therein they haue nothing like, neither to the institution of the Apostles, nor to the auncient vslage. But the very distribution of the goods they haue conveyed another way: & haue so framed it, nothing can be devised more vnorderly. For as theeues, when they haue cut mens throte, do deuide the pray among them: so these, after the quenching of the light of God word, as though the Church were flame, do thinke whatsoeuer was dedicate to holy vses is laide for pray and spoile. Therefore making a diuision, euery one hath snatched to himselfe as much as he could.

16 Here all these old orders, that we haue declared, are not onely troubled, but vterly wiped out and rafed. The Bishops and priestes of cities, which being made riche by this pray, were turned into canons, haue made hauocke of the chiefe part among them. But it appeareth that the partition was vnorderly, because to this day they strive about the bounds. Whatsoeuer it be, by this diuision it is prouided, that not one halpseny of the goods of the Church should come to the poore, whose had bene the halfe parte at least. For the canons do giue them the fourth part by name: and the other fourth part they do therefore appoint to the Bishops, that they shoulde bestowe it vpon hospitableitie, and other duties of charitie. I speake not what the clerkes ought to do with their portion, and to what use they ought to bestowe it. For we haue sufficiently declared, that the rest which is appointed for temples, buildings and other expenses, ought to be open for the poore in necessitie. I pray you, if they had one sparke of the feare of God in their hart, would they abide this burden of conscience, that all that they eate, & wherewith they be clothed, commeth of theft, yea of sacrilege? But if they are little moved with the judgement of God, they should at leaft thinke, that those be men endued with wit and reason, to whom they would persuade, that they haue so goodly & well framed orders in their Church, as they are wont to boaste. Let them aunswere mee shortly, whether deaconrie be a licence to steale and robbe. If they denie this, they shall also be compelled to confess, that they haue no deaconrie left: for as much as among them, all the disposition of the goods of the Church is openly turned into a spoiling full of sacrilege.

17 But here they vse a verie faire colour. For they say, that the dignitie of the Church is by that magnificence not vncomly vpholden. And they haue of their fect some so shamelesse, they dare openly boaste, that so onely are fulfilled those prophecies, whereby the olde Prophets describe it gloriousnesse of the kingdom of Christ, when that kingly gorgousnes is scene in his pristly order. Not in van (say they) God hath promised these things to

hence Church: Kings shall come, they shall worship in thy sight, they shall bring thee gifts. Arise, arise, cloth thee with thy strength, O Zion: cloth thee with the garments of thy glory, O Jerusalem: All shall come from Saba, bringing gold and incense, and speaking praise to the Lord. All the cattell of Cedar shall be gathered together to thee. If I hold my tongue long upon confessing this lewdness, I fear lest I should seeme sone. Therefore will I not lose words in vain. But I ask: if any leue would abuse these testimonies, what solution would they give? Verily they would reprehende his dulnesse, for that he transferred those things to the flesh and the world, that are spiritually spoken of the spiritual kingdom of Christ. For we knowe, that the Prophets, under the image of earthly things, did paint out unto vs the heavenly glory of God, that ought to shine in the Church. For the Church had never lesse abundance of these blessings, which their words expresse, than in the time of the Apostles: and yet all confesse, that the force of the kingdom of Christ then chiefly flourished abroade. What then means these sayinges? Whatsoever is any where precious, hie, excellent, it ought to be made subject to the Lord. Where as it is namely spoken of kings, that they shall submit their scepters to Christ, that they shall throw down their crownes before his feet, that they shall dedicate their goods to the Church: when (will they say) was it better & more fully performed, than when Theodosius, casting away his purple robe, leaving the ornaments of the empire, as some one of the common people: submitted himselfe before God and the Church, to solemne penance? then when he & other like godly princes bestowed their endeavours and their cares to preserve pure doctrine in the Church, and to cherish & defende sound teachers? But how priests at that time exceeded not in superfluous riches, that only sentence of the Synode at Aquileia, where Ambrose was chiefe, sufficiently declareth: Glorious is pouerius in the priestes of the Lord. Truely the Bishops had at that time some riches, wherewith they might have set out the Churches honor, if they had thought those to be the true ornamentes of the Church. But when they knew there was nothing more against the office of Pastors, than to glitter & flue them selves proudly with daintinesse of fare, with gorgeousnes of garments, with great traine of servantes, with stately palaces, they followed and kept the humblenes and modestie, yea the very pouerius which Christe holyly appointed among his minifters.

18 But that wee may not be too long in this point, let vs againe gather into a short summe, howe farre that dispensation or dispiation of any goods of the Church, that is now vset, differeth from the true deaconrie, which both the worde of God commendeth vnto vs, and the auncient church observed. As for that which is bestowed vpon the garnishing of temples. I say it is ill bestowed, if that measure be not vset, which both the verie nature of holy thinges appointeth, and the Apostles and other holy fathers have prescribed both by doctrine and examples. But what like thing is there seene at this day in the temples? whatsoever is framed, I will not say after that auncient sparing, but to any honest meanes it is rejected. Nothing at all pleaseth, but that which favoureth of riot and the corruption of times. In the meanes time they are so farre from hauing due care of the lively temples, this that they would rather suffer many thousandes of the poore to perish for hunger, than they would break the leaft chalice or cruets, to relieue their neede. And that I may not pronounce of my self any thing more greciously against them, this onely I would have the godly readers to thinke vpon: if it should happen that fame Exuperius bishop of Tholoa, whom we even now rehearsed, or Acarius, or Ambrose, or any such to be raised from death, what they would say. Truely they would not allowe that into great necessitie of the poore, riches in a manner superfluous should bee turned another way. Admit I speake nothing how these vses vpon which they be bestowed (although there were no poore) are many ways hurtfull, but in no behalfe profitable. But I leave to speake of men. These goods are dedicate to Chrift: therefore they are to be disposed after his will. But they shall in vaine saye, that this part is bestowed vpon Chrift, which they have wafted otherwise than he commanded. Howbeit, to confesse the truth, there is not much of Chrift's ordinary reveue of the Church abated for these expenses. For there are no bishoprikes so welthie, no abbaties so fatte, finally neither so many, nor so large benefices that may serue to fill the gluttony of priests. But while they fecke to spare the-selues, they perwade the people by superflition, to turne that which should be bestowed vpon the poore, to builde temples, to sette vp images, to buy Jebels, to gette costly garments. So with this gulfse are the daily almes consumed.

19 Of the reveue, that they receive of their landes and possession, what else shall I say, but that which I haue already sayde, and which is before all mens eyes? We see with what faithfullnes they which are called bishops and Abbors do dispose the greatest part. What madneffe is it, to fecke here for an ecclesiasticall order? Was it meere that they, whose life ought to haue been a singular example of frugalitie, modestie, continence, and humilitie, should contend with the royaltie of princes in number of goods, in gorgioufnesse of houses, in deintinesse of apparel and fare? And howe much was this contrary to their office, that they, whom the eternall and inviolable commandement of God forbideth to bee desirous of filthy gaine, and biddeth to be content with simple living, should not onely laye handes vpon townes and castles, but also violently enter vpon the greatest lordhippems, finally possess forcably very empires? If they despise the worde of God: what will the people, vpon the occasions decrees of the Synodes: whereby it is decreed that the bishop should haue a small lodging not far from the Church, meane fare and howshoule stuffe: what will they saye to that praise of the Synode at Aqulaie: where povertie is reported glorious in the Priests of the Lorde? For perhaps they will vriterely refuse as too muche rigoroues, that which Hierome addideth Nepotianus, that poore men and strangers, and among them Chriftes as a guest, may knowe his table. But that which he by and by addeth, they will be ashamed to denye, that it is the glory of a bishop to prouide for the goods of the poore: that it is the fame of all prietes to studie for their owne richesse. But they can not receeue this, but they must all condemne themselfes of shame. But it is not needesfull in this place to speake more hardely against them, fith my meaning was nothing else, but to shewe, that among them the lawfull order of deaconrie is long ago taken away: that they may no more glory of this title to the condemnation of their Church: which I think I have already sufficiently showed.

The vi. Chapter.
Of the Supremacie of the Sea of Rome.

Hitherto we have rehearsed those orders of the Church, which were in the government of the olde Church: but afterwarde corrupted in times, and from thencefoorth more and more abused, doe nowe in the Popish Church reteine onely their name, and in deede are nothing else but visours: that by comparison the godly reader might judge, what manner of Church the Romanistes haue, for whose sake they make vs schismatikes, because we have departed from it. But as for the head and toppe of the whole order, that is to say, the supremacy of the sea of Rome, whereby they travaile to prooue that they onely haue the catholike Church, we haue not yet touched it: because it tooke beginning neither from the institution of Christe, nor from the use of old Church, as those former parts did: which we have shewed to haue so proceeded from antiquitie, by wickednes of times they are utterly degenerate, and haue put on altogether a newe forme. And yet they go about to perswade the worlde, that this is the chiefe and in a manner only bonte of the vnity of the Church, if we cleawe to the sea of Rome, and continue in the obedience thereof. They reft (I say) principally vpon this stay, when they will take away the Church from vs, and claime it to themselves, for they keep the head, vpon which the vnity of the Church hangeth, and without which the Church must needs fall a funder and be broken in peeces. For thus they thinke, that the Church is as it were a maimed and headlesse body, vnlesse it be subiect to the sea of Rome, as to her head. Therefore when they talke of their Hierarchie, they alway take their beginning at this principle: that the bishop of Rome (as the vicar of Christ, which is the head of the Church) is in his stead President of the vniversall Church: and that other wise the Church is not well ordered, vnlesse that Sea do holde the Supremacy above all other. Therfore this alfo is to be examin'd of what sort it is: that we may omit nothing that pertaineth to a just government of the Church.

2. Let this therefore be the principal point of the question: Whether it be necessary for the true forme of Hierarchie (as they call it) or ecclesiastical order, that one Sea should be above the other both in dignitie and in power, that it may be the head of the whole body. But we make the Church subiect to too vnjust lawes, if we lay this necessity vpon it, without the word of God. Therefore if the aduersaries will prove which they require, they must first shewe that this disposition was ordeined by Christ. For this purpose they alledge out of the law the hierarchy, and the judgement, which God did institute at Hierusalem. But it is easie to give a solution, and that manie ways, if one way do not satisfy them. First no reason compelleth to extend that to the whole world, which was profitable in one nation: ye rather, the order of one nation and of the whole worlde shall be farre different. Because:
Because the Jews were on either side compassed with idolaters: y they should not be diversely drawn with variety of religions, God appointed the place of worshipping him in the midstparte of the lande: there he ordained other them one heade Bishoppe, whom they should have al regard vnto, that they might bee the better kept together in vnite. Nowe when religion is sped abroade into the whole worlde, who doeth not see that it is altogether an absurditie, that the government of the East & West be given to one man? For it is in effect as much as if a man should affirme that the whole worlde ought to bee governed by one ruler, because one piece of lande hath no more rulers but one. But there is yet another reason, why that ought not to be made an example to be followed. No man is ignorat that hee Bishop was a figure of Christ. Now, since the Priesthood is removed, ye right must also be removed. But to whom is it removed? Truely, not to the Pope (as he himselfe is so bold shamelessly to boast) when he draweth this title to himself: but to Christ, which as hee alone susteyneth this office, without any vicar or successor, so hee resigneth the honour to none other. For the Priesthood consisteth not in doctrine onely, but in the appeasing of God, which Christ hath fully wrought by his death, & in that intercession which he now vseth with his father.

3 There is therefore no cause why they should binde vs by this example, as by a perpetuall rule, which wee haue scene to bee enduring but for a time. Out of the newe Testament they haue nothing to bring forth for proofe of their opinion, but that it was sayde to one: Thou art Peter, and vpon this stone will I builde my Church. Agayne, Peter, Loue thou me? Feede my sheepe. But admitting that these be strong proues, they must first shewe, that hee which is commaunded to feede the flocke of Christe, hath power committed to him over all Churches: and that to binde and to loose is nothing else but to bee ruler of all the worlde. But as Peter had received the commandement of the Lord, so hee exhorteth all other priests to feede the Church. Hereby wee may gather, that by this sayeing of Christ, there was either nothing given to Peter more than to the rest, or that Peter did egally communicate with other the power that he had receiued. But, that we striue not vainely, wee haue in an other place a cleare exposition out of the mouth of Christ, what is to binde and loose: that is to say, to reteyne and to forgive sinnes. But the manner of binding and losing, both whole Scripture eche where sheweth, and Paul very well declareth, when he faith that the ministers of the Gospell, haue commandement to reconcile men to GOD, and also haue power to punishe them that refuse this benefite.

4 Howe shamefully they wret them those places, that make mention of binding and loosing, I both haue already shortly touched, and a little after I shall haue occasion to declare more at large. Nowe it is good to see onely, what they gather of that famous aunswere of Christ to Peter. Hee promised him the keyes of the kingdom of heaven: he faide that whatsoever he bounde in earth, shoulde be bounde in heauen. If we agree upon the word keyes, and the manner of binding, all contention shall by and by cease. For the Pope himselfe will gladly give ouer the charge injoyned to the Apostles, postles, which being full of trauell and greefe, shoulde shake from him his pleasures, without gaine. For as much as the heauens are opened unto vs by the doctrine of the Gospell, it is with a verie fit metaphor exprefed by the name of keyes. Now men are bounde and loosed in no other wife, but when faith reconcilith some to God, and there owne beleefe bindeth other some. If the Pope did take this only vpon him: I thinke there will be no man that would either enuie it or strive about it. But because this succession being trauellsome and nothing gainefull pleafeth not the Pope, hereupon groweth the beginning of the contention, what Christ promifed to Peter. Therefore I gather by the very matter it selfe, that there is nothing meant by the dignitie of the office of an Apostle, which cannot be fequest from the the charge. For if that definition which I have rehearsed, be received (which cannot but shamelessly be rejected) here is nothing gien to Peter, y was not also common to his other fellows: because otherwise there should not only wrong be done to the persons, but y very maiestie of doctrine shoulde halt. They cry out on the other side: what anayleth it, I pray you, to run vp this rocke? For they shall not prove, but as the preaching of one name gospell was enioyed to all y Apostles, fo they were also al alike furnished y power to bind & loo fe. Christ (lay they) appointed Peter Prince of y whole church, when he promifed that he would give him the keyes. But y which he then promisef to one, in an other place he gave it also to all the rest, and deliuered it as it were into their hands. If the same power were graunted to a1, which was promised to one, wherein shall he be about his fellows? Herein (lay they) hee excelleth, because he received it both in common together with them, and seuerally by himselfe, which was not gien to the other, but in common. What if I aunfwere with Cyprian and Augustine, that Christ did it not for this purpose, to prefer one man before other, but to set out the vnitie of y Church. For thus faith Cyprian, that God in the person of one gaue y keyes to all, to signifie the vnitie of all: and that the rest were the same thing that Peter was, endued with like partaking both of honor & power: but y the beginning is taken at vnitie, that the Church of Christ may bee shewed to bee one. Augustine faith: If there were not in Peter a mysterie of the Church, the Lorde woulde not saie to him, I will giue thee the keyes. For if this was saie to Peter, the Church hath them not: but if the Church have them, the Peter, when receiued the keyes, betokened the whole Church. And in an other place. When they were all aske, onely Peter aunswered, thou arte Christ: and it is saide to him, I will giue thee the keyes, as though he alone had receiued the power of binding and loosing; whereas both hee being one saide that one for al, and he receiued the other with al, as bearing the person of vnitie. Therefore one for all, because there is vnitie in all.

But this, Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke I will build my Church, is no where red spok to any other. As though Christ spake there any other thing of Peter, than y which Paul and Peter himselfe speaketh of al Christi ans. For Paul maketh Christ the cheefe and corner stone, vpon which they are buldeth together that growe into a holy temple to the Lord. And Peter biddeth vs to bee buckly stones which being founded vpon that chosen & precious stone, doe by this ioniunt and coupling together with our GOD, cleave cleau also together among our felues. He (say they) about the rest: because he hath the name peculiarly. Indeede I doe willingly graunt this honour to Peter, that in the building of Church hee be placed among the first, or (if they will haue this also) the first of all the faithfull: but I will not suffer them to gather thereupon, that he shoulde haue a Supremacie ouer the rest. For what manner of gathering is this? Hee excelleth other in feruennentie of zeale, in learning, and courage: therefore he hath power ouer them. As though we might not with better colour gather, that Andrewe is in degree before Peter, because hee went before him in time, and brought him to Christ. But I passe ouer this. Let Peter truely haue the first place: yet there is great difference betweene the honour of degree and power. We see that the Apostles commonly graunted this to Peter, that hee shoulde speake in assemblies, and after a certayne manner go before them with propounding, exhorting, and admonishing: but of his power we read nothing at all.

6 Howbeit we be not yet come to dispute of that point: onely at this present I woulde prooue, that they doe too fondly reaun, when by the one-ly name of Peter they would build an Empire ouer the whole Church. For those olde follies wherewith they went about to deceiue at the beginning, are not worthie to be rehearsed, much lesse to be confuted, that the Church was builded vpon Peter, because it was faide vpon this rocke, &c. But some of the Fathers haue so expounded it. But when the whole Scripture crieth out to the contrarie, to what purposse is their authoritie alleaged against God? Yea, why doe we striue about the meaning of these worde, as though it were darke or doubtfull, when nothing can bee more plainely nor more certainly spoken? Peter had confesed in his owne and his brethrens name that Christ is the Sonne of God. Vpon this rocke Christ buildeth his Church: because it is (as Paul sayth) the onely foundation, beside which there can be layde none other. Neither doe I here therefore refuze the authoritie of the Fathers, because I want their testimonies, if I listed to alleadge them: but (as I haue faide) I will not with contending about so cleare a matter trouble the readers in vaine, specially fith this point hath beene long agoe diligently enough handled and declared by men of our side.

7 And yet indeede no man can better affaile this question, than the Scripture if selfe, if we compare all the places, where it teacheth, what office & power Peter had among the Apostles, howe he behaued himselfe, & howe he was accepted of them. Runne ouer all that remaineth written, you shall finde nothing else, but that he was one of the xii. euall with the rest and their fellowes, but not their Lorde. Hee doth indeede propounde to the counsell, if any thing bee to be done, and giueth warning what is meete to be done: but therewithall he heareth other, and doeth not onely graunt them place to speake their minde, but leaueth the judgement to them: when they had determined, he followed and obeyed. When he writeth to the Pastors, he doth not commaundem them by authoritie, as Superior: but he maketh them his companions, and gently exhorrreth them, as egalles are wont to doe. When he was accused for that hee had gone in to the Gentiles, al-though it were without cause, yet he aunswered and purged himselfe. When hee was commaundde by his fellowes, to goe with Iohn into Samaria, hee he refused not. Whereas the Apostles did sende him, they did thereby declare that they helde him not for their superior. Whereas he obeyed and tooke vpon him the embassage committed to him, hee did thereby confess that he had a fellowship with them, and not an autori ties over them. If none of these things were, yet the onely Epistle to the Galathians may easilie take al doubting from vs: where almost in two whole Chapters together Paul trauelleth to proue nothing else, but that hee himselfe was egall to Peter in honour of Apostleshippe. Then he rehearseth that he came to Peter, not to professe subsiection, but onely to make their content of doctrine approved by testimonie to all men: and that Peter himselfe required no such thing, but gaue him his right hande of fellowship, to worke in common together in the Lords vineyarde: and that there was no lesser grace giuen to him among the Gentiles, than to Peter among the Iewes: Finally that when Peter dealt not verie faithfully, he was corrected by him, and obeyed his reproouing. All these things doe make plaine, eyther that there was an e-qualitie betweene Paul and Peter, or at least that Peter had no more power over the rest, than they had over him. And (as I haue alreadie said) Paul of purpose laboureth about this, that none shoulde preferre before him in the Apostleshippe either Peter, or John, which were fellows, nor Lords.

8 But, to graunt them that which they require concerning Peter, that is, that hee was the Prince of the Apostles, and excelled the rest in dignitie: yet there is no cause why they should of a singular example make an uniuers- fall rule, and drawe to perpetuitie that which hath beene once done: fith there is a farre differing reacon. One was cheefe among the Apostles: forsooth, because they were few in number. If one were the cheefe of twelue men, shall it therefore follow that one ought to be made ruler of a hundred thousande men? It is no meruell that twelve had one among them, \( \text{\textit{should}} \) rule them all: For nature beareth this, and the witte of men requireth this, that in euerie assembly, although they be all egall in power, yet there be one as a gouernour, whome the rest may haue regard vnto. There is no court without a Consull: no seccion of judges without a Preter, or Propounder, no company without a Ruler, no fellowship without a Master. So shoulde it bee no absurditie, if wee confessed that the Apostles gaue to Peter such a supremacie. But that which is of force among fewe, is not by and by to bee drawn to the whole worlde, to the ruling whereof no one man is sufficient. But (say they) this hath place no lesse in the whole uniuersalitie of nature, than in all the partes, that there bee one soueraigne heade of al. And hereof (and God will) they fetch a prooue from cranes and bees, which alway choose to themselfes one guide, not many. I allowe indeede the examples which they bring forth: but doe bees reforte together out of al the worlde to chooze them one king? euerie seuerall kinge is content with his owne byue. So among cranes, euerie heard hath their owne king. What else shal they prooue hereby, but that euerie Church ought to haue their owne seuerall Bishopp appointed them? Then they cal vs to civill examples. They allege that sayling of Homer, It is not good to haue many gournours: and such things as in like fende are read in prophane writers to the commendation
The answer is easy. For Monarchie is not praised of Vlysies in Homere, or of any other, in this meaning, as though one ought to be Emperor of the whole world; but they meant to shew that one kingdom can not hold two kings: and that power (as he calleth it) can abide no companion.

9 But let it bee, as they will, that it is good and profitable that the whole world be holden under Monarchie, which yet is a very great absurdity: but let it be so: yet I will not therefore grant that the same should take place in the government of the Church. For the Church hath Christ her only head, under whose domination we all cleave together, according to that order and that forme of policie which he hath prescribed. Therefore they do a great wrong to Christ, when by that pretence they will have one man to bee ruler of the universal Church, because it can not be without a head. For Christ is the head of whom the whole body coupled and knitted together in every joint, wherewith one ministreth to and another, according to the working of every member in the measure thereof, maketh encrease of the body. See you not how he fetteth all men without exceptio in the body, and leaueth the honor & name of head to Christ alone? See you not how he giveth to every member a certain measure, and a determined & limited function: whereby both the perfection of the grace & the soueraigne power of governance may remain with Christ only? Neither am I ignorant what they are wont to caull, where this is objected against them, viz. that Christ is properly called the only head, because he alone raigned over his owne authority & in his owne name: but that this nothing with standeth, but that there may be under him an other ministeriall head (as they term it) that may be his vicegerent in earth. But by this casuallation they preuail nothing, vnlesse they first shew that this ministery was ordained by Christ. For the Apostle teacheth, that the whole ministiration is disperseth through the members, & that the power floweth from the one heavenly head. Or if they wil haue it any plainer spoken, then the Scripture testifieth that Christ is the head, & claimeith that honor to himself alone; it ought not to be transfered to any other, but whom Christ himselfe hath made his vicar. But that is not only nowhere red, but also may be largely confuted by many places.

10 Paul sometymes depainteth vntrous a lively image of the Church. Of one head he maketh there no mention. But rather by his descripation we may gather, that it is disagreeing from the institution of Christ. Christ at his ascension tooke from vs the visible presence of himselfe: yet he went vp to fulfill all things. Now therefore the Church hath him yet present, and alway shall haue. When Paul goeth about to shew the mane whereby hee pffenteth himselfe, he calleth vs backe to the ministries which hee vseth. The Lorde (sayth he) is in vs all, according to the measure of grace that he hath given to every member. Therefore he hath appointed some Apostles, some Pastors, some Evangelfistes, other some Teachers, &c. Why doth he not say, that he hath set one ouer all, to be his vicegerent? For the place required that principally, and it could by no means have bin omitted, if it had bin true. Christ (sayth he) is with vs. How? by the ministry of men, whom he hath appointed to governe the Church. Why not rather by the ministeriall head, to whom he he hath committed his steads: He nameth vnitie but in GOD, and in the faith of Christ. He assigneth to men nothing but common ministerie, and to every one a particular measure. In that commendation of vnity, after that he had faied that there is one body, one Spirit, one hope of calling, one God, one Faith, one Baptisme, why hath he not also immediately added one chiefes bishop, that may hold the Church together in vnity? For nothing could have beene more truly spoken, if it had beene true. Lette that place be diligently weyed. It is no doubt but that hee meant there altogether to represent the holy and spirituall government of the Church, which they that came after called Hierarchie. As for Monarchie among ministers, he not only nameth none, but also sheweth there is none. It is also no doubt but that he meant to express the manner of conjoyning, whereby the faithfull cleaue together with Christ their head. There he not only speakest of no ministeriall head, but appointeth to every of the members a particular working according to the measure of grace distributed to every one. Neither is there any reason why they should suttely dispute of the comparision of such heavenly & earthly Hierarchie. For it is not safe to knowe beyond measure of it. And in framing this government we must follow no other figure, then the Lord himselfe hath painted out in his word.

11 Now although I grant them an other thing, which they shall never win by proofe before sober men, that the supremacie of the Church was so fablished in Peter, that it should alway remaine by perpetuall succession: yet howe will they prove, that his seat was so placed at Rome, that whosoever is Bishop of that Church, should be set over the whole world? By what right doe they binde this dignitie to the place, which is given without mention of place? Peter (say they) liued and died at Rome. What did Christ himselue? Did not he, while he liued, exercise his Bishoprie, and in dying full the office of Priesthood, at Hierusalem? The Prince of Pastors, & soueraine Bishop, the head of the Church, could not purchase honor to the place: and could Peter, that was farre inferior to him? Are not these follies more than childish? Christ gave the honor of supremacie to Peter: Peter sat at Rome: therefore he there placed the seat of supremacie. By this reason, the Israels in olde time might have sette the seat of Supremacie in the deserue, where Moses the chiefe Teacher and Prince of Prophetes executed his ministery and died.

12 Let vs see how trimly they reason. Peter (say they) had the Supremacy among the Apostles: therefore the Church where he sate ought to have that preuiledge. But where sate he first? At Antioche, say they. Therefore the Church of Antioche doth rightly claime to it selfe the supremacie. They confesse that it was in olde time the first: but they say, yest in removing thence he removed to Rome the honour that hee brought with him. For there is an Epistle under the name of Pope Marcellus to the bishoppes of Antioche, where he sayeth thus: Peters seat was at the beginninge with you, which afterwardes by the Lords commandement was removed hither. So the Church of Antioche, which was once the chiefe, hath gien place to the sea of Rome, But by what Oracle had that good man learned, that the Lords so commanded? For if this cause be to be determined by the law, it is necessary that
that they answer, whether they will have this priviledge to bee personall, or real, or mixt. For it must bee one of these three. If they say that it is personall, then it belongeth nothing to the place. If they say that it is real, then when it is once given to the place, it is not taken away by reason either of the death or departure of the person. It remaineth therefore that they must say it is mixt: but then that place shall be not simplicie to be considered, vnlesse the person doe also agree. Let them choose which soeuer they will, I will by and by inferre and easily prove, that Rome can by no meane take the supremacy upon it selfe.

13 But be it, that as (they triflingly say) the supremacy was removed from Antioche to Rome: yet why did not Antioche keepe the second place? For if Rome haue therefore the first place, because Peter sate there to the end of his life: to whome shall the second place rather be graunted, than where he had his first sate? Howe came it to passe then, that Alexandria went before Antioche? How agreeeth it, that the Church of one disciple shoulde bee above the seat of Peter? It honor be due to euery Church, according to the worthi-ness of the founder, what shal we say also of the other Churches? Paul nameth three, that seemed to bee the pillers, James, Peter, and John. If first place were giuen to the sea of Rome in the honor of Peter: do not the seas of Ephesus, Hierusalem, where John and Iames sate, deserve the second and third place? But among the Patriarches Hierusalem had the last place: Ephesus coulde not sit so much as in the ytermost corner. And other Churches were left out both al those that Paul founded, and those that the other Apostles were rulers of. The seat of Mark, which was but one of their disciples, obtained the honour. Therefore they must either confesse that that was a preposterous order, or they must graunt vs that this is not a perpetuall rule, that there bee due to euery Church the same degree of honour which the founder had.

14 Howbeit, as for that which they report of Peters sitting in Hierusalem, I see not what credite it ought to haue. Truly that which is in Ephesus, that he ruled there foure and twentie yeares, is verie easilie confuted. For it is evident by the first and seconde Chapter to the Galathians, that about twentie yeares after the death of Christ, hee was at Hierusalem; and that then he went to Antioche: where howe long he was, is vnscertaine. Gregorie reckeneth seven yeares, and Eusebius twentie and foure. But from the death of Christ to the ende of Nerees Empire (in whole time they say that he was (laine) there shall be fourebut thirtie and seuen yeares. For by Lorde suffered under Tiberius, the eighteenth yere of his Empire. If you rebate twentie yeares, during the which Paul is wittinne that Peter dwelt at Hierusalem, there will remaine but seuentene yeares at the most, which must nowe be decyded betwene two bishoprikes. If he taried long at Antioche he coulde not sit at Rome, but a verie little while. Which thing we may yet also more plainely prove. Paul wriote to the Romanes, when hee was in his journey going to Hierusalem, where he was taken & from thence brought to Rome. It is not likly this Epistle was written foure yeares before by he came to Rome. Therein is yet no mention of Peter, which should not haue bin left out, if Peter had ruled Hierusalem. Yea & in the end all vs when he reheaseth the great number of the godly, whom he biddeth to be satisfied, where verily he gathereth.
Cap. 6. Of the outmarde meanes gathereth together all those that he knew, he yet sayth utterly nothing of Peter. Neither is it needful here to make a long or curious demonstration to men of sound judgement; for the matter itself, and the whole argument of the Epistle crieth out, that he should have overpassed Peter, if he had bin at Rome.

Then Paul was brought prisoner to Rome. Luke reporteth that he was received of the brethren, of Peter he sayth nothing. He wrote from thence to many Churches: and some places also he writeth salutations in the names of certaine: but he doth not in one worde shew that Peter was there at that time. Who, I pray you shall thynke it likely, that he could have passed him over with silence, if he had beene present? Yea, to the Philippias, where he sayd that he had none that so faithfully looked vnto the worke of the Lord, as Timothee, he complained that they did all fecke their owne. And to the same Timothee he maketh a more gretious complaint, that none was with him at his first defence, but al forlook him: where therefore was Peter then? For if they say that he was then at Rome, how great a shame doth Paul charge him with, that he was a forsaker of the Gospell? For hee speakeh of the beleuers: became he addeth, God impute it not vnto them. Howe long therefore, and in what time did Peter keepe that seate? But it is a constant opinion of writers, that he gouerned that Church euen to his death. But among the writers themselves it is not certaine who was his successor, because some say Linus, and others say Clement. And they tell many fonde fables, of the disputation had betweene him and Simon the Magician. And Augustine sticketh not to confess, when he entreateth of superstitions, that by reason of an opinion rashly conceived, there was a custome grown in vse at Rome, that they should not fast that day that Peter got the victorie of Simon the Magician. Finally the doings of that time are so entangled with diversitie of opinions, that we ought not rashly to beleue where we finde any thing written. And yet by reason of this consent of writers, I striue not against this, that hee died there: but yet that hee was Bishop there, and specially a long time, I cannot bee perswaded, neither doe I much passe vpon that also: for as much as Paul teitisheth that Peters apostleship did peculiarly belong to the Iewes, and his owne to vs. Therefore that that fellowship which they couenaunted betweene themselfes, may be confirmed with vs, or rather that the ordinance of the holy Ghost may stand in force among vs, wee ought to have respect rather to the Apostleship of Paul and Peter. For the holy Ghost so divided the provinces betweene them that he appointed Peter to the Iewes, and Paul to vs. Nowe therefore let the Romanistes goe and seeke their supremacie else where than in the word of God, where it is found not to be grounded.

Nowe let vs come to the olde Church, that it may also bee made to appeare plainly, that our adueraries doe no lesse caufefully, and falsely boast of the consent thereof, than they doe of the witnesse of the worde of God. When therefore they bragge of that principle of theirs, that the vitue of the Church cannot otherwise be kept together, but if there one suprême head in earth, to whom all the members may obey, and that therefore the Lorde gaue the supremacie to Peter, and from thence fourth to the sea of Rome.
Rome by right of succession, that the same should remaine in it to the ende: they affirm, that this hath beene alway obserued from the beginning. But forasmuch as they wrongfully wret many testimonies, I will first say this aforeshadethat I deny not but that the writers doe eche where give great honor to the church of Rome, & do speake reverently of it. Which I thinke to be done specially for three causes. For y fame opinion, which I wore not how was growen in force, that it was founded and ordain'd by the minis-try of Peter, much auailed to procure fauour & estimation vnto it. Therefore in the East partes it was for honors sake called the see Apostolike. Secondly, when the head of the Empire was there, & that therefore it was likely, that in that place were men more excellent both in learning & wisedom, & skill, & experience of many things, than any where else: there was worthily con-deration had thereof, that both the honor of the citie, & also the other more excellent gifts of God should not seeme to be despised. There was beside these alfo a third thing, when the Churches of the East, and of Grecia, yea & of Africke, were in tumults among themselves with disagreements of opin-ions, the Church of Rome was quieter & lesse full of troubles than the rest. So came it to passe, that the godly & holy Bishops, being druen out of their feates, did oftentimes flee thither as into sanctuarie or certaine hauen. For as the Western men are of lesse sharpnesse & swiftnesse of wit, than the Af-sians or Africke men, so much are they lesse desirous of alterations, This ther fore added much authoritie to the Church of Rome, that in those douerfull times it was not so troubled as the rest, and did hold the doctrine once deli-uered them, faster than all the rest as we shall by and by better declare. For thes three causes (I lay) it was had in no small honor, & commended with many notable testimonies of the old writers.

17 But when our adversaries will thereupon gather that it hath a sup-premacie & soueraigne power over other churches, they do to much amisse, as I haue alreadie said. And that the same may the better appeare, I wil first brefly shewe what the olde fathers thought of this vnitie which they en-force so earnestly. Hierome, writing to Nepotianus, after that he had recit-ed many examples of vnitie, at the last descended to the Hierarchie of the Church. Eche Bishop of every seuerall church, eche Archi-priest, eche Arch-deacon, & all the ecclesiastical order, do rest upon their own rulers. Here a Romaine Priest speaketh, he commendeth vnitie in the ecclesiastical order, why doth he not rehearfe that all Churches are knit together with one head as with one bond? Nothing could haue more fithly serued the matter that he had in hand: & it cannot be said that it was for forgetfulness, that he omitted it: for he would haue done nothing more willingly if the matter had suffred him. Hee sawe therefore without doubt, that that is the true reason of vnitie which Cyprian excellentely well described in these words: The bishoprick is whereof eche hath a part, wholly & the Church is one, which is with en-crease of fruitfulnesse more largely extended into a multitude. Like as there are many sunbeames & one lig. & many branches of a tree, but one body grounded on a fast holding roote: and like as from one fountaine flowe many streames, & though the multitude seeme to be dutrly spread abroad, yet the vnitie is kept whole in his original.
Of the outward meanes

So the Church also being overspread with the light of the Lorde, extendeth her beams abroad throughout the whole world, yet is it but one that is each where poured forth, and the unitie of the bodie is not seuered: she spreadeth her braches over the whole world, she sendeth out her overflowing streams: yet is there but one head and one beginning, &c. Afterward: The spouse of Christ cannot be an adultresse: she knoweth one only house, she keepeth the holinesse of one only chamber with chaste shamefastnesse. You see how he maketh the universal bishoprike to be Christ onely, which comprehendeth the whole Church vnnder him: and saith that all they that execute the office of bishop vnnder this head, have their partes thereof wholly. Where is the supremacie of the sea of Rome, if the whole bishoprike remaine with Christ onely, and each bishop hath his part thereof wholly? These things therefore make to this purpose, that the reader may understand by the way, that the olde fathers were ytterly ignorant of that principle, which the Romanistes do take for confessed & undoubted, concerning the unitie of an earthly head in the Hierarchie of the Church.

The viij. Chapter.

Of the beginning and increasynge of the Papacie of Rome, untill it aduancd is selfe to the height, whereby both the libertie of the Church hath bin oppressed, and all the right governement thereof overthrown.

As concerning the auncientnesse of the supremacie of the see of Rome, there is nothing had of more antiquitie to stablised it, than the deeree of the Nicene Synode, wherein the bishop of Rome both hath the first place among the Patriarches giuen vnto him, and is commannded to looke vnto the Churches adioynynge to the citie. When the Council maketh such division betwene him and the other Patriarches, that it assigneth to everyone their boundes: truely, it doeth not appoint him the head of all, but maketh him one of the chiefe. There were present Vitus and Vincentius in the name of Iulius, which then governed the Church of Rome: to them was giuen the fourth place. I beseech you, if Iulius were acknowledged the head of the Church, should his Legates bee thrust into the fourth feate? Should Athanasius bee chiefe in the Council, where principally the image of the Hierarchiall order ought to be seene? In the Synode at Ephesus it appeareth, that Celestinus which was then bishop of Rome, vfed a crooked subtle meane, to provide for the dignitie of his seate. For when he sent his deputies thither, he committeth his strete to Cyrillus of Alexandria, which should notwithstanding otherwize have beeene the chiefe. To what purpose was that same committinge, but that his name might by what means soever abide in the first place? For his Legates sate in a lower place, and were asked their opinion among the rest, and subscribed in their order: in the mean time the Patriarch of Alexandria joyned Celestines name with his own. What shall I say of the secon council at Ephesus: where when Leo Legates were present, yet Dioscorus Patriarche of Alexandria sate 5 chiefe as by his owne right? They will take exception that it was not vpright councel, by which both the holy man Flauianus was condemned, and Eutyches, acquired. acquired, and his vngodlines allowed. But when the Synode was gathered, when the bishops took their places in order, verily the Legates of the bishop of Rome sat there among the rest none otherwise than in a holy and lawfull Councell. Yet they strived not for the first place, but yeelded it to another: which they would never haue done, if they had thought it to be theirs of right. For the bishops of Rome were never ashamed to enter into the greatest contentions for their honors, and for this only cause oftentimes to vexe and trouble the Church with many and hurtfull strifes. But because Leo sawe that it should be a too much unreasonable request, if he should seek to get the chiefe place for his Legates, therefore he suuceeded it.

2 Then followed the Council of Chalcedon, in which by the grant of the Emperor the Legates of the Church of Rome sat in the chiefe place. But Leo himselfe conteyseth this was an extraordinary privilege. For when he made petition for it to the Emperor Marcius, and Pulcheria Empesse, he did not afferne it was due to him, but only pretended, that the Eastern Bishops, which sat as chiefe in the councell at Ephefus, troubled all things and ill abused their power. Whereas therefore it was needful to haue a graue governour, & it was not likly they should be meet for it, which had once bin so light and disordered: therefore he prayed, that by reason of the default and vnsinelle of other, the office of governing might be removed to him. Truly that which is gotten by singular privilege and beside order, is not by common lawe. Where this only is pretended, that there needeth some newe governour, because the former governours had behaued themselfes ill, it is evident that it neither was so before, nor ought to continue so for ever, but is done only in respect of present danger. The Bishop of Rome therefore had the first place in the Council at Chalcedon: not because it was due to his sea, but because the Synode was at that time destitute of a graue and fitte governour, while they that ought to haue bin the chiefe, did through their own intemperance and corrupt affection, thrust themselfes out of place. And this that I say, Leos successor did in deed prove. For when he sent his Legates to the sitt Synode at Constantinople, which was holden long time after, he brauled not for the first seat, but easilly suffred Menna the Patriarch of Constantinople to sit as chiefe. So in the counsell at Carthage, at which Augustine was present, we see that not the Legates of the sea of Rome, but Aurelius Archbishop of that place sate as chiefe: when yet the contention was about the authoritie of the Bishop of Rome. Yea there was also a generall counsell holden in Italy it selfe, at which the bishop of Rome was not present. Ambroxe was chiefe there, which was in very great authority with the Emperor, there was no mention made of the bishop of Rome. Therefore at that time it came to passe by the dignity of Ambroxe, that the sea of Millain was more noble than the sea of Rome.

3 As concerning the title of supremacy, & other titles of pride, wherupon it now maruellous boaseth it selfe, it is not hard to judge, when and in what sort they crept in. Cyprian oftentimes maketh mention of Cornelius. He seteth him out with no other name, but by the name of brother, or fellow bishop, or fellow in office. But when he writeth to Stephen the successor of Cornelius, he doth not only make him equal with himselfe and yet, but also speaketh more hardly to him, charging him sometime with arrogancy, sometime with ignorance. Since Cyprian we have what all the Church of Africa judged of that matter. The Councell at Carthage did forbid that any should be called Prince of Priests, or chief Bishop, but only bishop of the chiefe see. But if a man turne over the antienter monuments, he shall finde that the Bishop of Rome at that time was content with the common name of brother. Certainly so long as the face of the Church continued true and pure, all these names of pride, where with since y time the see of Rome hath begun to waxe outrageous, were utterly vnheard of: it was not known, what was the hieft bishop and y only head of the church in earth. But if the bishop of Rome had bin so bold to have taken such a thing upon him, there were stout and wise men that would have by & by repressed his folly. Hierem forasmuch as he was a priest at Rome, was not it willing to ferout the dignity of his own Church, so much as the matter and state of his time sufficed; yet we see how he also bringeth it downe into fellowship with the rest. If authority (sayth he) be sought for, the world is greater than a city. Why doest thou alleege to me the custom of one city? Why dost thou defende falsenes of number, out of which hath growne pride, against the lawes of the Church? Whersoever there be a bishop, either at Rome, or at Eugubium, or at Constantinople, or at Rhegium, he is of the same merits and of the same Priesthood. The power of riches or bafenes of poverty maketh not a bishop hier or lower.

4 About the title of vniuersall bishop the contention first began in y time of Gregory, which was occasioned by the ambition of John bishop of Constantinople. For he (which thing never any man before had attempted) would have made himselfe vniuersall bishop. In that contention Gregoric doth not alleege that the righte is taken away which was due to him self but stoutly crieth out against it, that it is a prophane name, yea a ful of sacrilege, yea the forwarner of Antichrist. The whole Church (sayth he) falleth downe from her state, if he fall, which is called vniuersa. In an other place: It is very sorrowfull, to suffer patiently, that our brother & fellowe bishop, despieth all other, should only be named bishop. But in this his pride what els is betokened but the times of Antichrist nere at hand: because verily he followeth him, y despieth the fellowship of Angels, went about to clime vp to the top of singularity. In an other place he writeth to Eulolius of Alexandria, and Anastasius of Antioche. None of my predeceffors at any time would vie that prophane word; for if one be called vniuersall Patriarch, the name of Patriarchs is abated from the rest. But farre may this be from a christian minde, that any should have a will to take that upon him, whereby he may in any part, be it never so little, diminish the honor of his brethren. To content in this wicked word is nothing else but to leece the faith. It is one thing (faith he) that we owe to the preserving of the unity of faith, and an other thing that we owe to the keeping downe of pride. But I say it boldly, because who soever calleth himselfe or deareth to be called vniuersall bishop, he doth in his proude advancing run before Antichrist, because he doth with shewing himselfe proud preferre himselfe above the rest. Againe to Anastasius bishop of Alexandria: I have sayd ye he can not have peace with vs, yelese he amended the advancing of the superstitious and proud worde, which the first apostata hath inuented. And
And (to speake nothing of the wrong done to your honor) if one bee called vniuersall Bishop, the vniuersall Church falleth when that vniuersall one falleth. But whereas he writeth, that this honor was offered to Leo in the Synode at Chalcidon, it hath no colour of truth. For neither is there any such thing red in the aetæ of that Synode. And Leo himselfe, which with many Epiftles impugneth the decrees made in honor of the fee of Constantinople, without doubt would not have passed over this argument, which had bene most to be liked of all other, if it had bene true, that hee refused that which was given him: & beinge a man otherwisse too much desirous of honor, he would not have omitted that which made for his praife. Therefore Gregorie was deceiued in this, that he thought that that title was offered to the fee of Rome by the Synode at Chalcidon: to speake nothing, howe fond it is, that he both testifieth it to have proceeded from the holy Synod, & also at the same time called it wicked, prophane, abominable, proude, & full of sacrilege, yea devised by the diuell, & published by the crier of Antichrist. And yet he addeth that his predecesser refused it, leaft all Prietes should be depruisd of their due honor, when any thing were priuatly given to one. In another place: No man at any time hath willed to be called by y word. No man hath taken to himselfe that presumptoous name: leaft if hee should in the degree of bishoprike take to himselfe a glory of singularitie, he should seeme to have denied the same to all his brethren.

Now I come to the iurisdiction, which the bishop of Rome affirmeth that he hath over all Churches. I knowe howe great contentions haue bene in olde time about this matter: For there hath bene no time wherein the fee of Rome hath not coveted to get an Empire ouer other Churches. And in this place it shall not be our occasio to search by what meanes it grew then by little & little to some power. I do not yet speake of that infinite Empire, which it hath not so long ago taken by force to it selfe: for we will differre y to a place convenient. But here it is good to shewe briefly, howe in olde time & by what meanes it hath aduanced it selfe, to take it selfe any power ouer other Churches. When the Churches of the East were deuided & troubled with the factiones of the Arrians vnder the Emperours, Constantius & Conftans the sonses of Constantine the Great, and Athanatus the chiefe defendour there of the true faith was driuen out of his see: such calamitie compell'd him to come to Rome, that with the authoritie of the see of Rome he might both after a sort represent the rage of his enemies, & confirm the godly that were in distresse. He was honourably received of Iulius then Bishop, and obtained that the Bishops of the West took upon them the defence of his cause. Therefore when the godly stood in great neede of foraign aide, & saw that there was very good succour for them in the Church of Rome, they willingly gave vnto it the most authoritie they could. But all y was nothing else, but y the communion thereof should be hilieste esteemed & it should be counted a great shame, to be excommunicate of it. Afterward euil & wicked men also added much vnto it. For to escape lawful judgements, they fled to this santuary. Therefore if any priest were condemned by his Bishop, or any Bishop by the Synode of his province, they by and by appealed to Rome. And the Bishops of Rome received such appellations more greedily than was meet: because it seemed to be a forme of extraordinary power, so to entermiddle with matters far wide about them. So, whè Eutyches was condemned by Flauianus bishop of Constantiunople, he complained to Leo that he had wrong done vnto him. Leo without delay, no lesse vnderstandingly than suddenly, tooke in hand the defence of an evil cause: he grievously inuoked against Flauianus, as though he had, without hearing the cause, condemned an innocent: and by this his ambition he caused that the vagodline of Eutyches was for a time strengthened. In Afric it is evident that this oftentimes chaunced. For so soone as any lewde man had taken a foile in ordinarie judgement, he by and by flewe to Rome, and charged his countreymen with many slanderous reports: & the sea of Rome was alway ready to entermiddle. Which lewdnes compellèd the bishops of Afric to make a lawe, that none vnder paine of excommunication should appeale beyond the sea.

6 But whatsoever it were, yet see what authoritie or power the sea of Rome then had. Ecclesiastical power is conteined in these foure points, ordering of bishops, summoning of Counsels, hearing of appeales or jurisdiction, chauncing admonitions or censures. All the old Synodes commaundèd bishops to be consercrate by their owne Metropolitanes: and they never bid the bishop of Rome to be called vnto it, but in his owne Patriarchie. But by little and little it grew in vs, that all the bishoppes of Italy came to Rome to fetche their consecration, except the Metropolitans, which suffred not them selues to be brought into such bondage: but when any Metropolitan was to be consecrate, the bishop of Rome sent thither one of his priestes, which should only be præfect, but not president. Of which thing there is an example in Gregorie: at the consecration of Constanstius bishop of Millain after the death of Laurence. Howbeit I do not thinke that that was a verie auncient institution: but when at the beginning for honour & good wils sake they sent one to another their Legates, to be witnesses of the consecration, and to testify their communion with them, afterward that which was voluntarie, began to be holden for necelarie. Howfoeuer it bee, it is evident that in olde time the bishop of Rome had not the power of consecrating, but in the province of his owne Patriarchie, that is to say in the Churches adjoyning to the citie, as the canon of the Nicene Synode faith. To the Consecration was annexed the sending of a Synodical Epistle, in which he was nothing about the rest. For the Patriarches were wont immediately after their consecration, by solemn writing to declare their faith, whereby they professed they themselves to be holy & catholike Counsels. So rendering an account of their Faith, they did approve themselues one to another. If the bishop of Rome had receiued of other, and not himselfe given this consecration, he had thereby bin acknowledged superior: but when he was no lesse bound to give it, than to require it of other, and to be subject to the common lawe: truely was a token of fellowship, not of dominion. Of this thing there is an example in Gregorie's Epistle to Anastasius and to Cyriacus of Constantinople, & in other places to all the Patriarches together.

7 Then follow admonitions or censures: which as in olde time bishoppes of Rome vscd toward other, so they did againe suffer them of other. Ireneus greuouslie reprooved Victor, because he vndiscreetly for a thing of no value, troubled the Church with a pernicious distention. Victor obayed, & spurned not against it. Such a liberty was then in them among the holy bishops, that they vfed a brotherly authority towards the bishop of Rome, in admonishing and chastising him if he at any time offended. He againe, when occasion required, did admonish other of their duty: & if there were any fault, rebuked it. For Cyprian, when he exhorteth Stephen to admonish the bishoppes of France, fetcheth not his argument from the greater power, but from the common right that priests haue among themselves. I beseech you, if Stephen hadde then bin ruler over France, would not Cyprian haue sayd: Restrain them, because they be thine; but he sayth farre otherwife. This (sayth he) the brotherly fellowship, wherewith we be bound one to another requirith that we should admonish one another. And we see also with how great sharpnes of words he being otherwife a man of a milde nature inuyeth against Stephen himselfe, when he thinketh him to be too insolent. Therefore in this behalfe also there appeareth not yet, that the bishop of Rome had any jurisdiction ouer them that were not of his owne province.

8 As concerning the calling together of Synodes, this was the office of equity Metropolitane, at certaine appointed times to assemble a Provincciall Synode. There the bishop of Rome had no authority. But a generall counsel the Emperor only might summon. For if any of the bishops had attempted it, not only they were out of his province, would not haue obeyed his calling, but also there would by and by haue risen an uprore. Therefore the Emperor indifferently warned them all to be present. Socrates in deed reporteth, that Julius did expostulate with the bishops of the East, because they called him not to the Synode of Antioch, whereas it was forbidden by the Canons, that any thing should be decreed without the knowledge of the Bishop of Rome. But who doth not see that this is to be understood of those decrees as bindes the whole universall Church? Now it is no maruell, if thus much be granted both to the antiquity and honor of the city, & to the dignity of the sea, that there should be no generall decree made of religion, in the absence of the bishop of Rome, if he refuse not to be present. But what is this to the dominion ouer the whole Church? For we deny not, that he was one of the chiefes: but we will not grant, that which the Romanistes now affirm, that he had a dominion ouer all.

9 Nowe remaineth the fourth kind of power, which standeth in appeals. It is evident that he hath the chiefe power, to whose judgement fate appellation is made. Many oftentimes appelled to the bishop of Rome: and he himselfe also went about to draw the hearing of caufes to himl selfe: but he was alway laughed to scorn, when he passed his owne boundes. I will speake nothing of the East and of Grecia: but it is certaine that the bishopps of France stoutly withstood him, when he seemed to take to himselfe an empire ouer them. In Afırica there was long debate about that matter. For where at the Meleuitane Councell, at which Augustine was presente, they were excommunicate that appelled beyonde the sea, the bishop of Rome travailed to bring to passe, that that decree might be amended. He sent his legates to shew that that privilege was gien to him by the Nicene Council: Ccc 4 The
The Legates brought forth the acts of the Nicene Council, which they had fetched out of the storehouse of their own Church. The Africans withstood it; and denied that the bishops of Rome ought to be credited in their own cause; and said that therefor they would send to Constantine, & into other cities of Grecia, where copies were to be had that were less suspicious. It was found, that therein was no such thing written, as the Romans had pretended. So was that decree confirmed, which took the chief hearing of causes from the bishop of Rome: In which doing they lewd shamefences of the Bishoppe of Rome himselfe appeared. For when he guilefully did thrust in the Synode at Sardos in stead of the Nicene Synode, he was shamefully taken in a manifest falsehood. But yet greater and more shamefence was their wickednes, that added a forged Epistle to the Council, wherein I wote not what bishop of Carthage, condemning the arrogation of Aurelius his predecessor, for that he was so bold to withdraw himself from the obedience of the see Apostolike, and yeelding himselfe and his Church, humbly craueth pardon. These be the goodly monumentes of antiquitie, wherupon the maiestie of the see of Rome is founded, while they so childishlie lie, under the pretence of Antiquity, very blinde men may finde it out by groping. Aurelius (sayth he) put it vp with decentli boldeness, and stubbornness, rebelled against Christ, and saint Peter, & therefore to be condemned with curse. What sayd Augustine? But what said so many fathers that were present at the Mileuitane Councell? But what neede is it to spende many wordes in confuting that foolish writing, which the Romanists themselves, if they haue any face left, can not looke vpon without great shame? So Gratian, I cannot tell whether of malice or of ignorance, where he rehearsed that decree, that they should be excommunicate that appell beyond the sea, addeth an excepcion: Valefle paraduruence they appell to the see of Rome. What may a man do to these beasts, which are so voyd of common reason, that they except only thing out of the law, for whose cause every man feeth the law was made? For the Counsell when it condemneth appell beyond the sea, forbiddeth only this, that none should appell to Rome. Here the good expostor excepteth Rome out of the common lawe.

But (to determine this question at once) one history shall make plain what maner of jurisdiction the bishop of Rome had in olde time. Donat of the black houses had accused Cecilian bishop of Carthage. The man accused was condemned, his cause not heard. For when he knew that the bishops had eaipired against him, he would not appeare. Then the matter came to the Emperor Constantine. He, forasmuch as he willed to have the matter ended by ecclesiastical judgement, committed the hearing of it to Melciades bishop of Rome. To whom he adioynd fellowe commissioners in many bishops of Italy, France and Spaine. If that belonged to the ordinary jurisdiction of the see of Rome, to hear an appell in an ecclesiastical cause: why doth he suffer other to be joyned with him at the will of the Emperor? Yea why did he himself take the judgement vpon him rather by the Emperours commandament, than by his owne office? But let vs heare what hapned afterwaerd. There Cecilian got the victory. Donat of the blacke houses was condemned for calender: he appelleth: Constantine comitted the judgement of of the appell to the bishop or Orleancse He fole as judge, to pronounce what he thought, after his bishop of Rome. If the sea of Rome hath the chief power without appellation: why doth Melicades suffer himselfe to receive so great a name, that the bishop of Orleancse should be preferred above him? And what Emperour doth this? Even Constantine of whom they boasted that he employed not only all his endeavours but in a manner all the riches of the empire to increase the dignity of their sea. We see therefore howe, howe farre the bishoppe of Rome was at that time by all means from that supreme dominion, which he affirment to be given unto him by Christ over al Churches, and which he lyingly faith that he hath in all ages possifled by the consent of the whole world.

11 I knowe howe many epiftles there bee, howe many writings and decrees, where in the bishops doe giue much, and boldly challenge much vnto it. But this alfo al men that haue but a verie little wit & learning do know, that the moft part of thofe are fonfumerie, that by the firft taft of them a man may foone finde out of what flop they came. For what man of founde wit & fober, will thinke that that goodly interpretation is Anacletus his owne, which is in Gratian reported vnder the name of Anacletus: that is, that Ce-phous is a head? The Romaniftes doe at this day abuse for defence of their fee, manylua fuffories, which Gratian hath patched together without judgement: and yet till in fo great light they will fell such fmockes, whereby in olde time they were wont to mocke out the ignorant in darkenesse. But I wil to beftowe much labour in confuting thofe things, which do openly conf-trute themselves by reafon of their vnauthoury follied. I grant that there re-maine alfo true epiftles of the old bishops, wherein they fet forth the honor of their fee with glorious titles: of which farre are some epiftles of Leo. For vide epif. 85.
that man, as he was learned and eloquent, fo was he alfo above measure desorous of glorie and dominion: but whether the Churches then beleued his remitonic when hee so advanced himfelfe, that in deede is it that is in controversie. But it appeareth that many offended with his ambition, did also withstand his greedy desire. Sometimes he appointed in his fteepe the Bishop of Theflalonica throughout Grecia and other countries adjoyning: sometime hee appointed the bishop of Orleancse, or some other throughout France, So he appointed Hormifdas bishop of Hifpals to be his vicar in Spain but euery where he excepted, that hee giue out fuch appoitnements vpon this condition, that the Metropolitans may haue their ancient priviliges re-maine safe and whole. But Leo himselfe declareth, that this is one of their priviliges, that if any doubt happen about any matter, the Metropolitan should first be asked his advice. Therefore those appoitnements of vicars in his fteepe were vpon this condition, that neither any bishop should be letted in his ordinary iurifdiction, nor any Metropolitan in being judge of Appelles, nor any provincial Counsell in ordering of their Churches. What was this elfe but to abftain from all iurifdiction: but to entermedle to the appea-sing of discordes, only so farre as the lawe and nature of the communion of the Church suffitheth?

12 In Gregories time that antient order was already much changed For when the Empire was shaken, and torne in pecees, when Fraunce and Spaine.
Spaine were afflicted with many overthrowes received, Slauonia wafted, I-taly vexed, and Affrica in a manner destroyed with continual calamities, that in fo great a shaking of ciuitie affaires, at leaft the integrity of faith might remaine, or yet not vitally perish, all the bishops from eoch part did the rather sayne themselves to the bishop of Rome. The whereby it came to passe, that not onely the dignity, but also the power of that see greatly encreased. Howebeit I do not so much passe by what means it was brought about. Truely it appeareth that it was then greater than in the ages before. And yet it then greatly differed from being an unbridled dominion, that one man might beare rule over other after his owne will. But the sea of Rome had this reverence, that it might with her authoritie subdue & repreffe the lowde and obstinate that could not by the other bishops be kept within their duetic. For Gregory doth oftentimes diligently testifie this, that he doth no lesse faithfully preferre to other men their rightes, than he requireth his own of them. Neither doe I (sayth he) pricked on by ambition, plucke from any man that which is his right: but I desire in all thinges to honour my brethren. There is no saying in his writings wherein he doth more prouudely boaft of the largeness of his Supremacie, than this: I knowe not what bishoppe is not subject to the see Apostolike when he is founde in faulte. But he by and by adioyneth, Where fault requireth not all according to the order of humility are equall. He giueth to himselfe power to correct them that haue offended: if all doe their duetic, he maketh him selfe equall with the rest. But he himselfe giueth him selfe this power: and they affiected to it that would: and other that liked it not, might freely gainsay it, which it is well knowne that the most part of them did. Befeide that he speakest there of the Primate of Constantinople: which when hee was condemned by the provincialis Synode, refueld the whole judgemente. His fellowe bishoppes informed the Emperor of this stubbornnesse of him. The Emperor willde Gregorie to be judge of the cause. We see therefore that he both attempteth nothing, whereby he may brake the ordinary jurisdiction, and the same thing that he doth for the helping of other, he doth not but by the commandement of the Emperor.

This therefore was then all the power of the bishop of Rome, to fette him selfe against obstinate & unnamd heads, whiche there needed any extraordinary remedy: & that to helpe and not to hinder other bishops. Therefore he taketh no more to him selfe over all other, than in an other place he granteth to all other over him selfe, when he confesseth that hee is ready to be corrected of all, to be amended of all. So in an other place hee doth in duee commande the bishoppe of Aquileia to come to Rome, to pleade his cause in a controversie of faith that was risen betwenee him and other: but hee doth not commande him of his owne power, but because the Emperor had so commanded. Neither dooth hee giue warning that hee alone shall bee judge, but promised that hee will assemble a Synode by whome the whole matter may be judged. But although there was yet such moderation, that the power of the see of Rome had her certaine bounds, which it might not passe, & the bishop of Rome him selfe was no more aboue than under other: yet it appeareth how much Gregory disliked such state. For he nowe and then then complaineth, that under color of bishoprike hee was brought backe to the world: and that he was more entangled with earthly cares, than euer he had ferued them while he was a lay man: that he was in that honor oppresed with tumult of worldly affaires. In an other place: so great burdens (faith he) of busines do holde me downe, that my minde can nothing at all be rai-fed vp to thinges above. I am shakien with many wavses of causes: and after those leisures of rest I am tostled with tempestes of troubleome life, so that I may rightly say, I am come into the depth of the sea, and the tempeft hath drowned me. Hereby gather, what hee would haue saide, if hee had happened to be in these times. Although hee fulfilled not the office of a Pastor, yet he was doing it. He abintayed from the gouernment of the ciuil Empire, and confest himselfe to be subject to the Emperour as other were. He did not thrush himselfe into the cure of other Churches, but being compelled by necessitie. And yet he thinketh himselfe to be in a maze, because hee cannot applie himselfe altogether onely to the office of a bishop.

14. At that time the bishop of Constantinople strived with the bishoppe of Rome for the Supremacie, as it is alreadie saide. For after that the seate of the Empire was established at Constantinople, the maistrie of the Empire seemed to require that that Church also should have the second place of honor after the Church of Rome. And truly at the beginning, nothing more auailed to cause the Supremacie to be given to Rome, but because the head of Empire was there at that time. There is in Gratian a writing vnnder the name of Pope Lucinus, where he faith, these cities were no otherwise diuided, where Metropolitans and Primates ought to sit, than by the reason of the ciuill gouernment that was before. There is also an other vnnder the name of Pope Clement, where he faith, the Patriarches were ordeined in those cities that had had the cheefe Flamines in them. Which, although it be false, yet is taken out of a truth. For it is certaine, that, to the end there should be made as little change as might be, the provinces were diuided according to the statute of things that then were: and that Primates and Metropolitans were set in those cities that excelled the other in honors and power. Therefore in the Counsell at Taurinum it was decreed, these Cities which in ciuill gouernment were the cheefe cities of euclie province, should be the cheefe seas of Bishops. And if it happened the honour of the ciuill gouernment to be removed from one citie to another, then the right of the Metropolitane citie should therewithall be removed therithe. But Innocentius bishop of Rome, when he saue the auncient dignitie of his citie to growe in decay, after that the seate of the Empire was removed to Constantinople, fearing the abatement of his sea, made a contrary lawe: wherein he denieth it to be necessarie that the ecclesiasticall mother citie should be changed as the Imperial mother citie shiue. But the authority of a Synode ought of right to be preferred above one mans sentence. Allso we ought to suppose Innocentius himselue in his owne caufe. Howsoever it be, yet by his owne prouision he sheweth, from the beginning it was so ordered, that the Metropolitane cities should be disposed according to the outward order of the Empire.

15. According to this auncient ordination, it was decreed in the firste coun-counsel at Constantinople, that the Bishop of the City should have the privileges of honor next after the Bishop of Rome, because it was a new Rome. But a long time after, when a like decree was made at Chalcedon, Leo stoutly cried out against it. And he not only gave himself leave to esteem as nothing that which six hundred Bishops or more had decreed: but also bitterly taunted them, for that they took from other seas that honour which they were so bold as to give to the Church of Constantinople. I beseech you, what other thing could move a man to trouble the world for so small a matter, but mere ambition? He faith that that ought to be inviolable, which the Nicene Synode hath once decreed. As though forsooth the Christian faith were endangered, if one Church be preferred before another; or as though Patriarchies were there divided to any other ends, but for policies. But we know that policies received, yea required diverse changes, according to the diuerse of times. Therefore it is sone that Leo pretended, that the honour, which by the authoritie of the Nicene Synode was given to the sea of Alexandria, ought not to be given to the sea of Constantinople. For common reason telleth this, if it was such a decree, as might be taken away according to the respect of times. Yea none of the Bishops of the East stood it, but the thing most of all concerned. Truely Proterius was present, whom they had made Bishop of Alexandria in the place of Dioscorus. There were present other Patriarches, whose honour was diminished, It was their part to withstand it, not Leo which remained safe in his own place. But when all they holde their peace, yea assent unto it; and onely the Bishop of Rome resifteth; it is eafe to judge, what moueith him that is, he foresaw that which not long after happened, that it woulde come to passe, that the glory of old Rome decaying, Constantinople not contented with the seconde place, woulde strive with Rome for the supremacie. And yet with his crying out hee did not so much preuaile, but that the degree of the counsell was confirmed. Therefore his successors, when they saw themselves overcome, quietly gave over theiritness; for they suffered that he should bee accompanied the seconde Patriarch.

But within a little after, John which in Gregories time ruled the Church of Constantinople, brake foorth so farre that he called himselfe the vnienfall Patriarch. Here Gregorie, least hee should in a very good cause faile to defende his owne see, did constantly sett himselfe against him. And truely both the pride and madness of John was intolerable, which desired to make the boundes of his bishopricke egall with the bondes of the Empire. And yet Gregorie doth not claime to himselfe, that which he denieth to an other; but abhorreth that name as wicked, and vngodly, and abominable, whatsoever take it upon him. Yea and also in one place hee is angrie with Eulolius Bishop of Alexandria, which had honoured him with such a title. Behold (faith he) in the preface of the Epistle which he directed to my self that haue forbidden it, yee haue cared to imprinte the worde of proude calling, in naming mee vnienfall Pope, which, I pray that your holiness will no more doe because that is withdrawn from you, which is giuen to an other more than reason requireth. I count it no honour, wherein I see the honour of my brethren to bee diminished. For my honour is the honour of the vnienfall fall Church, and the sounde strength of my bretheren. But if your holines call mee the vniterfall Pope, it denieth it selfe to be that which it confesseth me to be wholy. Truely Gregorie floode in a good and honest caufe. But John holpen by the fauour of Maurice the Emperor, could neuer bee remoued from his purpose. Cyriacus also his successor neuer suffered himselfe to bee intreated in that behalfe.

17 At the last Phocas, which when Maurice was slaine, was set in his place (I wote not for that cause being more friendly to the Romanes, but because he was there crowned without strife) granted to Boniface the third that which Gregorie neuer required, that Rome shoule be the head of all Churches. After this manner was the controuerse ended. And yet this beneift of the Emperour, could not so much have profited the sea of Rome, vnlesse other thinges also had afterward happened. For Grecia and all A- sia were within a little after cut off from the communion of Rome. France so much reuerenced him, that it obeyed no further than it listed. But it was then first brought into bondage when Pipine vritped the kingdome. For when Zacharie Bishop of Rome had beene his helper to the breach of his faith, and to robberie, that thrusting out the lawfull king, hee might violently enter vpnpn the kingdome as laid open for a pray; he receiued this reward that the sea of Rome should have iurisdiction over the Churches of France: As robbers are wonted in parting to deuide the commo spoile: so these good men ordered the matter betweene themselves, that Pipine shoule haue the earthly and ciuill dominion, spoiling the true king: and Zacharie shoule bee made head of all bishops and haue the spirituall power: which, when at the beginning it was weake, (as it is wont to be in newe thinges) was afterward confirmed by the authoritie of Charles, in manner for a like cause. For hee was also indebted to the bishop of Rome, for that by his endeuour hee had attainted to the honour of the Empire. But although it bee credible, that Churches eache where were before that time much deformed, yet it is certayne that the olde forme of the Church was then first vterly defaced in France and Germanie. There remaine yet in the records of the courte of Parife breefe notes of these times, which, where they inreace of the matters of the Church, make mention of the covenant both of Pipine and of Charles with the bishop of Rome. Thereby we may gather that then was an alteration made of the old estate.

18 Since that time, when thinges di'd eche where daily fall from worse to worse, the tyrannie of the sea of Rome was nowe and then also established and increased, and that partly by the ignorance, and partly by the slouthisness of the bishops. For when one man tooke all thinges upon him, and without measure proceeded more and more to aduaunce himselfe againste lawe and right: the Bishops did not with such zede as they ought, endeavour themselves to restraine his lust, & though they wanted not courage,yet they were desitute of true learning and knowledge: so that they were nothing fit to attempt to great a matter. Therefore we see what and howe Monstrous anywholy desilting of all holy things, and a scarrering abrode of the whole order of the Church, was in Bernardes time. He complaineth that there remonians, robbers of God, keepers of concubines, committers of incest, &c. such monsters, to obtaine or retaine ecclesiastical honours by the Apostolike authortie: and that fraude and vndermining, and violence were grewe in force. He saith that that maner of judging which then was vse, was abominable, and vnseemely, not onely for the Church, but also for a judicall court. He crieth out that the Church is full of ambitious men: and that there is none that more dreadeth to commit mischievous acts, than robbers do in their caue, when they deuide the spoyles of wafaring men. Fewe (saith he) do look vnsto the mouth of the lawgiver, but vnto his hands. But not without cause. For these hands do all the Popes businesse. What a thing is this, that they are bought of the spoiles of Churches, that say to thee, oh well done, weel done! The life of the poore is fowen in the streetes of the rich:fluer glittereth in the mire: men run to it from all places: not the poore, but the stranger taketh it vp, or he peraduenture that runneth fastest before. But this manner, or rather this death, came not of thee, I would to God it might ende in thee. Among these things thou a Pastor goest forward compassed with much and precious array. If I durt say it, there are rather the Pastors of diuels, than of hope. Forsooth Peter did thus, Paul played thus. Thy court is more accustomed to receive men good than to make them good. For the ill do not there profit, but the good do decay. Now as for the abuses of appeals that he reheareseth, no godly man can reade them without great horror. At the last he thus concludes of that vnbridled greedinesse of the sea of Rome in the vfurping of jurisdiction: I speake the murmour and common complaint of the Churches. They crieth out that they bee mangled and dismembred. There are either none or few that do not either bewaile or feare this plaghe. Askest thou what plaghe? The Abbots are plucked from the bishops, the bishops from the Archebishops, &c. It is maruellous if this may be excused. In so doing ye proue that ye haue fulnesse of power, but not of righetousnesse. Ye do this, because ye can do it: but whether ye also ought to do it, is a question. Ye are set to preserue, not to enuie to every man his honour and his owne degree. These fewe things of many I lifted to rehearse, partly that the readers may see, howe sore the Church was then decayed, and partly that they may knowe in howe great forrowe and mourning this calamitie held on all the godly.

19 But nowe, albeit that wee graunt to the Bishop of Rome at this day that preeminence and largenesse of jurisdiction, which that sea had in the meane times, as in the times of Leo and of Gregorie: what is that to the present state of the Papacie? I doe not yet speake of the earthly dominion, nor of the ciuile power thereof, which wee will afterward consider in place fit for it: but the verie spirituall governement that they boast of, what hath it like to the state of those times? For they define the Pope none otherwise than the Supreme head of the Church in earth, and the vniuersall bishop of the whole worlde. And the bishops themselves, when they speake of their owne authoritie, doe with greater stoutnesse of countenance, pronounce that to them belongeth the power to commaund, and other are bound to the necessitie to obey, that so all their decrees are to bee holden as confirmed with the diuine voice of Peter: that the provinciall Synodes, are without force, because they want the presence of the Pope: that they may order clerkes of any Church that they will, and may call them to their sea that have bene ordered els where. Innumerable of that force are in Gratians pack, which I do not now rehearse, lest I should be too tedious to you, Readers. But this is the summe of them, that only the Bishop of Rome hath the Supreme hearing and determining of all ecclesiasticall causes, whether it be in judging and defining of doctrines, or in making of lawes, or in enacting of discipline, or in executing of judgments: It were also long and superfluos to rehearse the privileges that they take to themselves in restorations, as they call them. But, (which is most intolerable of all other) they leave no judgement in earth to restraine and bridle their outragious lust, if they abuse so immeasurable power. It is lawefull for no man (say they) to reuoke the judgement of that (ca., because of the Supremacie of the Church of Rome. Again, the judge shalbe judged neither by the emperor, nor by kinges, nor by all the Clergie, nor of the people. That is in deed no impietiously done, that one man maketh himselfe judge of all men, and suffereth himselfe to obey the judgement of no man. But what if he vie tyranny over the people of God? If he scatter abroad, and waft the kingdom of Christ? If he trouble the whole Church; if he turn the office of Pastor into roberie? Yea though he be neuer so mischievous, he sayeth that he is not bounde to yelde accompte. For these be the baynges of the bishops: God will was to determine the causes of other men by men, but he hath without question refered the bishop of this sea to his owne judgement. Again, The doinges of subiectes are judged of vs but ours of God onely.

20 And that such decrees might have the more weight, they have fally thrift in the names of the olde bishops, as though things had bene so ordained from the beginning: whereas it is most certaine, that it is new and lately forged whatsoever y bishop of Rome giueth to himselfe more than we have rehearsed to be giuen him by the ancient Councells. Yea they are come to so great shamelesnesse, that they haue set foorth a writing vnder the name of Anafhasius Patriarch of Constantinople, wherein he testifieth that it was decreed by the olde rules, that nothing should be done even in the furthest provinces, that were not first moued to the sea of Rome. Beside this that it is certaine that this is most vaine, what man shall thinke it likely, that such a commendation of the sea of Rome proceeded from the aduertary and inquirer of honour and dignitie thereof? But verily it behoved that these Anti-christes should be carried on to so great madnesse and blindnesse, that their lewdnes might be plaine for al men to see, at least so many as wil open their eyes. But the decreall epithiles heaped together by Gregorie the ix. againe the Clementines, and Extravagants of Martine, doe yet more openly and with fuller mouth ech where breath foorth their outragious fierceenesse and as it were the tyrannie of barbarous kinges: But these be the oracles, by which the Romanitites will hauie their papacie to bee weyed. Hereupon arose those notable principles, which at this daye haue euery where in the papacie the force of oracles: that the Pope canne not errr: that the Pope is aboue the Councelles: that the Pope is the vnuerfall bishop.
Of the outward means bishof of all bishops, and the Supreme heade of the Church in earth: I passe over the much abuder follyes, which the foolish Canonistes babble in their schooles: to which yet the Romish diuines do not onely affent, but doe also clap their hands at them, to flatter their idole.

21 I will not deale with them by extremitie of right. Some other man would against this their so great insolence set the laying of Cyprian, Which be vied among the Bishops, at whose counsell he farte as cheefe. None of vs calleth himselfe Bishop of Bishops, or with tyrannous feare compelleth his fellowe bishoppes to necessefti to obey. He would object that, which a little afterwarde was decreed at Carthage. That none shoulde be called prince Priests, or cheefe bishop. He would gather many testimonies out of Historie, Canons out of Synodes, and many lentes out of the bookes of olde writers, by which the bishop of Rome shoulde be brought downe into the fellowship of the rest. But I passe over all these, leaft I should seeme too precifely to preffe them. But let the biffone patrones of the see of Rome aunswere mee, with what face they dare defende the title of vniverfall Bishop, which they fee fo oft to be condemned with curse by Gregorie. If Gregories testimonie ought to be of force, they doe thereby declare: Antichrift is there Bishop, because they make him vniverfall. The name also of heade was no more visiall. For thus he faith in one place: Peter is the cheefe member in the body, John, Andrewe and James the heads of particular peoples: yet they all are members of the Church vnder one heade: yea the holy ones before the lawe, the holy ones vnder the lawe, and the holy ones vnder grace, are set among members, altogether making vp the body of the Lord: and no man ever willed to haue himselfe called vniverfall. But whereas the bishoppes of Rome taketh vpon himselfe the power of commanding, yt thinges smally agreeth with that which Gregorie faith in another place. For whereas Eulollvs bishop of Alexandria, had faide that hee was commannde by him, hee aunswered in this wife, I pray yee, take away this woe de of commanding fro my hearing. For I knowe what I am, and what ye bee. In place, ye be to me brethren: in manneres ye be to mee fathers. Therefore I commannde not but I care to tell you these thinges that I thought profitable. Whereas hee so extendeth his jurisdition without ende, he doth therein great and haynous wrong, not onely to the other bishops, but also to all particular Churches, which he so teareth and plucketh in pieces, that he may build his seat of their ruins. But whereas he exempteth himselfe from all judgementes, and will so raigne after the manner of tyrantes, that he accounteth his owne onely lust for lawe, that verily is so haynous, and so farre from ecclesiastical order, that it may in no wise be borne: for it ytterly abhorreth not onely from all feeling of godliness, but also from all humanitie.

22 But that I be not compelled to goe through and examine all thinges particularly, I doe againe appeale to them, that will at this day be accompted the biffone and most faithfull patrones of the see of Rome, whether they be not ashamed to defiance the present state of the Papacie: which it is certain to be an hundred times more corrupite, than it was in the times of Gregorie and Bernard: which state yet did then so much displeasse those holy men.
men. Gregorie eche where complaineth, that he is too much diversly drawn away with foraine busines; that he is under the colour of bishoprike, brought backe to the world; wherein he suffereth so many cares of the world as he never remembrith that he suffered when he was a lay man: that he is pressed dowe with tumult of worldly affaires, that his mind is nothing raised vp to things aboue; that he is shaken with many waues of caufes, & toffed with tempestes of troublesome life: so that he may worthily say, I am come into the depth of the sea. Truely among those earthly busineses, he might yet teache the people with Sermons, privately admonishe and correct such as it behoved, order the Church, giue counsell to his fellowe bishops & exhort them to their dutie: beside these things there remained some time to write: and yet hee lamenteth his calamitie, that hee is drowned in the de-pest sea. If the governement of that time was a sea: what is to be sayed of the papacie at this time? For what likenesse haue they together? Here be no preachings, no care of discipline, no zace to the Churches, no spirituall doing, finally nothing but the worlde. Yet this maze is praisyed, as though there could nothing be founde more orderly and better framed. But what complaints doeth Bernarde pour out, what groanes doth he vter, when he looketh upon the faults of his age: What then would he do, if he behelde this our age of iron, and worse if any be worse than iron? What obstinate wickednesse is this, notonely stiffly to defende as holy & divine, that which all the holy men haue with one mouth condemned; but also to abuse their testimoni to the defence of the papacie, which it is certaine that they ne-ever knewe of? Howbeit of Bernarde's time I confesse, that then the corruption of all things was so greate, that it was not much unlike our time. But they are without all shame, that fetch any pretence for it, out of that mean age, that is, the time of Leo, Gregorie, and such other. For they doe like as it one, to stabillie the Monarchie of Empouers, would praise the old state of the Empire of Rome: that is, would borrow the praises of libertie, to set forth the honor of tyrannie.

23 Finally, although all these things were graunted them: yet there aristeth of freshe a newe strife for them, when wee deny that there is a church at Rome, in which such benefites may be resident: when we deny that there is a bishop, which may beare these privileges of dignitie. Admit therefore all these things to be true, (which yet we haue alreadie wrung from them) that Peter was by the mouth of Christ appointed head of the vniterfall church: and that he left the honour that was giuen him, in the see of Rome: that the same was stabillied by the authoritie of the auncient Church, and conformed with long continuance; that the Supreme power hath beeene alway by one content giuen of all men to the bishop of Rome, that he hath beeene the judge of all both caufes and men, and himselfe subject to the judgement of none: let them haue also more, if they will: yet I aunswere in one worde, that none of these things auaille, vnlesse there bee at Rome a Church and a bishop. This they must needs graunt mee, that it cannot be the mother of Churches, which is not it selfe a Church: that he cannot be chief of bishops, which is not himselfe a bishop. Will they therefore haue the see Apostolike at Rome? Then let them therfore me a true and laufull Apostleship. Will they have the chiefe Bishop? Then let them shewe me a bishop. But what? where will they shewe vs any face of a Church? They name one in deepe, and have it of in their mouth. Truely the Church is known by her certain marks: and bishoplike is a name of office. I speake not here of the people: but of the government it selfe, which ought continually to shone in the Church. Where is the ministerie in their Church, such as Chriftes institution requireth? Let vs call to remembrance that which hath before been spoken of the office of Priests and of a bishop. If wee shal bring the office of Cardinals to be condemned by that rule, wee shall confesse that they are nothing lesse than Priests. As for the chiefe bishop him selfe, I woulde faine knowe what one thing at all he hath bishoplike. First it is the principall point in the office of a bishop, to teach the people with the worde of God: another and the next point to that is, to minister the sacraments: the thirde is to admonish and exhort, yea and to correct them that offend, and to holde the people together in holy discipline. What of these things doeth he? yea, what doeth he faine himselfe to doe? Let them tell therefore, by what meanes they would have him to bee counted a bishop, that doeth not with his little finger, no not once so much as in outwarde shewe, touche any parte of a bishops office.

24 It is not so of a bishop as it is of a king. For a king, although he do not execute that which belongeth to a king, dooth nevertheless receive the honor and title. But in judging of a bishop respect is had to Chriftes commandement, which alway ought to be of force in the Church. Therefore let the Romanistes looke me this knot. I deny that their hee bishop is y chief of bishops, nor as much as he is no bishop. They must needs prove this last point to be false, if they will have the victorie in the first. But how say they to this, that he not only hath no propertie of a bishop, but rather all things contrarie? But here, O God, whereat shall I beginne? at his learning, or at his maners? What shall I say, or what shall I saie vsaide? where shall I make an ende? This I say: that whereas the world is at this day, stuffed with so many perteuse and wicked doctrines, full of so many kindes of superstitions, blinded with so many errors, drowned in so great idolatrie: there is none of these any where, that hath not either flowed from thence, or at least beene there confirmed. Neither is there any other cause, why the bishops are carried with so great rage against the doctrine of the Gospel newly springing vp againe, why they bend all their strengthes to oppresse it, why they kindle vp kings and princes to cruecie, but because they see that their whole kingdom decayeth and falleth downe, so soone as the Gospel of Chrift commeth in place. Leo was cruele: Clement was bloudie: Paul is a fierce murtherer. But nature hath not so much movd them to fight against the true, as for that this was their onely meane to maintain their power. Therefore fith they cannot be safe, till they have driven away Chrift, they trauaille in this cause, as if they did fight for their religion and countreys, & for their owne lustes. What then? Shal that be to vs the see Apostolike, where wee see nothing but horrible Apostasie? Shal he be Chriftes vicar, which by persecuted the Gospel with furious enterprizes, doth openly professe himselfe to bee Antichrist? Shal he bee Peteres succour, that rangeth with sworde sword and fire, to destroy all that ever Peter hath builded? Shall he be hald of the Church that cutting of and dismembering the Church from Christ the only true head thereof, doth in it selfe plucke and teare it in pieces. Admitte verily that in the olde time Rome was the mother of all Churches: yet since it hath begunne to be the state of Antichrift, it hath ceased to be that which it was.

25 We seeme to be too much euill speakers and railers, when we call the bishop of Rome Antichrift. But they that so thinke, do not understand that they accuse Paul of immodestie, after whom we so speake, yea out of whose mouth we so speake. And least any man object, that we doe wrongfully wret against the bishoppe of Rome, these wordes of Paul that are spoken to an other intent, I will breefly shewe, that they can not be otherwise understanded, but of the Papacie. Paul writeth, that Antichrift shall sitte in the temple of God. In an other place also the holy Ghost describing his image in the person of Antiochus, sheweth that his kingdome shall consist in hautines of speech, and blasphemies of God. Hereupon we gather, that it is rather a tyrannie ouer soules, than ouer bodies, that is raised vp against the spiritual kingdome of Christ. Then, that it is sicch, as doth not abolish the name of Christ and the Church: but rather should abuse the pretence of Christ, and lurke vnder the title of the Church, as vnder a disguisted viscer. But although all the heresies and sectes that have bin from the beginning, belong to the kingdom of Antichrist: yet wheras Paul prophesieth, that there shall come a departing, by this description he signifieth, that that state of abomination shall then bee raised vp, when a certaine vniterfall departing shall possesse the Church: howsoever many members of the Church here and there continue in the true vnty of faith. But where he addeth, that in his time he began in a mysticke to fet vp the worke of iniquitie, which howould afterward shewe openly: thereby we understand, that this calamity was neither to be brought in by one man, nor to be ended in one man. Now wheras he doth set out Antichrist by this marke, y he should plucke away from God his due honor, to take it to himselfe: this is the chiefc token that we ought to followe in seeking out of Antichrist, specially where such pride proceedeth euen to the publike dissipacion of the Church. Suth therefore it is certain, that the bishop of Rome hath shamelesly conveyed away to himselfe that which was the chiefc proper thing to God alone and Christ: it is not to be doubted but that he is the captain and standerdbearer of the wicked and abominaole kingdome.

26 Now let the Romanists go, and object antiquitie against vs: As if in so great alteration of all things, the honor of the Sea might stand where there is no sea. Eusbibius telleteth, how GOD, that there might be place for his vengeance, removed the Churc that was at Hierusalem to Pella. That which we heare to have beene once done, might be other done. Therefore foto binde the honour of supremacie to a place, that hee which is in deede the most hatefull enemie of Christe, the hyest aduersarie of the Gospel, the greatest waster and destroyer of the Church, the most cruel slaughterman and butcher of the saintes, shoulde nevertheless be accounted the vicar of Christ, the successor of Peter, the chiefc bishop of the Church, only because he occupieth the sea that was once the chiefeft of all: that verily is too much to be scorned and foolish. I speake not, how great difference there is between the popes chaunceerie, and a well framed order of the Church, Howbeit this one thing may well take away all doute of this question. For no man that hath his right wit, will thinke the bishoprie enclosed in leades & bulles: much lesse in that schoole of fraudes and deceites, in which thinges the Popes spirittuall government consisteth. Therefore it was very well sayd by a certaine man, that that Church of Rome which is boasted of, is long ago turned into a court which only is now seen at Rome. Neither do I here accuse the faults of men: but I shewe that the Papacie itself is directly contrary to the true order of a Church.

27 But if we come to the persons of men, it is well enough known what maner of vicars of Christ we shall finde. Iulius forsooth, and Leo, & Clement and Paul, shall be pillars of the christian faith, and the chiefe expostors of religion, which never knewe any other thing of Christ, than that which he had learned in Lucians schoole. But why doe I recken vp three or fouer Popes? as though it were doutfull, what manner of forme of religion the Popes with their whole college of Cardinals haue since long agoe professed, and at this day do professe. For first this is the principall atticle of that secret Diuinitie that reigneth among them, That there is no God: the seconde, That all thinges that are written and taught concerning Christ, are lies and deceites: the thirde, That the doctrine of the life to come, and of the lafte resurrection, and meere fables. They doe not all thinke so: and fewe of them speake so. I grant. But this hath long ago begun to be the ordinarie religion of Popes. Whereas this is verie well knowne to all that knowe Rome, yet the Romish Diuines eceive not to boaste, that by Christes privilege it is proued, that the Pope can not erre, because it was sayde to Peter: I haue prayed for thee, that thy faith shoule not faynte. What, I pray you, win they by mocking so shamelesly, but that the whole world may understand, that they are come to that extremity of wickednesse, that they neither feare God, nor stonde in awe men?

28 But let vs imagine, that the vngodlines of those Popes whome I haue spoken of, is hidden, because they haue neither published it by preaching, nor by writings: but only haue bewrayed it at their table, and in their chamber, or at least within walles of houses. But if they will haue this privilege to bee of force, which they pretende, they must needs wipe Iohn the xxij. out of the number of Popes, who openly affirmed, that soules are mortal, and that they die together with the bodies vntill the day of resurrection. And, that you may perceiue that the whole Sea with her principall stayes was then wholly fallen: none of all the Cardinals withfoode so great a madness, but the schoole of Parife mowde the king of Fraunce to compell him to recante it. The king for bad his subiectes to communicate with him, vngle he did out of hande repent: and the same, as the manner it, he proclaimed by a heralde. The Pope compellde by this necessitie, abiered his errour. This example makest that I neede not to dispute any more with my adversaries about this that they say, that the Sea of Rome and the bishops thereof, can not err, in the faith, because it was saide to Peter, I haue prayed for thee, that thy faith may not faint. Truely, hee fell with so soule a kinde of falfe from the right faith, that he is a notable example to them that come after, that they are not all Peters which succeede after Peter in the bishopric. Howbeit this is also of it felie to childlifh, that it needeth no aunfwere. For if they will drawe to Peters successfours whatsoever was spoken to Peter, it shall followe that they are all Sathan, forasmuch as the Lorde faide this also to Peter: Go behind, thou Satan, because thou art an offence to mee. For it shalbe as ease for vs to turne backe this latter saying against them, as it shalbe for them to obiect the other against vs.

29 But I lift not to strive with them in playing the soule. Therefore I retorne theither from whence I made digression. So to binte the place, and Christ, and the holy Ghost, and the Church together, that whooeuer sit in that place, although he be the duell, yet he must be judget vicar of Christ, and the head of the Church, because it was once the seat of Peter: I say this is not onely wicked and flauderous to Christ, but also too great an absurditie and against common reason. It is alreadie long ago since the bishops of Rome are either without al religion, or the greatest enemies of religion. Therefore they are no more made the vicars of Christ, by reason of this seat which they occupie, than an idol, when it is set in the temple of God, is to be taken for God. Nowe if their maners be to be judged vpon, let the Popes themselves aunswere for themselves what one thing at all there is in them, wherein they may be known for bishops. First, whereas there is such life at Rome, they not onely winking at it, but also as it were with secreete countenance allowing it, this is vterly vnmeet for bishops, whose dutie is with severitie of discipline to reftaine the licentiousnesse of the people. But I will not be so rigorous against them, to charge them with other mens faults. But whereas they themselues, with their own houshold, with almost the whole college of Cardinall, with the whole flock of their clergie, are so giuen forth to all wickednesse, filthinesse, vncleannessse, to all kindes of lewde & mischievous doings, that they reembre rather monsters than men: therein truely they bewray themselves to be nothing leffe than bishops. And yet they need not to feare left I shoule further disclose their filthines. For both I am serue to do in so flinking mire, and I must fauour chaft eares, and I thinke that I haue alreadie enough & more proued that which I went about: that is, that although Rome had in olde time beene the head of Churches, yet at this day shee is not worthie to be judged one of the smallesst toes of the Churches seете.

30 As concerning the Cardinall, (as they call them) I can not tell howe it is come to passe, that they be so sodenely rifen vp to so great dignitie. This name in Gregories time belonged to bishops only. For so oft as he maketh mention of Cardinall, he meaneth it not of them of the Church of Rome, but of any other: so that briefely, a Cardinall Priest is nothing else but a bishop. In the writers before that age I finde not this name at al. But I see that they were then leffe than bishops, whome they bee nowe farre above. This saying of Augustine is well known: Although according to the names of honoure, which the vfe of the Church hath alreadie obtained, bishoprick is greater than priesthood, yet in many things Augustine is leffe than Hierome.
Here in deedes he maketh difference betwene a priest of the Church of Rome and other: but he indifferently setteth them all behinde the bishops. And that was so long obscured, that in the Council at Carthage, when there were pretent two legates of the See of Rome, the one a bishop, the other a priest, the priest was thrust backe into the laft place. But not to followe too old examples, there remaineth a Counsel holden under Gregorie at Rome, at which the priests were in the lowest place, & subscribed severally by the same, as for the Deacons, they had no place at all in subscribing. And truly they had then no office, but to be present & ynder the bishop at ministring of doctrine & of the sacraments. Now the cafe is so changed, that they are become the cousins of kings & Emperors. And it is no dout but they growe vp by little and little together with their head, til they were advaunced to this hi top of dignitie. But this also I thought good to touch shortly by the way, that the readers might the better understand, that the See of Rome, such as it is at this day, doth much differ from that auncient one, ynder pretence whereof it doth now maintaine and defend itselfe. But of what forsoever they were in olde time, forasmuch as they haue nowe nothing of the true & lawfull office in the Church, they retaine onely a deceitful colour and vaine visiour: yea forasmuch as they haue all thinges utterly contrarie, it was necessarie that that should happen to them, which Gregorie writeth so oft. I say it (faith he) weeping: I give warning of it, groning: that if the order of priesthood is fallen within, it shall also not be able to stand long without. But rather it behoved that this should be fulfilled in them which Malachie faith of such: Ye haue gone backe out of the way, and haue made many to stumble in the law. Therefore ye haue made voide the covenant of Leui, faith ye Lorde. Therefore behold, I haue given you out of estimation, and vile to all the people. Nowe I leave it to all the godly to thinke of what is that supreme height of the Hierarchie of Rome, whereunto the Papifts with abominable shamelesse sticke not to make subject the very worde of God, which ought to haue beene honourable and holy both to heaven and earth, men and Angels.

The viii. Chapter.

Of the power of the Church as so working the articles of Faith, and with how unbridled licentiousnes is hath in the Papacie bin wrested to corrupt all purenesse of Doctrine.

Now followeth the thirde place of the power of the Church, which partly consisteth in all the bishops, and partly in the Councelles, and those either pro vinciall or generall. I speake onely of the spirituall power, which is proper to the Church. That consisteth either in doctrine, or in jurisdiction, or in making of lawes, Doctrine hath two partes, the authorticte to teache articles of doctrine, and the expounding of them. Before that wee beginne to discourse of every one of these in specialtie, wee will that the godly readers be warned, that whatsoeuer is taught concerning the power of the Church, they must remember to apply it to that ende, whereunto (as Paul testifieth) it was gien: that is, to edification, and not
Therefore whatsoever authority or dignity the holy Ghost in the scripture giueth either to the priests or to the Prophets, or to the Apostles, or to the successors of the Apostles, all that is given, not properly to the men themselves, but to the ministerie over which they are appointed, or (to speak it more plainly in one word) whereof the ministerie is committed to them. For if we go through them all in order, we shall not finde that they had any authority to teach or to answere, but in the name and worde of the Lorde. For when they are called to the office, it is also enjoyed them, that they should bring nothing of themselves, but speake out of the mouth of the Lorde. And he himselfe doeth not bring them forth to be heard of y people, before he have giuen them instructions what they ought to speake, to the entent that they should speake nothing beside his word. Moses himselfe, his prince of all the Prophets, was to be heard above the rest: but he was first instructed with his commandements, he might not declare any thing at all, but from the Lord. Therefore it is said, that the people when they embraced his doctrine, beleued in God & in his servant Moses. Also the authority of his priests should not grow in contempt, it was established with most grievous penalties. But therewithal the Lord the wth vpon what condition they were to be heard, when he saith that he hath made his covenant with Leui, the law of truth should be in his mouth. And a little after he addeth: The lips of the priest shal keepe knowledge; and they shall require the law at his mouth because he is the angel of God. Therefore if the priest will be heard, let him shewe himselfe the messenger of God: y is, let him faithfully report the commandements that he receiveth of his author. And where it is specially entreated of the hearing of them, this is expressly set, That they may answer according to the law of God.

What manner of power the Prophets generally had, is very well described in Ezechiel: Thou sonne of man (saith the Lord) I have giuen thee to be a watchman to the house of Israel. Therefore thou shalt hear the word out of my mouth, and thou shalt declare it to them from me. He y is commanded to hear out of the mouth of the Lorde, is he not forbidden to invent any thing of himselfe? But what is to declare from the Lorde, but fo to speake as he may boldly boast, that it is not his owne, but the Lords word.

To Salvation. Lib. 4.

he hath brought. The selfe same thing is in Hieremue, in other wordes, Let the Prophet (saith he,) with whome is a dreame, tel a dreame: & let him that hath my word speake my word true. Certainly he appointeth a lawe to the all. And that is such, that he permitteth not any to teach more than he is comanded. And after he calleth it chaffe, all that is not come from himselfe only. Therefore none of the Prophets themselves opened his mouth, but as the Lord told him the wordes before. Whereupon these sayings are so oft found among them: the wordes of the Lord, the burden of the Lord, so sayth the Lord, the mouth of the Lord hath spoken. And worthily. For Esai cried out that he had defiled lips. Jeremuc confessesthat he coulde not speake, because he was a child: What could procede from the defiled mouth of the one, and the fool. fh mouth of the other, but vncleane & vnwise, if they had spoken their owne speech: But his lips were holy & pure, when they began to be the instrumens of the holy Ghost. When the Prophets are bound with this religion, that they deliver nothing, but that which they have received, then they be garnished with notable power and excellent titles. For when the Lord testifieth, that hee hath set them ouer nations and kingdomes, to plucke vp and to roote out, to destroy and plucke downe, to builde and to plant, he by and by adioyneth the cause: because he hath put his wordes in their mouth.

4 Now if you looke to the Apostles: they are in deede commended & many and notable titles, that they are the light of the world, and the fale of the earth, that they are to be heard in stead of Christ, that whatsoever they bine or loose in earth shalbe bound or loosed in heauen. But in their very name they fwe howe much is permitted them in their office: that is, if they be Apostles, that they should not prate whatsoever they list: but hold faithfully report his commandements from whom they are sent. And the words of Christ are plaine enough, in which he hath determined their embasillage: when he commanded them to go & teach all nations, all those things that he had commanded. Yea & he himselfe also received this law, & laid it upon himselfe, that it should be lawful for no man to refuse it. My doctrine (faith he) is not mine, but his that sent me, my fathers. He that was alway the only & eternall counsellor of the Father, & he that was appointed by the Father the Lord and Schoolemaster of all men, yet because he executed the ministerie of teaching, prescribed by his owne example to all ministers what rule they ought to follow in teaching. Therefore the power of the church is not infinitt, but subject to the word of the Lord, & as it were enclosed in it.

5 But fith this hath from the beginning bin of force in the church, & at this day ought to be in force, that the servants of God should teach nothing which they have not learned of him; yet according to the diversitie of times they had divers orders of learning. But that order which is now, much different fhom those that were before. First if it be true which Christ faith, that none hath seene the Father, but the Sonne, and he to whom it hath pleased the Sonne to shew him: it behoved verily that they should be alway directed by that eternal wisdom of the Father, which would come to thy knowledge of God. For how should they either haue comprehended in mind, or voted the mysteries of God, but by his teaching, to whom alone the secretes of the the Father are open: Therefore the holy fathers in old time knew God no other wife but beholding him in the Son as in a glasse. When I say this, I mean that God did never by any other meane disclose him selfe to men but by the Son, that is, his only wisdom, light & truth. Out of this fountaine did Adam, Noe, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the other draw all the knowledge that they had of heauenly doctrine. Out of the same fountaine haue also all the Prophets themselves drawn all the heauenly Oracles that they vterted. For verily this wisdom hath alway disclosed it selfe by more wayes than one. To the Patriarchs he vset secret revelations: but therewithall to confirm their mindes, he adjoyned such signes, that it could not be doubtfull to the, that it was God that spake. The Patriarchs conuerced over from hand to hande to posterity, which they had receiued. For the Lord left it with them to this extent, that they should so spread it abroad. But the children & childrens children, by God secretly informing them, did know that that which they heard was from heauen, and not from the earth.

6 But when it pleased God, to raise a more apparant forme of a Church, he willed to haue his worde put in writing and noted, that the priests should fetch from thence what they might deliuer to the people, and that all the doctrine that should be taught should be tried by that rule. Therefore after the publishing of the lawe, when the priests are commanded to teach out of the mouth of the Lord, the meaning is, that they should teach nothing strange or differing from that kinde of learning which the Lorde comprehended in the lawe: and to adde and diminish was vnlawfull for them. Then followed the Prophets, by whom in deede the Lorde published new oracles to be added to the lawe: but yet not so new, but that they came out of the law, and had respect vnto it: For, as touching doctrine, they were onely expostors of the law, and added nothing vnto it, but prophecies of things to come. Those excepted, they vterted nothing else but a pure exposition of the law. Because it pleased the Lorde that there should be a plainer and larger doctrine, why weake consciences might be the better satisfied: he commanded that the prophecies also should be put in writing, & accounted part of his worde. And here vnto were added the histories, which are alfo the workes of the Prophets, but made by the ending of the holy Ghost. I reken the Pfalms among the prophecies, because that which we attribute to the prophecies is alfo common to the Pfalms. Therefore that whole body compacted of the law, prophecies, pfalms and histories, was the word of the Lord to the olde people, by rule whereof the priests and teachers then vnto Christes time were bound to examine their doctrine: neither was it lawfull for them to swaure either to the right hand or to the left: because all their office was enclosed within these boundes, that they should answer the people out of the mouth of God. Which is gathered of a notable place of Malachie, where he biddeth them to be mindefull of the law, & to give heedde to it, even to the preaching of the Gospell. For thereby hee biddeth them all newe founde doctrines, and graunteh them no leaue to swaure newe so little out of the way which Moses had faithfully shewed them. And this is the reason why Davids so honorably setethe out the excellencie of the lawe, and rehearseh so many prayses of it: that is, that the Jews should couet no forein thing without it, bet within in it was all perfection enclosed.

7 But when at last the wisdom of God was openly showed in the flesh, that same Wisdom with full mouth declared unto all that ever can with mans wit be comprehended, or ought to be thought concerning the heavenly Father. Now therefore, since Christ the Sonne of high counsels hath offended, we have a perfect brightnes of the truth of God, such as the clearest eye is wont to be at midaight, when the light was before but dimme. For verily the Prophet meant not to speake of any meane thing, when he wrote that GOD in olde time spake duterfully and many wayes to the fathers by the Propheties: but that in these last days he began to speake to vs by his beloved Son. For he signifieth, yea he openly declareth, that God will not hereafter, as he did before, speake sometime and some time by other, nor will add Propheties to Prophecies, or revelations to revelations, but that he hath so fulfilled all the partes of teaching in the Sonne: that they must have this of him for the last and eternall testimonie. After which for all this time of the newe Testament wherein Christ hath appeared to vs with his preaching of his Gospell even to the day of judgement, is expressed by the last hour, the last times, the last dayes; to the ende verily that contented with the perfection of the doctrine of Christ, we should learne neither to faine vs any newe beside it, or receive it fained of other. Therefore not without cause the Father hath by singular prerogatium ordained the Sonne to be our Teacher: commanding him, and not any man, to be heard. He did in deede in few wordes set out his Schoolemastership vnto vs, when he sayd, Hear e him: but in which there is more weight & force than men commonly thinke. For it is as much in effect, as if leading vs away from all doctrines of men, he should bring vs to him only, and commaunde vs to looke for all the doctrine of salvation at him alone, to hang vpon him alone, to cleave to him alone, finally (as the very wordes do found) to harken to the voyce of him alone. And truly what ought there nowe to be either looked for or defined at the hande of man, when the very wordes of life hath familiarly and openly disclosed himselfe vnto vs? Yea but it is meete that the mouthes of all men be shut, after that hee, in whom the heavenly Father willed to have all the treasures of knowledge & wifedom to be hidden, hath once spoken, and so spoken as became both the wifedom of God (which is in no part vnperfect) and Messiah at whose hand the revelation of all things is hoped for: that is to say, that he left nothing afterward for other to be spoken.

8 Let this therefore be a steadfast principle: y there is to be had no other word of God, whereunto place should be given in the Church, than y which is contained first in the law and the Prophets, and then in the writings of the Apostles: and that there is no other maner of teaching rightly, but according to the prescription and rule of that word. Hereupon also we gather, that there was no other thing graunted to the Apostles, but that which the Prophets had had in olde time: that is, that they should expounde the olde Scripture, and shewe that those things that are therein taught are fulfilled in Christ: and yet that they should not doe the same but of the Lorde, that is to say, the SpRITE of Christ going before them, and after a certaine maner ending wordes vnto them. For Christ limited their embassage with this condition condition when he commanded them to goe and teach, not such things as they themselves had rashly forged, but all those things that he had commanded them. And nothing could be more plainly spoken, than that which he saith in another place, but be not ye called masters, for only one is your master, Christ. Then, to emprint this more deeply in their minds, he repeated it twice in the same place. And because their rudeness was such, that they could not conceive those things that they had heard and learned of the mouth of their master, therefore the spirit of truth is promised them by whom they should be directed to the true understanding of all things. For the same restraining is to be diligently noted, where this office is assigned to the holy Ghost, to put them in mind of all those things that he before taught the by mouth.

9 Therefore Peter who was very well taught how much he might lawfully doe, leaueth nothing either to himselfe or other, but to distribute the doctrine delivered of God. Let him that speaketh (faith hee) speake as the words of God, that is to say, not doubtingly, as they are wont to tremble whose owne conscience misgiveth them, but with sure confidence, which becommeth the servant of God furnished with assured instructions. What other thing is this, but to forbid all inventions of men's minds, from what heade souer they haue proceeded, that the pure word of God may be heard and learned in the Church of the faithful? to take away the ordinances or rather the faynd deuises of all men, of what degree souer they be, that the decrees of God only may remaine in force? There be those spirittuall armures, mightie through God to cast downe holde: by which the faithfull servants of God may throw downe counsell, and all heigh that advanceth it selfe against the knowledge of God, and may leade all knowledge captive to obey Christ. Lo this is the soueraine power, wherewith it behaueth the Pastors of the Church to bee endued, by what name souer they bee called, that is, that by the word of God they may with confidence be bold to do all things: may compelle all the strength, glorie, wisdom and height of the world to yeld and obey to his maeftie: being upheld by his power, may commaund all even from the hieft to the lowest: may build vp the house of Christ and pull downe the house of Satan: may feede the sheape & drine away ye wolves: may instruct and exhort the willing to learn: may reprooue, rebuke and subdue the rebellious & stubborn: may hinde, and loose: finally may thunder & lighten, if neede be: but all things in the word of God. Howbeit there is, as I haue said this difference betweene the Apostles and their successors; yt the Apostles were the certaine & authentike secretaries of the holy Ghost, and therefore their writings are to be esteemed for the Oracles of God: but the other haue none other office, but to teach that which is set forth and written in ye holy Scriptures. We determine therefore, yt this is not now left to faithfull ministers, yt they may coine any new doctrine, but yt they ought simple to cleauce to the doctrine, whereunto the Lorde hath made all men without exception subject. When I say this, my meaning is not onely to shewe what is lawfull for all particular men, but also what is lawfull for the whole universall Church. Nowe as touching all particular mens: Paul verily was ordeyned by the Lorde Apostle to the Corinthians; but hee denieth that hee
Of the outwarde meanes

2, Cor. 1, 14. hath dominion ouer their faith. Who nowe dare take a dominion vpon him selfe, which Paul tefftifth that it belonged not to him? If hee had acknowledged himselfe to haue this libertie of teaching, that what soever the Pastor teacht the hee may therein of right require to be beleeved: he would not haue taught y Corinthians this discipline, that while two or three Prophets speake, the rest shoulde judge, and if it were revealed to any that sake, the first should hold his peace. For so he spared none, whose authoritie he made not subject to the judgement of the worde of God. But, will some man say, of the whole vniverse? for Church the case is otherwise. I answeare that in an other place Paul meeteth with this doubt also, where he sayth, that Faith is by hearing, and hearing by the worde of God. Truely if Faith hang of the word of God onely, hath respect vnto and refeth vpon it alone, what place is there now left to y word of the whole world? For herein no man may doute that hath well knowne what Faith is, for Faith ought to bee stayed vpon such assurednes, whereby it may stand incytible against Sathan, and all the engines of the hell, and against the whole world. This assurednes were shall no where find but in the only worde of God. Again, it is a general rule which wee heere ought to haue respect vnto: that God doth therefore take few men the power to set forth a new doctrine, that he only may be our scholemaster in heauenly learning, as he only is true which can neither ly nor deceiue. This rule be-longeth no lefte to the whole Church than to every one of the faithful.

10 But if this power of the Church, which we haue spoken of, bee compared with that power, whereof the spirituall tyrante, that haue falsely called themselues Bishops and Prelates of Religion, haue in certaine ages past boasted themselues among the people of God, the agreement shalbe no better than Christ hath with Belial. Yet it is not in this place my purpose to declare in what sort and with how wicked meanes they haue exercised their tyranny: I will but reheare the doctrine, which at this day they defende, first with writings, & then with sword and fire. Because they take it for a thing confessed, that a general Councel is the true image of the Church, when they haue taken this principle, they doe without dout determine, that such councels are immediately governed of the holy Ghost, & that therefore they cannot erre. But whereas they themselves doe rule the councils, yea and make them, they doe in deed chalenge to themselfes whatsoever they affirme to be due to the Councells. Theryfore they will haue our Faith to stand and fal at their will, whatsoever they shall determine on the one side or the other, may bee stablished and certain to our minds: so that if they allow any thing we must allow the same without doutinge; if they condemne any thing we must also hold it for condemned. In the mean time after their own lust, & defying the word of God, they coyne doctrines, to which afterward they require by this rule to haue faith giuen. For they also say that he is no Christian, that doth not certainly confente to all their doctrines as well affirmatiiue as negatiiue: if not with expressed yet with unexpressed faith: because it is in the power of the Church, to make newe articles of the Faith.

11 First let vs heare by what argumentes they prove that this authoritie is giuen to the Church: and then we shall see howe much that maketh for them which they alleage of the Church. The Church (say they) hath not...
table promises, that it shall never be forsaken of Christ her spouse, but that it shall be guided by his Spirit into all truth. But of the promises which they are wont to allege, many are given no less to every one of the faithful, particularly, than to the whole Church universally. For though the Lord spake to the twelve Apostles, when he said: Behold I am with you even to the end of the world: Again: I will ask my Father, and he shall give you an other Comforter, namely, the Spirit of truth; yet he made the promise not only to the whole number of the twelve, but also to every one of them: yea to the other disciples likewise, either those that he had already received, or those that should afterwards be added to them. But when they expound such promises full of singular comfort, as though they were given to none of the Christians, but to the whole Church together: what do they else, but take away from all Christians that confidence which they ought to receive thereby to encourage them? Yet I do not here deny, but that the whole fellowship of the faithful, furnished with manifold diversities of gifts, is endued with much larger and more plentiful treasure of the heavenly wisdom, than each one severally: neither is it my meaning, that this is spoken in common to the faithful, as though they were all alike endued with the Spirit of understanding and doctrine: but because it is not to be granted, to the adversaries of Christ, that they should for the defence of an evil cause wrest the Scripture to a wrong sense. But, omitting this, I simply confess that which is true, that the Lord is perpetually present with his, and ruleth them with his Spirit. And that this Spirit is not the Spirit of error, ignorance, lying or darknesse: but of sure revelation, wisdom, truth, and light, of whom they not deceitfully may learn those things that are given them, that is to say, what is the hope of their calling, and what be the riches of the glory of the inheritance of God in the Saints. But whereas the faithful, even they that are endued with more excellent gifts above the rest, doe in this lose the first fruition and a certaine taste of that Spirit: there remained nothing leeuuer to them than knowing their owne weaknesses, to hold themselves carefully within the bonds of the word of God: least, if they wander far after their owne sense, they by & by stray out of the right way, inasmuch as they be yet voyde of that Spirit, by whose only teaching truth is discerned from falsehood. For all men do confess with Paul, that they have not yet attained to the mark. Therefore they more endue them to daily profiting, than glory of perfection.

12 But they will take exception, and say that whatsoever is particularly attributed to every one of his holy ones, his same doth throughly and fully belong to the Church it selfe. Although this hath some seeming of truth, yet I deny it to be true. God doth in deed so distribute to every one of the members the gifts of his Spirit by measure, that the whole body wanteth nothing necessary, when the gifts are given in common. But the riches of the Church are alwaies such, that there ever wanteth much of that highest perfection, which our adversaries doe boast of. Yet the Church is not therefore so lesse destitute in any behalf, but that she alway hath so much as is enough. For the Lord knoweth what her necessitie requireth. But, to holde her under humiliation and godly modestie, he giueth her no more than he knoweth to be expedient. expedient, I knowe what here also they are wont to object, that is, that the Church is cleansed with the washing of water in the word of life, that it might be without wrinkle and spot, and therefore in another place it is called the pillar and stay of truth. But in the first of these two places is rather taught, what Christ daily wroughteth in it, than what he hath already done. For if hee daily sanctifieth, purgeth, polisheth, wipeth from spots all them that be his: truly it is certaine that they are yet be sprinkled with some spots and wrinkles, and that there wanteth somewhat of their sanctification. But howe vaine and fabulous is it, to judge the Church already in every part holy and spotlesse, whereof all the members are spotty & very vncleanse? It is true therefore that the Church is sanctified of Christ. But only the beginning of that sanctifying is here scene; but the end and full accomplishment shalbe, when Christ the holiest of holy ones shall truly and fully fill it with his holiness. It is true also that the spots and wrinkles of it are wiped away: but so that they be daily in wiping away, vntil Christ with his comming doe veritally take away all that remaineth. For vnlesse we grant this, we must of necessitie affirme with the Pelagians, that the righteousnesse of the faithfull is perfect in this life: and with the Cathans and Donatistes we must suffer no infirmitie in the Church. The other place, as we haue else where scene, hath a sense veritally differing from that which they pretend. For when Paul hath instructed Timothee, and framed him to the true office of a Bishoppe, he sayeth that hee did it to this purpose, that hee should knowe howe hee ought to behauie himselfe in the Church. And that hee should with the greater religiuouynesse and endeuor bend himselfe thereunto, he addeth that the Church is the very piller and stay of truth. For what else doe these wordes meane, but that the truth of God is perserued in the Church, namely by the ministerie of preaching? As in an other place hee teacheth, Christ gaue Apostles, Pastors and Teachers, that we should no more be caried about with evry winde of doctrine, or be mocked of men: but that being enlightened with the true knowledge of the Sonne of God, we should altogether vncte in vnityce of Faith. Whereas therefore the truth is not extinguished in the world, but remaineth safe, that same commeth to passe because it hath the Church a faithfull keeper of it, by whose helpe and ministery it is susteined. But if this keeping standeth in the ministerie of the Prophetes & Apostles, it followeth that it hangeth wholly hereupon, if the worde of the Lorde be faithfully perserued and doe keepe his purrie.

But that the readers may better understand, vpon what point this question chiefly standeth, I will in few words declare what our adversaries require, and wherein we stand against them. Where they say that the Church cannot err, it tendeth hereunto, and thus they expound it, that forasmuch as it is governed by the Spirit of God, it may go safely without the word: that whither it goeth, it can not thinke nor speake any thing but truth: that therefore it can determine any thing without or beside Goddes worde, the same is no otherwise to be esteemed than as a certaine Oracle of God. If we grant that first pointe, that the Church can not err in thinges necessarie to salvation, this is our meaning, that this is therefore because for taking all her owne wisdom, she suffereth herself to be taught of the holy Ghoft
To Salvation.

Spiritu.

Ioh. 12, 50. and 14, 10.

Ghont by the worde of God. This therefore is the difference. They set the authority of the Church without the worde of God, but we wil that it be annexed to the worde, and suffer it not to bee secured from it. And what martell is it, if the spouse and scholar of Christ bee sibiest to her husbande and schoolemater, that shee continually and earnestly hangeth of his mouth? For this is the order of a well governed house, that the wife shoule obey the authority of the husband: and this is the rule of a well ordered schoole, that the teaching of the schoolemater alone should there be heard. Wherefore let the Church not be wise of her selfe, nor thinke any thing of her selfe: but determine the ende of her wisdome where he hath made an end of speaking. After this maner she shall also distrust all the inventions of her owne reason: but in those things wherein it standeth upon the word of God, she shall wauer with no distrustfulness or doubting, but shall rest with great assure- redness and steadfast constancie. So also trusting vppon the largenesse of those promises that the hath, she shall have whereupon abundantly to sustaine her faith: that she may nothing doubt that the best guide of the right way, the holy spirit, is alway presente with her: but therewithal she shall keepe in memorie what vs the Lord woulde haue vs to receiue of his holy spirit. The spirit (faith he) which I will send from my father shall lead ye into all truth. But how: because (faith he) he shall put you in mind of all those things that I haue tolde you. Therefore he giueth warning there is nothing more to bee looked for of his spirit, but that he should inflighten our minds to perceiue the truth of his doctrine. Therefore Chrystoforme faith excellently well. Many (faith he) do boast of the holy spirit: but they which speak their owne doe falsely pretend that they haue him. As Christ testified hee spoke not of himselfe: because he spake out of the law and the Prophets: so if any thing beside the Gospel be thrufit in vnder the title of the spirit, let vs not beleue it: because as Christ is the fulfilling of the lawe and the Prophets: so is the Spirit of the Gospel. Thefe be his wordes. Now it is eafe to gather howe wrongfully our aduersaries do, which boast of the holy Ghost to no othere end but to set forth vnder his name strange and foraine doctrines from vs worde of God: whereas hee will with vnspakeable knot be conioyned with vs word of God, and the same doth Christ profess of him when hee promiseth him to his Church. So is it truely. What fabritrie the Lord hath once prescribbed to his Church, the same he will haue to be perpetually kept. But he hath forbidden her, that she shold not adde any thing to his word, nor take any thing from it. This is the inuiolable decree of God & of the holy Ghost, which our aduersaries go about to abrogate, when they faine that the Church is ruled of the spirit without the word.

14 Here againe they murmure against vs, and say that it behoved that the Church should adde some things to the writings of the Apostles, or that they themselues shoulde afterwaerde with liuely voice supplie many things which they had not clearly enough taught, namely fith Christ laid vnto them: I haue many things to be tolde to you, which you cannot nowe beare: and that these be the ordinances, which without the scripture haue beene receiued onely in vs & maner. But what shamelesse is this? I grant the disciples were yet rude, and in a maner vnapt to learne, when the Lord faide faide this vnto them. But were they then also holiden with such dulnes, when they did put their doctrine in writing, that they afterward needed to supply with liuely voice that which they had by fault of ignorance omitted in their writings? But if they were already led by the Spiri of truth into all truthe when they did set foorth their writings: what hinderly they have not therin contained and left written a perfect knowledge of the doctrine of the gospel? But go to: let vs graunt them that which they require. Only let the point out what bee those things that it behoved to be reveale without writing.
If they dare enterprise that, I wil asilile them with Augustine's words that is,
When the Lord had said nothing of them, which of vs dare say, these they be or those they be; or if any dare say so, whether doth he proue it? But why doe I strive about a superfluos matter? For a very childe doth know, that in the writings of the Apostles, which these men doe make in a manner lame and but halfe perfect, there is the fruit of that revelation which the Lord did the promise them.

15 What say they, did not Christe put out of controversie whatsoever the Church teacheth and decreeth, when he commandeth him to be taken from a heathen man and a Publicane that dare say against her? First in that place is no mention made of doctrine, but only the authorie of the censures is established for correcting of vices, that they which have bene admonished or rebuked should not resift her judgemet. But omitting this, it is much maruell, that these losels haue so litle frame, y they dare be proud of that place.
For what shall they get thereby, but the content of the Church is neuer to be desplished, which never confesseth but vnto the truth of the worde of God: The Church is to be heard, say they. Who denieth it? for asmuch as it pronounce nothing but out of the word of the Lord. If they require any more let them knowe that these wordes of Christ do nothing take their part therin. Neither ought I to be thought too much contentious because I stand so earnestly vpon this point, That it is not lawfull for the Church to make a ny newe doctrine, that is to teach and deliuer for an Oracle any more than that which the Lord hath reveale by his word. For men of sound wi doe fee howe great daunger there is, if so great authoritie be once graunted to men.
They fee also how wide a window is opened to the mockings and calumniations of the wicked, if we say that y which men haue judged is to be taken for an Oracle among Christians. Beside that, Christ speaking according to the consideration of his owne time, giueth this name to the Synagogue, that his disciples should afterward learne to reverence holy assembleys of the church.
So should it come to passe that every citie and village should haue egall au-thoritie in conyng of doctines.

16 The examples which they vfe, do nothing helpe them. They say that the Baptisme of infants proceeded not so much from the exprese commandement of the scripture as from the decree of the Church. But it were a verie miferable succour, if we were compelled to flee to the bare authori-tie of the Church for defence of the Baptisme of infants: but it shall in an other place sufficiently appeare that it is far otherwise. Likewise whereas they obiect that that is no where founde in the Scripture, which was pronounced in the Nicene Synode, that the sonne is consubstantiall with the father: therein they do great wrong to the fathers, as though they had rashly condemned Arrian, because he would not swear to their words, when he professed all that doctrine which is comprehended in the writings of the Prophets and Apostles. This word, I grant, is not in the Scripture: but where therein is so oft affirmed, that there is but one God, again, Christ is so oft called the true and eternal God, one with the Father: what other thing do the fathers of the Nicene council when they declare that he is of one substance, but simply set out the natural sense of the Scripture? But Theodoret reporteth that Constantine spake this preface in their assembly. In disputations (faith he) of divine matters, there is a preferred doctrine of the holy Ghost: the books of the Gospels and of the Apostles, with the Oracles of the Prophets, do fully shew to the meaning of God. Therefore laying away discourse, let us take the discussions of questions out of the words of the Spirit. There was at that time no man that spake against these holy monitions. No man took exception, that the Church might add somewhat of her own; that the Spirit revealed not all things to the Apostles, or at least uttered them, not to those that came after; or any such thing. If it bee true which our adversaries would have: first, Constantine did teill, that took from the Church her authority; then, whereas none of the Bishops at that time rose vp to defend it, this was not without breach of their faith: for so they were betrayers of the right of the Church. But first Theodoret rehearsed that they willingly embraced that which the Emperor saide, it is certain that this newe doctrine was then utterly unknown.

The ix. Chapter.

Of Councils and of their authority.

Nowe, although I grant them all things concerning the Church: yet they shall thereby not much presuma for their intent. For whatsoever is faide of the Church, the same they by and by gin to the Councils, forasmuch as in their opinion those represent the Church. Yea, where they so stiffly conteinde for the power of the Church, they doe it of no other purpose, but to give all that they can get to the Bishop of Rome and his garde. But ere I begin to discourse this question, I must needs here make protestation of two things aforehand. First, that where I shall in this point be somewhat rough, it is not because I lesse esteeme the old Councils than I ought to do. For I reverence them from my heart, & with them to be had in their due honor with all men. But herein is some meanes, that is, that there be nothing withdrawn from Christ. Nowe this is the right of Christ, to bee the head in all Councils, and to have no man fellowe with him in this dignitie. But I say that then onely he is the head, when he governeth the whole assembly with his words and Spirit. Secondly, whereas I give lesse to Councils than the adversaries require, I do it not for this cause that I am afraid of the Councils, as though they did make for their side, and were against ours. For as we are abundantly furnished with the worde of the Lord to the full proofe of our own doctrine fully, and to the ouerthrow of the whole Ece. Papistrie Papistrie that wee neede nor much to desire any other thing besides it: so if the matter require, the olde Counsels do for a great part minister vnto vs so much as may suffice for both.

2 Now let vs speake of the thing it selfe. If it bee sought of the Scriptures, what is the authoritie of Counsels: there is no plainer promiseth than in this sayning of Christ: Where two or three shalbe gathered together in my name, there I am in the middeft of them. But that doeth no leffe belong to euery particular assembly than to a generall Counsell. But the dout of the question standeth not therein: but because there is a condition added, that God will so onely be in the middeft of the Counsell, if it be gathered together in his name. Therefore although our aduertizaries do a thousand times name Counsels of Bishops, they shal little preuaile: neither shal they make vs to beleue that which they affirme, that is, that they be governed of vs holy Ghost, until they have proued that they are gathered together in the name of Christ. For it is as possible, wicked & eueul Bishopps may conspire against Christ, as good & honest Bishoppes may come together in his name. For a verie cleare prooue hereof are many decrees that have proceeded from such Counsels. But this shalbe seen hereafter. Now I do but answere in one word that Christ promiseth nothing, but to them that are gathered together in his name. Let vs therefore define what that is. I deny that they be gathered together in the name of Christ, which cast away the commaundement of God, wherein he forbiddest any thing to be added to his word, or taketh from it, do decrees euery thing after their owne will: which being not contented with the Oracles of the Scripture, that is to say the only rule of perfect wise, do imagine some new thing of their owne head. Surely, if Christ hath not promised he wilbe present at all Counsels, but hath adioyned a peculiar marke, whereby to make true & lawful Counsells different from other: it is meete that we should not neglect this difference. This is the covenant, which in old time God made with the Leuitical priests, they should teach out of his mouth. This he alwaies required of the Prophets: this lawe also wee fee to haue bin laid vpon the Apostles. Who so breake this covenant, God doeth not vouchsafe, to let them haue the honor of Priesthood, nor any authority. Let the aduertizaries vnde me this knot, if they wil make my faith bold to the decrees of men beside the worde of God.

3 For whereas they think not that truth remaineth in the Church, vnlesse it be among the Pastours: and that the Church it selfe standeth not, vnlesse it appeare in generall Counsells: that is farre from haueinge beene alwaies true, if the Prophets haue left vnto vs true testimonies of their owne times. There was in the time of Esaie a Church at Hierusalem, which God had not yet forsaken. But of the pastours he faith thus: The watchmen are al blinde, neither know they any thing. They are al dumm dogs, neither are they able to barke. They lay along & sleepe, & loute sleeping: & the Pastors themselues knowe nothing, nor do vnderstand; and they do altogether loke backe vnto their owne ways. After the same maner Osee sayeth: The watchman of Ephraim with God, the snare of the souler, hatred in the house of God. Where joyning them with God by way of mockeage, he teacheth that their pretence of the priesthood is vaine. The Church also endured vnto the time.
To Salvation. Lib. 4.

Let us hear what he sayeth of the Pastors. From the Prophet even to the priest, every one followeth lying. Again: The Prophets do prophesie a lye in my name, when I have not sent them, nor commanded them. And least we should be too long in reciting his words, let those things be read that he hath written in the whole xxiii. and xl. chapters. At that time on the other side Ezechiel did no more gently incey against the same men. The conspiracies (faith he) of the Prophets in the mids of her as a roaring lyon, and that violently taketh his pray. Her priests have broken my law, and have defiled my holy things, and have made no difference betweene holy and profane: & the rest that he adiouneth to suche effect. Like complaints are euery where in the Prophets, so that nothing is oft found in them.

But perhaps it might be that that was so among the Iewes: but our age is free from so great an euil. I woulde to God in deede it were so: but the Holy Ghost hath giuen warning that it shalbe farre otherwise. The wordes of Peter are plaine. As (faith he) there were in the old people false Prophets, so shal there also be among you false teachers, flying bringing in sectes of perdition. See you not how he sayeth, that there is danger to com, not by men of the common people, but by them that shall boast themselves with the title of teachers and Pastors? Morover howe oft hath it bin forespoken by Chrift and his Apostles, that there shoulde verey great dauners hang over the Church by the Pastors? Yea, Paul plainly sheweth, that Antichrist shall sit in no other place than in the temple of God. Whereby hee signifieth, that the horrible calamitie of which he there speakeh, that come from no where else but from them shal sit in stede of Pastors in Iy church. And in another place he sheweth, that the beginnings of so great a mischief are euery alredy nere at hand. For when he speakeh to the bishops of Ephesus, I knowe (faith he) that after my departure there shall enter into you ravenous wolves not sparing the flocke. And they shallbe of your owne selues, that shall speake peruers things, to leade away discipiles after them. Howe much corruption might a long course of yeres bring among Pastors, when they could so farre goe out of kind in so small a space of time? And, not to fill much paper with rehearsing them by name: wee are admonished by the examples in a maner of all ages, that neither the truest is alway nourished in the bosome of the pastors, nor the sectes of the Church doeth hang vpon their state. They ought in deede to have beene the gouernors & keepers of the peace & sectes of the Church, for perseruation whereof, they are ordained: but it is one thing for a man to performe that which he ought, and another thing to owe that which he perfourmeth not.

Yet let no man take these our wordes in such part, as though I woulde euery where and rashly without any choice diminish the authority of Pastors. I do but onely admonish that euery among Pastors themselves there is a choice to be had, that wee should not immediately thinke them to be Pastors that are so called. But the Pope with all his flocke of bishops, vpon none other reason, but because they are called Pastors, shaking away the obedience of the worde of God, do tumble & toffe all things after their owne lust: and in the meane time they travaile to persuade, that they cannot bee

deflute of the light of truth, that the spirit of God perpetually abideth in them, yea the Church consisteth in them & dieth with them. As though there be now no judgements of the Lord, whereby he may punish the world at this day with the same kind of punishment, wherewith sometime he took vengeance of the unthankfulness of the old people, that is, to strike the Pastors with blindness & amafe dulness. Neither do they most foolish men understand, that they sing the same song, which those in old time did sing that warred against the worde of God. For the enemies of Hieremie did thus prepare themselves against the truth: Come, & we will imagine imaginations against Hieremie: forasmuch as the law shall not perish from the Priest, nor counsel from the wise man, nor the word from the Prophet.

6 Hereby it is saie to the wise men to that other objection concerning general counsels. It cannot be denied but that the Jews had a true Church in the time of the Prophets. But if there had then bene a generall council gathered together of the priests, what maner face of the Church had there appeared? We heare what God faith, not to one or two of them but to y whole order: The priests shall be astonished, and the prophets shall be made afraid. Againe, the law shall perish from the priest, and counsell from the Elders.

Ezech. 7. 26. Againe, Night shall be to you in stead of a vision, and darkenesse in stead of prophecy; and the sunne shall fall downe upon the Prophets, and bee darkened vpon these dayes &c. Well if such had then bene gathered together in one, what Spirit shoulde have gouerned in that assemble: of that thing we have a notable example in that counsell which Achab called together. There were present foure hundred Prophets. But, because they were come together of no other minde but to flatter the wicked king: therefore Satan was sent of the Lord to be a lying spirit in the mouth of them all. There by all their voices the truth was condemned. Micha was condemned for an heretike, stricken and cast in prison. So was done to Hieremie, so to the other Prophets.

7 But let one example suffice for all, which is more notable than the rest. In that counsell which the bishops and Pharisees gathered at Hierusalem against Christ, what can a man say that there wanted, so much as pertained to the outward shewe? For if there had not then bene a Church at Hierusalem, Christ would never haue communicate with their sacrifices & other ceremonies. There was made a solemnse summoning of them together: the hier bishop fate as chief: the whole order of priests fate by him: yet Christ was there condemned, & his doctrine driven away. This doing is a proofe, that the Church was not enclosed in that counsel. But there is no perill that any such thing should happen to vs. Who hath giuen vs assurance thereof? For it is not without fault of sluggisnesse, to be too careless in so great a matter. But where the Holy Ghost doth with expresse words prophesie by his mouth of Paul, that there shall come a departing ( which cannot come but that the Pastors must be the first that shall forsake God) why are we here in wilfully blinde to our owne destruction? Wherefore is it in no wise to be granted, that the Church consisteth in the companie of Pastours, for whome the Lord hath no where vnderstaken that they shall perpetually be good, but he hath pronounced that they shall sometime be cuill. But when he he warneth vs of the danger, he doth it to this endent to make vs the water.

8 What then wilt thou say: Shall the councells haue no authoritie in determining? Ye forsooth. For neither do I here argue that all councells are to be condemned, or all their actes to be repelled, or (as the saying is) to be defaced with one blotte. But (thou wilt say to mee) thou bringeft them all into subiection, that it may bee free for every man to receiue or refuse that which the councells have determined. Not so. But so oft as the decree of any councell is brought forth, I would have it first to be diligently weyed, at what time it was holden, for what cause it was holden, what manner of men were present and then the very thing that is intreated of, to be examined by the rule of the Scripture: and that in such sort as the determination of the councell may haue his force, and be as a forejudged sentence, and yet not hinder the aforesaid examination. I would to God all men did keep that moderation which Augustin prescribeth in the third booke against Maximinus. For when he minded briefly to put to silence this heretike contending about the Decrees of councells: Neither (faith he) ought I to object against thee the Synode of Nice, nor thou against mee the Synode of Ariminum, as to the endent to conclude one another by forejudged sentence, neither am I bound by the authoritie of the one, nor thou of the other. By authorities of Scriptures, not such as are proper to either one, but such as are common to both; let there thrive matter with matter, cause with cause, reason with reason. So should it come to passe, that councells shoule haue the maistersie that they ought: but in the meanest reason the Scripture shoule be alone in the hier place, that there might be nothing that should not be subject to the rule thereof. So these olde Synodes, as of Nice, of Constantinople, the first of Ephesus, of Chalcedon, and such other, which were holden for confessing of errors, wee willingly embrace and reverence as holy, so much as belongeth to the doctrines of faith: for they conteine nothing but the pure and naturall expostion of Scripture, which the holy fathers with spirituall wisdome applied to the subduing of the enemies of religion that then rofe vp. In some of the later councells also, we see to appeare a true zeale of godliness, and plaine tokens of wit, learning, and wisdome. But as things are wont commonly to growe to worse, wee may see by the latter councells, how much the Church hath nowe and then degenerate from the purenesse of that golden age. And I doubt not but that in these corrueter ages also, councells haue had some bishops of the better sort. But in these the same happened which the Senatoris themselves complained to be not well done in making of ordinances of the senate of Rome. For while the sentences are numbred, not weyed, it is of necessitie that oftentimes the better parte is overcomne of the greater. Truely they brought forth many wicked sentences. Neither is it here needefull to gather the speciall examples, either because it should be too long, or because other haue done it so diligently that there cannot much be added.

9 Now, what neede I to rehearste Councells disagreeing with councells? And it is no cause that any should murmur against mee, and say, that of those councells that disagree the one is not lawfull. For, howe shall we judge that? By this, if I be not deceived, that wee shall judge by the Scriptures. that the decrees thereof are not agreeable with true doctrine. For this is the only certain lawe to discerne them by. It is nowe about nine hundred years ago, since the Synode of Constantinople gathered together under Leo the Emperor, judged that images set vp in Churches should be overthrown, and broken in pieces. A little afterward, the council of Nice, which Irene the Empresse assembled in spite of him, decreed that they should be restored. Whether of these two that we acknowledge for a lawfull council?
The latter which gave images a place in Churches, hath prevailed among the people. But Augustine faith that that cannot be done without most present peril of idolatrie. Epiphanius which was before in time, speakeath much more sharply: for he faith that it is wickednesse and abomination to have images seen in a Church of Christians. Would they that so speake, allowe that council, if they were alive at this day? But if both the historians tell truth, and the vertue acts be belieued, not onely images themselfes, but also the worshipping of them was there received. But it is evident that such a decree came from Satan. How say you to this, that in depraving and rearing the Scripture, they shew that they made a mocking flocke of it? Which thing I haue before sufficiently made open. Howsoever it be, wee shall no otherwise be able to discerne betweene contrarie and disagreeing Synodes, which were many, vnlesse we trie them all by that balance of all men and angels, that is, by the worde of the Lorde. So wee embrace the Synode of Chalcedon, refusing the seconde Synode of Ephesus, because in this latter one the wickednesse of Eutiches was confirmed, which the other former co-demned. This thing holy men haue judged none otherwise but by the scripture: whome wee so follow in judging: that the worde of God which gate light to them doeth also nowe giue light to vs. Now let the Romanists goe and boast, as they are wont, that the Holy Ghoft is fastened and bound to their counsels.

10 Howbeit there is also somewhat which a man may well thinke to bee wanting in those auncient and purer counsels: either because they that then were at them, seeing otherwise learned and wise men, wholly bent to the businesse then in hand, did not foresee many other things, or for that many things of lighter importance escaped them, being busied with weightier & more earnest matters: or for that simply, as being men they might bee de-ceiued with vnskilfulness: or for that they were sometime carried headlong with too much affection. Of this last point ( which seemeth the hardest of all) there was a plaine example in the Nicene Synode, the dignitie whereof hath by content of all men, as it was worthie, bene received with most hie reverence. For when the principal article of our faith was there in daunger, Arrius the enimie was present in readiness, with whom they must fight hande to hande, and the chief importance lay in the agreement of them that came prepared to fight against the error of Arrius; this notwithstanding, they carelesse of so great daungers, yea, as it were hauing forgotten gravitie, modestie and all humanitie, leaving the battail that they had in hand, as if they had come thither of purpose to doe Arrius a pleasure, began to wounde themselues with inwarde dissentions, and to turne against themselves the stile that should have been bent against Arrius. There were heard heard foule objections of crimes, there were scattered bookes of accusations and there would have bin no end made of contentions, vntill they had with mutual wounds one destroyed another, vnlesse Emperor Constantine had prevented it, which professing that the examining of their life was a matter aboute his knowledge, and chastised such intemperance rather with praise than with rebuking. Howe many wayes is it credible that the other coun-celles also failed, which followed afterwarde? Neither doeth this matter neede long proofe. For if a man reade oure the acts of the counsellers, hee shall note therein many infirmities: though I speake of nothing more greeuous.

11 And Leo bishoppe of Rome sticketh not to charge with ambition and vaunquisht rashnesse, the Synode of Chaleedon, which yet he confesseth to be founde in doctrines. He doth in deedes not deny that it was a lawfull Syn-node; but he openly affirmeth, that it might erre. Some man peradventure will think me fonde, for that I use my selfe in theweing such errores: forasmuch as our adversaries do confess, that counsellers may erre in those things that are not necessarie to saltuation. But this labour is not yet superfluous. For although because they are cœpelled, they do in deedes confess it in word: yet when they thrust vnto vs the determination of all counsellors in every matter whatsoever it be, for an oracle of the holy Ghost, they do therein require more than they take at the beginning. In so doing what do they affirm, but that counsellors can not erre: or if they erre, yet it is not lawfull for us to see the true, or not to sooth their errores? And I intende nothing else, but that it may thereby be gathered that the holy Ghost, so governed the godly and holy Synodes, that in the mean time hee suffered somewhat to happen to them by the nature of men, leaft wee shoulde too much trouble to men. This is a much better sentence, than that of Gregorie Nazianzene, he neuer saw a good end of any counsell. For he that affirmeth that all without exception ended ill, doth not leave them much authoritie. It is nowe nothingneedfull to make mention seuerally of prouinciall counsellors: forasmuch as it is easie to judge by the generall, how much authoritie they ought to have to make newe articles of faith and to receive what kinde of doctrine focrue it pleaseth them.

12 But our Romanistes, when they see that in defence of their cause all helpe of reason doth faile them, doe resort to that extreme & miserable shift: that although the men themselfes be blockish in witt and counsell, and most wicked in minde and will, yet the word of God remaineth, which commandeth to obey Rulers. Is it so? what if I deny that they be rulers that are such? For they ought to take uppon themselfes, no more than Iosua had, which was both a Prophete of the Lorde, and an excellent pastor. But let vs here with what wordes he is set by the Lorde into his office. Let not (fayth he) the volume of this lawe depart from thy mouth: but thou shalt studie vspon vs dayes and nightes. Thou shalt neither bowe to the right hande nor to the left: then shalt thou direct thy way & understand it. They therefore shalbe to vs spiritual rulers which shal not bow from the law of the Lord, neither to the one side nor to the other. But if the doctrine of all pastors whatsoever they bee, is to be received without any doubting, to what purpose was it that wee should so oft and so earnestly be admonished not to harken to the speech of false prophets. Hear not (saith he by Hieremias the words of the prophets that prophesie to you. For they teach you vanity, and not out of the mouth of the Lord. Again, Beware you of false prophets; that come unto you in sheepes clothing, but inwardly are ravening wolves. And John should in vain exhort vs, that we should prove the spirits, whether they be of God. From which judgement the very Angels are not exempted, much leffe Satan with all his lies, What is to be said of this saying, if the blinde lead the blind, they shall both fall into the ditch? Doth it not sufficiently declare, yit it is of great importance what manner of prophets be heard, and that not all are rashly to be heard? Wherefore there is no reason that they should make vs afraine with their titles, thereby to draw vs into partaking of their blindness: forasmuch as we see on the other side, that the Lord had a singular care to fray vs away from suffering our selves to be led with other mens errour, under what visor of name soever it lurketh. For if the answer of Christ be true, then all blinde guides, whether they be called fathers of the Church, or prelates, or bishops, can doe nothing but drawe their partners into the same headlong downe fall. Wherefore let no names of counseels, pastors, bishoppes, (which may as well be falsely pretendted as truely vsed) hinder vs, but that being taught by lessons both of wordes and examples, we may examine all spirits of all men by the rule of the worde of God, that wee may proue whether they be of God or no.

13 Forasmuch as we have proued that there is not given to the Church a power to set vp a newe doctrine, nowe let vs speake of the power which they attribute vnto it in expounding of Scripture. Truely we do willingly graunt, that if there happen debate about any doctrine, there is no better nor surer remedy therein, as a Synode of true bishops assemble together, where the doctrin in controversie may be disscussed. For such a determination, whereunto yt pastors of Churches shall agree in common together, calling upon the Spirit of Christ, shall have much greater force, than if euerie one severally shoulde conceiue it at home, and so teach it to the people, or if a fewe private men should make it. Againe, when bishoppes are gathered in one, they doe the more commodiously take aduise in common, what and in what forme they ought to teach, least diuersitie should brecde offence. Thirdly Paul pre-scribeth this order in discerning of doctrines: For whereas he gueeth to euery feuerall Church a power to discern, he sheweth what is the order of doing in weightier causes: that is, that the Churches should take vpon them a common triall of the matter together. And so doth the very seeling of godlinesse instruct vs, that if any man trouble the Church with an unwonted doctrine, and the matter proccede so farre that there bee peril of greater dissension, the Churches should first meete together, and examine the question propounded: at least, after iust discoursing had, bring forth a determination taken out of the Scripture, such as may both take away douting out of ye peoples & stop the mouthes of wicked and greedy men, ye they may not be so hardy to proceed any further. So when Arrius was riven, the Nicean Sinode was gathered together, which with the authoritie thereof both did breake the wicked endeavours of the yngodly man, and restored peace to the Churches which:

which he had vexed, and defended the eternal godhead of Christ, against his blasphemous doctrine. When afterwarde Eunomius & Macedonius stirred vp newe troubles, their madnesse was resifted with like remedie by the Synode of Constantinople. In the Council at Ephesus the wickednes of Nestorius was banished. Finally this hath beene from the beginning the ordinarie meane in the Church to preferue vitii, so oft as Satan began to worke any thing. But let vs remember, that not in all ages of all places are found Athanafies, Basiles, Cyrilles, and such defenders of true doctrine whom the Lorde then raised vp. But let vs thinke what happened at Ephesus in the seconde Synode, where the heretie of Eutiches prevaile, the man of holy memory Flavianus was banished with certaine other godly men; and many such mischeues committed: even because Dioscorus a seditious man & of a very naughtie nature, was there the cheefe, and not the spirite of the Lorde. But there was not the Church. I grant. For this I determine yteterly that y trueth doeth not therefore die in the Church, although it be oppressed of one counsell: but that the Lorde meruellously prefuereth it, that it may againe in due time rife vp, and get the overhande. But I denye that this is perpetuall, that that is a true and certaine expostion of scripture which hath beene receiued by consentes of a counsell.

14 But the Romanists shoote at another marke, when they teach that the power to expounde the Scripture belongeth to the councelles, yea and that without appellation from them. For they abuse this colour to call it an expostion of the scripture whatsoeuer is decreed in the councells. Of purgatorie, of the intercession of saintes, of auricular confession, and such other there cannot be founde one syllable in the scriptures. But because all these things have beene stablished by the authoritie of the Church, that is to say (to speake truely) receiued in opinion and vfe, therefore every one of them must be taken for an expostion of scripture. And not that onely: But if a counsell decree any thing, though scripture crieth out against it, yet it shal beare the name of an expostion thereof. Christ commandeth all to drinke of the cup, which hee receieth in the Supper. The counsell of Constance forbad that it shoulde not be giuen to the lay peopke, but willed that the priest one ly shoulde drinke of it. That which so directly fighethe against the institution of Christ, they will haue to bee taken for an expostion of it. Paul calleth the forbidding of marriage, the hypocrisie of diuels: And the holy Ghost in an other place pronounceith that marriage is in all men holy and honourable. Whereas they haue afterwarde forbidden priests to marrie, they require to haue that taken for the true & natural expostion of the Scripture, when nothing can be imagined more against it: If any dare once open his mouth to the contrarie, hee shalbe judged an heretike: because the determination of the Church is without appellation: and to doubt of her expostion, that it is not true, is a hainous offence. Why shoulde I inuoy against so great shamelesnesse? For the very shewing of it is an overcomning of it. As for that which they teach of the power to allowe the scripture, I warningly passe it ouer. For in such sorte to make the Oracles of God subiect to the judgement of men, that they sholde therefore be offorce because they haue pleased men, is a blasphemie vnworthie to bee rehearsed: and I haue Ecc 5.

before touched the same matter already. Yet I will ask them one thing: If the authoritie of the scripture be founded upon the allowance of the Church, what councils decree will they allegge of that matter? I think they have none. Why then did Arrius suffer himselfe to be overcom at Nice with testimonies brought out of the Gospel of John? For after these mens saying, it was free for him to have refused them, forasmuch as there had no allowance of a general council gone before. They allegge the old rolle, which is called the Canon, which they say to have proceeded from the judgement of the church. But I ask them againe, in what counsell that Canon was set forth. Here they must needs be dumme. Howbeit I desire further to knowe, what manner of Canon they thinke that was. For I see that the same was not very certainely agreed among the olde writers. And if that which Hierome sayth ought to be of force, the bookes of Machabees, Tobie, Ecclesiasticus & such other shall be thrust among the Apocrypha: which those canons doe in no wise suffer to be done.

The x. Chapter.

Of the power in making of Laws: where in the Pope and his have used a most cruelly tyrannic and butchery upon soules.

Nowe followeth the seconde parte, which they will haue to conside in making of lawes, out of which spring haue flowed innumerable traditons of men, even so many shares to strangle poore soules. For they haue had no more conscience than had the Scribes and Pharisees to lay burdens upon other mens shoulders, which they themselves would not touch with one finger. I haue in another place taught howe cruelly a butcherie is that which they commaunde concerning auricular confession. In other lawes there appeareth not so great violence: but those which seeme the most tolerable of all, doe tyrannously oppresse confusions. I leave vs spoken howe they corrupt the worchippe of God, and do spoile God himselfe of his right, which is the onely lawmaker. This power is nowe to be intreated of, whether the Church may binde confiences with her lawes. In which discourse the order of policie is not touched, but this only is intended, that God bee rightly worshipped according to the rule which himselfe hath prescribed, & that the spiritual libertie which hath regard unto God, maye remaine safe vnto vs. We haue made that all those decrees bee called traditions of men, whatsoever they bee that haue concerning the worshipping of God proceeded from men beside his words. Against these doe we striue, nor against the holy and profitable ordinances of the Church which make for the preservation either of discipline or honestie or peace. But the end of our striuing is, that the immeasurable and barbarous Empire may bee restrained, which they vnspoke vpon soules, that would bee counted pastors of the Church, but in very deede are most cruel butchers. For they say that the lawes which they make are spiritual, and pertaining to the soule, and they affirme them to bee necessarie to eternall life. But if (as I even nowe touched) the kingdome of Christ is invaded, so the libertie by him gien to the confiences of of the faithfull is vtherly oppressed and throwen abroade. I speake not nowe with how great vnGodlineffe they stablish the obsteuing of their lawes, while out of it they teach men to seke both forgiuennesse of sinnes, and righteou-ness, and salvation, while they set in it the whole summe of religion & godlineffe. This one thing I earnestly holde, that there ought no necessitie to be laide vpon consciences in those thinges wherein they are made free by Chrift, and vnlineffe they bee made free, as we haue before taught, they can not reft with God. They must acknowledge one onely king Chrift their deluerer, and be governed by one lawe of libertie, eu'n the holy worde of the Gospell, if they will keepe still the grace which they haue once obteyned in Chrift: they must be holden with no bondage, and bound with no bonds.

2 These Solons do indeede faime their constitutions are lawes of libertie, a sweete yoke, a light burden: but who can not fee that they bee meere lies? They themselves indeede doe feele no heuinesse of their owne lawes, which calting away the feare of God, doe carelesly and stoutly neglect both their owne and Gods lawes. But they that are touched with any care of their salvation, are farre from thinking themselves free so long as they bee intangled with these snares. We fee with how great wearineffe Paul did deale in this behalfe, that he durst not so much as in any one thing lay vpon men any shame at all, and that not without cause. Truely he forelawe with howe great a wounde confciences shoulde be stricken, if they shoulde bee charged with a necessitie of those things whereof the Lord had left them libertie. On the other side the constitutions are almost innumerable, which these men haue most greuously stablished with threatenning of eterna death, which they most seuerely require as necessarie to salvation. And among those there are many most hard to bee kept, but all of them (if the whole multitude of them be laid together) are impossible: so great is the heape. Howe then shall it bee possible, that they vpon whom so great a weight of difficulty lieth, shoulde not be vexed in perperitie with extreme anguiflie & terror? Therefore my purpose is here to impure such constitutions, as tende to this ende, inwardly to bind soules before God, and charge them with a religion, as though they taught them of things necessarie to salvation.

3 This question doth therefore incumber the most part of men, because they doe not fittly enouegh put difference betweene the outward courte (as they call it) and the court of confcienc. Moreover this increaseth the difficultie, that Paul reacheth that the magistrate ought to be obeyed, not one-ly for feare of punishment, but for confciences sake. Wherevpon followeth, that confciences are also bound with the politike lawes. But if it were so, then all should fall that we haue spoken in the last chapter and intende nowe to speake concerning the spirittuall government. For the losing of this knot, first it is good to learn what is confcienc. The definition is to be gathered of the proper deriuation of the word. For, as when men doe with mind and understanding conceiue the knowledge of things, they are thereby faide confciere, to knowe, whereupon is derived the name of science knowledge: so when they haue a feeling of Gods judgement as a witnesse adioyned with them which doeth not suffer them to hide their sinnes, but that they bee brought accused to the judgement feare of God, that same feeling is called confcienc.

For
Cap. 10. Of the outward meanes

For it is a certaine meane betwenee God and man: because it suffereth not man to suppresseth which he knoweth, but pursueth him so farre it bring him to guiltines. This is it that Paul meaneth when he teacheth that conscience doeth together witnesse with men, when their thoughtes doe accuse or acquit them in the judgement of God. A simple knowledge might remayne in man as inclosed. Therefore this feeling which presenteth man to the judgement of God, is as it were a keeper toyed to man, to make and watche all his secretes, that nothing should remaine burned in darkenesse. Wherevpon also commeth that olde proverbe, conscience is a thousande witnesse. For the same reason also Peter hath set the examination of a good conscience, for quietnesse of minde, when wee being perswaded of the grace of Christ, doe without feare present our selues to God. And the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, writeth thefe wordes, to haue no more conscience of sinne, in stead of, to be delivered or acquitted, that sinne may no more accuse vs.

Therefore as workes have respect to men, so the conscience is referred to God: so that conscience is nothing else but the inwarde purenesse of the heart. In which sense Paul writeth that charitie is the fulfilling of the lawe, out of a pure conscience, & faith not fained. Afterwarde also in the same chapter hee teacheth howe much it differeth from understanding, saying that some had suffered shipwrecke from the faith, because they had fortaken good conscience. For in these words he signifieth, that it is a liuely affection to worshippe God, and a sincere desire to live godly and holy.

Sometime indeede it is referred also to men, as in Luke, when the same Paul testifieth, that he intreued himselfe that he might walke with a good conscience towards God and men. But this was therefore saide, because the fruiteres of good conscience doe flowe, and come euon to men. But in speaking properly, it hath respect to God onely, as he haue already saide. Herevpon commeth that a lawe is saide to binde conscience, which simplicy bindeth a man, without regard of men, or not hauing any consideration of them. As for example, God commaundeth not onely to keepe the minde chaste and pure from all lust, but also forbiddest all manner of filthinesse of wordes and outwarde wantonnesse what soever it bee. To the keeping of this lawe my conscience is subiect, although there liued not one man in the world. So hee that behaueth himselfe intemperately, doth not onely sinne in this that he giateth euill example to his brethren, but he hath his conscience bounde with guiltinesse before God. In things that are of themselves meane, there is another consideration. For wee ought to absteine from them, if they breede any offence, but the conscience still being free. So Paul speaketh off the consecrate to idoles. If any (faith hee) make doubt, touch it not, for consciences sake. I say for conscience, not thine owne, but the others. A faithfull man shoulde sinne, which being first warned should notethelesse eate of such flesh. But howesoeuer in respect of his brother, it be neceffarie for him to absteine, as it is prescribed of God, yet hee cometh not to keepe still the libertie of conscience. Wee see howe this lawe binding the outwarde worke, leaueth the conscience vnbound.

Nowe let vs returne to the lawes of men. If they bee made to this end, ende, to charge vs with a religion, as though the obsetting of them were of itselfe necessary, then wee say that that is layd vpon conscience which was not lawfull to be layd vpon it. For our consciences have not to do with men, but with God only: whereunto pertaineth that common difference between the earthly court and the court of conscience. When the whole worlde was wrapped in a most thickne mist of ignorance, yet this small sparcle of light remained, they acknowledged a mans conscience to be aboue all judgements of men. Howbeit the same thing that they did with one worde confesse, they did afterward in deede overthrowe: yet it was Goddes will that there should then also remaine some testimonie of Christian libertie, which might deliver consciences from the tyranny of men. But difficulty is not yet dissolved, which ariseth out of the wordes of Paul. For if we must obey Princes not onely for penalties sake, but also for conscience, it seemeth thereupon to follow that Princes lawes have also dominion over conscience. If this be true, then the same also ought to be said of the lawes of the Church. I answere that first here we must put a difference betwene the generaltie & specialtie. For though all special lawes do not touch the conscience, yet we are bounde by the generall commandement of God, which commendeth vnto vs the authority of magistrates. And vpon this point standeth the disputation of Paul that magistrates are to be honored because they are ordained of God. In the meane time he teacheth not that those lawes that are prescribed by them, do belong to the inwarde government of the soule: whereas he teacheth both the worshipping of God and the spirituall rule of liuing righteously, above all the ordinances of men whatsoever they be. An other thing also is worthy to be noted, (which yet hangeth vpon the former,) that laws of men, whether they be made by the magistrate or by the Church, although they be necessary to be kept, (I speake of the good and righteous lawes,) yet therefore do not by themselves binde conscience, because the whole necessitie of keeping them is referred to the generall ende, but consiteth not in the thinges commanded. From this sort do farre differ both those that prescrib a newe forme of the worshipping of God, and those that appoint necessitie in thinges that be at libertie.

6. But such are those that at this day be called Ecclesiastical constitutions in the Papacie, which are thrust in, in stead of the true and necessarie worshipping of God. And as they be innumerable: so are there infinite bondes to catch and snare soules. But although in the declaration of the lawe we have somewhat touched them: yet because this place was fitter to encrease fully of them, I will now traualie to gather together the whole summe in the best order that I can. And because we haue already discoursed so much as seemed to be sufficient, concerning the tyranny which the false bishops doe take vpon them selves, in libertie to teach whatsoever they list, I will now omitt all that part: and I will here tarry only vpon declaring the power, which they say they haue, to make lawes. Our false bishops therefore do burden consciences with new lawes, under this pretence, that they are ordained of the Lord spirittuall lawmakers, since the government of the Church is committed vnto them. Therefore they affirme that whatso euer they commande and prescrib, ought necessarily to be obserued of the Christian people: and that he that breaketh it, is guilty of double disobedience, for he is rebellious both to God and to the Church. Certainly, if they were true bishops, I would in this behalf grant to them some authority, not so much as they require, but so much as is requisite to the well ordering of the policy of the Church. Nowe if they are nothing lesse than that which they wold be accounted, they can not take any thing to them, be it never so little, but they shall take too much. But because this hath beeene else where considered, let vs grant them at this present, that whatsoever power true bishops haue, y same rightly belongeth to them also: yet I deny that they be therefore appointed lawmakers over the faithfull, that may of themselves prescribe a rule to live by, or compell to their ordinances the people committted unto them. When I say this, I meane, that it is not lawfull for them, to deliuer to the Church to be obserued of necessity, which they have deuided of themselves without the word of God. Forasmuch as that authority both was unknowne to the Apostles, and so oft taken away from the ministers of y Church by the Lords own mouth: I maruel who haue bin so bolde to take it vpon them, and at this day are so bolde to defend it, beside the example of the Apostles, and against the manifest prohibition of God.

7 As touching that that pertaineth to the perfect rule of well living, the Lord hath so conteined al y in his law, that he hath left nothing for men that they might add to that sum. And this he did first for this purpose, because the whole vertue of living standeth in this point, if all wrokes be governed by his will as by a rule, he should be holden of vs the only maister and director of life; then, to declare y he requireth of vs nothing more than obedience. For this reason James faith: he that judgeth his brother judgeth y law: he that judgeth the law, is not an OBSERVER of the law, but a judge. But there is one only lawmaker, that can both faue & destroy. We heare that God doth claime this one thing as proper to himself, to rule vs with the government & lawes of his woorde. And the same thing was spoken before of Esay, although somewhat more darkly: the Lord is our king, y Lord is our lawmaker, the Lord is our judge, he shall faue vs. Truely in both thefe places is shewed, that hee that hath power over the soul, hath the judgement of life & death. Yea Iames pronounceth this plainly. Now no man can take that vpon him. Therefore God must be acknowledged to be the only king of soules, to whom alone belongeth the power to faue & destroy, as those words of Esay expresse, and to be the king, and judge, and lawmaker & Saviour. Therefore Peter, when he admonished the Pastors of their duetie, exhorteth them to feede the flocke, not as vying a Lordship over the Clergy, by which word Clergy he signifieth the inheritance of God, y is to say the faithful people. This if we rightly wye, that it is not lawfull, that that should be transferred to man, which God maketh his owne only: we shall understand that so all the power is cut off whatsoever it be that they chalenge, which advance themselves to command anything in the Church without the word of God.

8 Nowe, forasmuch as the whole cause hangeth thereupon, that if God be the only lawmaker, it is not lawfull for men to take that honour to themselves: it is meete also therewithall to keepe in minde those two reasons which we haue spoken, why the Lorde claimeeth that to himselfe alone.
The first is, that his will may be to a perfect rule of all righteousness & holiness: and that so in the knowing of him may be the perfect knowledge to liue well. The other is, that (when the maner is sought howe to worship him rightly and well) he onely may have authoritie ouer our soules, whom wee ought to obey, and yppon whose becke wee ought to hang. These two reasons being well marked, it shall be easie to judge, what ordinances of me are contrarie to the worde of God. Of that sort be al those which are faine to belong to the true worshipping of God, and to the obseruing whereof con- sciences are bounde, as though they were necessarie to be obserued. Let vs therefore remember that all lawes of men ought to bee weyed with this balance, if wee will have a sure tryall that may never suffer vs to erre. The first of these reasons Paul in the Epistle to the Colossians vieth in contending against the false Apostles that attempted to oppresse the Churches with new burdens. The seconde reason he more vieth with the Galatians in the like cafe. This therefore he trauellth to prove in the Epistle to the Colossians, that the doctrine concerning the true worshipping of God is not to be sought at mens hands: because the Lord hath faithfully and fully instructed vs how hee ought to bee worshipped. To prove the same in the first Chapter, hee faith that in the Gospels is contained all wifdome, whereby the man of God may be made perfect in Christ. In the beginning of the seconde chapter hee faith, that all the treasures of wisdom and understanding are hidden in Christ. Thereupon he afterward concludes, let the faithfull beware that they bee not by vaine Philosophie led from the flocke of Christ, according to the constitutions of men. But in the end of the chapter he doth yet with greater boldnes condemneth all Ethelothreis kias, that is to say, all faine worships, which men deuise to themselves, or receive of other, and whatsoever per- cepts they dare of themselves giue concerning the worshipping of God. We haue therefore, all those ordinances are wicked, in obseruing whereof the worshipping of God is faine to bee. As for places in the Galatians where he earnestly affirmeth all con- sciences, which ought to be ruled of God onely, ought not to be intangled with snares, they are open enough, specially in the fifth chapter. Therefore let it be sufficient to haue but noted them.

9 But because the whole matter shal better be made open by examples, before that we go any further, it is good also to apply this doctrine to our own times. We say that the constitutions which they call Ecclefaisticall, wherewith the Pope and his doe burden the Church, are pernicious, and wicked: our aduersaries defende that they bee holy and available to saluation. There be two kinds of them: for some concerne Ceremonies and rites, other some pertaine more to discipline. Is there then a just cause to move vs to impugne them both? Truly a juster than we would. First doe not the authors themselves clearly define, the very worshipping of God is contained in the? To what purpose do they apply their Ceremonies, but that God should be worshipped by them? And that commeth to passe not by the onely error of the ignorant multitude: but by their allowance that have the place of teaching. I doe not touch the grosse abominations, wherewith they have gone about to ouerthrowe all godlineffe. But it should not be imagined among them to bee so hainous an offence, to haue flayed in any of the leaft pettie tradi-

traditions, vnlesse they did make the worshipting of God subject to their fai ned devises. What doe wee then offende, if this day wee cannot beare that, which Paul taught to bee intolerable, that the lawful order of the wor shipping of God should be reduced to the will of men: specially when they command men to worship according to the elements of this world, which Paul taught to be against Christ? Againe it is not unknownen, with howe precie necessitie they bind confidences to keepe whatsoeuer they comand: Here when wee criе out to the contrariе, we have alone cause with Paul, which in no wise suffereth faithfull confidences to be brought in to bondage of men.

10 Moreover this worst of all is added, that when religion hath once begun to bee defined with such vaine inventions, there euer followeth after that peruerseesse an other abominable frowardenesse, whereof Christ re proched the Pharisees, that the commandement of God is made voide for the traditions of men. I will not use mine owne wordes in fighting against our lawemakers at these dayes. Let them haue the victorie, if they can by any meane purge thēselues from this accusation of Christ. But howe shoule they excuse them, when among them it is thought infinitely more haynous, to have omitted auricular confession when the time of yeare commeth ab out, than to have continued a most wicked life a whole yeare together? to have infected their tongue with a little tasting of flehe on a Friday, than to have defiled their body with whoredome all the dayes of the weake? to haue put their hand to an honest worke vpon a day confecrate to 1. 2ot not what petie Saintes, than to have continually exercised their members in moste wicked offences, for a Priest to bee coupled with one lawfull marriage, than to be entangled with a thousande adulteries? not to haue performed a vow ed pilgrimage, than to breake faith in all promises? not to haue wasted som what vpon monstrous and no lēss superfluous and vnprofitable excessifie gorgiousnesse of temples, than to haue failed to helpe the extreme necessi ties of the poore? to have passed by an idole without honour, than to haue dispitefully intreated all kinde of men? not to haue mủbled vp at certaine houres a great number of words without understanding, than never to haue concepted a true prayer in their heart? What is to make voide the command ement of God for the traditions of men, if this bee not: when commending the keeping of Gods commandements but coldly and as it were lightly by the way, they doe no lēss earnestly and busily exact the obeying of their own, than if they contayedn in the the whole pith of godlines: when rencang the transgressing of Gods lawe, with light penalties of satisfacti ons, they punishe the verie least offence of one of their owne decees with no lesse paine than with prisonment, banishment, fire or sworde. Being not so sharpe and harde to intreate against the despisers of God, they percieue the despisers of them selves with vnappeasable hearted to the extremiteit: and doe so instruct all those, whose simplicitie they holde captiuie, that they would with more contented mind see the whole lawe of God ouerthrown, than one small title: (as they call it) in the commandements of his church to be broken. First in this pointe is greevous offence committed, that for small matters, and such as (if it shoulde bee tried by Gods judgement) are at libertie, one man despiseth, judgeth and casteth away an other. But nowe as though that were not cull enough, those trifling elements of the worlde (as Paul calleth them in his writing to the Galatians) are weyed of more value than the heavenly Oracles of God. And he that is in a maner acquired in adulterie, is judged in meate: he that hath leave to vse a harlot, is forbid den to have a wife. This profite verily is gotten by that transgressing obedience, which is so much turned from God as it declineth to men.

11 There be also other two not slender faults, which we disallow in the same ordinances. First, because they presume for the most part unprofit able, and sometime also fond observations: then, because godly consciences are oppressed with the infinite multitude of them, & being rouled backe into a certain Lewishnes, they so cleave to shadowes, they cannot attain to Christ. Wheras I calle them fond and unprofitable, I know that will not seeme credible to the wisedome of the flesh, which so well liketh them, that it thinketh the church to be viteler deformed when they be taken away. But this is it Paul writeth of, to have a resemblance of wisedome in counterfaite worshipping, in humilitie, and in this that they thinke that with their sharpenesse they be able to tame their fleth. This is truly a most wholesome admonition, such as ought neuer to slip away from vs. Mens traditios (faith he) do deceite vnder the shew of wisdom, whence have they this colour? because they are famed of men, and therefore the wit of man doth therein acknow his owne, and acknowledging it doth more gladly embrace it, than any thing were it neuer so good, that hee agreed with his vanitie. Againe, they have hereby an other commendation, because they seeme to be fit introductions to humilitie, for that with their yoke they hold the minds of men pressed downe to the ground. Laft of all, because they seeme to tend to this end to restrain the daintiness of the fleth, and to subdue it by rigor of abstinence, therefore they are thought to be wisely used. But what faith Paul to these things? doth hee not shake off those visitors, lest the simple should be deceived with false pretence? Because he judged this enough for confutation of them, that he had saide that they were the inventions of men, hee paffeth over all these things without confutation, as though he esteemed them for nothing. Yea, because he knew that all fained worships in the Church were condemned, & are so much more suspicous to the faithfull as they more delight the wit of man: because he knew that that fained image of outarde humilitie doeth so much differ from true humilitie, as it might easly be discerned: finally because he knew that that childish introduction was no more esteemed than an exercise of the body: therefore hee willed that the very same things should be to the faithfull in stead of a confutation of mens traditions, by fauour of which they were commended among the ignorant.

12 So at this day not only the vnlearned common people, but every man as hee is most puffed vp with worldly wisedome, so is hee most maruoufely delighted with beholding of Ceremonies. But hypocrites and foolish women thinke that there can be nothing used more glorious nor better. But they which doe more deeply searche, and more truly weigh according to the rule of godlinesse, of what value so many and such Ceremonies are, do understiid first they are trifles, because they have no profit: the, that they are deceits,
They will denie that good things are corrupted with such forein erorrs: forasmuch as in this behalfe a man may no leffe offend in the very works also commanded of God. But this hath more hainoufenes, that so much honor is gien to works rashly fained by the will of man, that they are thought to be things deserying eternal life. For the workes commanded of God haue reward therefore, because the lawmaker himselfe in respect of obedience accepteth them. Therefore they receive not their value of their own worthines, or of their owne deserying, but because God so much esteemeth our obedience toward him. I speake here of the perfection of workes which is commanded of God, and is not performed of men. For therefore the very workes of the law which we do, haue no thanke but of the free goodnes of God, because in the our obedience is weake & lame. But because we do not here dispute, of what value workes are without Christ, therefore let vs passe ouer that question. I come backe againe to that which properly belongeth to this present argument, that whatsoever commenfation workes haue in them, they haue it in respect of the obedience, which only the Lord doth look vpon, as he testifieth by the Prophet: I gaue not commandement of sacrifices and burnt offringes, but only that ye shoulde with hearing, heare my voyce. But of sained workes he speake in an other place, sayinge: Ye wey your fulcr and not in bread. Againe, they worship me in vaine with the præceptes of men. This therefore they can by no waies excuse, that they suffer the silly people to secke in those outward trifles the righteoufnes whereby they may fteand against God, & uphold thetheselues before the heauenly judgement fcat. Moreouer, is not this a fault worthy to be inuyed against, that they shewe forth Ceremonies not vnderstan ded as it were a stage play, or a magickall enchantment? For it is certain that al ceremonies are corrupt & hurtful, vntles men be by the directed to Christ. But the Ceremonies are vndervnder the Papacy, are feuered from doctrine, that they may the more hold men in signes without all signification. Finally (such a cunning craftman is the belly) it appeareth that many of them haue bin inuented by couetous sacrficing priefe, to be fnares to catch mony. But what beginning fouer they haue, they are all so giuen forth in common for filthy gaine, that we must needes cutte off a great parte of them, if we will bring to passe that there be not a prophane market, and full of facrilege vfed in the Church.

16 Although I seem not to teach a continual doctrine concerning the ordinations of me, because this speacking is altogether applied to our owne time: yet there is nothing spoken that shall not be profitable for all times. For so oft as this superftition creepeth in, that men will worship God with their owne fainèd dedusses, whatsoever the lawes be that are made to that purpose, they do by & by degenerate to those grosse abuses. For if Lord threateneth not this curse to one or twa ages, but to all ages of the world, that hee will strike them with blindenesse and amased dulnesse that worshippe him with the doctrines of men. This blinding continually maketh that they flee from no kind of abjuridty, which defying so many warnings of God, do wilfully wrap them selves in those deadly fnares. But if, setting aside circumstances, you will haue simply shewed what be the mens traditions of all ages, which it is mete to be refccted of the Church, and to be disallowed of all the godly, that same shall be shall be a sure and plaine definition which we have above set: that all laws without the word of God are made by men to this end, either to prescribe a manner of worshipping God, or to binde consciences with religion, as though they gave commandement of things necessary to salvation. If to the one or both of these there be adjoyned other faults: as, that with their multitude they darken the brightnesse of the Gospel: that they nothing edifie, but be rather vnprofitable and trifling occupations than true exercises of godlines: that they be laide abroad to fillinnesse and vnhonnest gains: that they be too hard to be kept: that they be defiled with euill superstition: these shall bee helps that we may the more easily finde how much euill is in them.

17 I heare they that answer for themselues, that their traditions are not of themselues, but of God. For, they say that the Church is governed of the holy Ghost, that it cannot erre: and that the authoritie thereof remayneth with them. When this is obtained, it therewithall followeth, that their traditions are the revelations of the holy Ghost, which cannot bee despised but wickedly & with the contempt of God. And that they should not feeme to haue attempted any thing without great authoritie, they will haue it beleued that a great part of their observations came from the Apostles: and they affirme that by one example is sufficiently declared what the Apostles did in other things, when being assembled in one Counsell, they did by the decree of the Counsell commande the Gentiles to abstaine from things offered to idols, from blood and strangling. We haue already in an other place declared, howe falsely for boasting of them selues they lyingly usurpe the title of the Church. So much as concerning this present cause: if, plucking away visors, and deceitfull colours, we truly looke vpvn that which we ought principally to care for, and which chiefly is for our behoofe, that is, what manner of Church Christ will haue, that we may fashion and frame our selues to the rule thereof: it shall easilie be euident vnto vs, that it is not the Church, which passing the boundes of the worde of God, doth outrage and runne at riot in making of newe lawes. For dooth not that lawe which was once prescrib'd to the Church, remayne eternall? What I commande thee, that thou shalt keepe that thou maist doe it. Thou shalt not adde any thing nor take any thing from it. And in an other place: Adde not to the worde of the Lord, nor minish any thing: least he peraduenture reproue thee, & thou be found a lyer. Sith they can not denye that this was spoken to the Church, what do they else but report the stubbornenes of that Church, which they boast to haue bin so bold as after such prohibitions neuertheless to adde & mingle of her owne with the doctrine of God? But God forbid that we should attent to their lies, whereby they burden the Church with so great a sclaundr: but let vs ynderstande, that the name of the Church is falsely pretended, so oft as this lust of mens raffinesse is spoken of, which can not hold it selfe with, in the prescribed bounds of God, but it wildly rongeth and runneth out into her owne inventions? There is nothing entangled, nothing darke, nothing doubtfull in these wordes, in which the whole Church is forbidden to adde to the word of God, or to take any thing from it, when the worshipping of God, and preceptes concerning salvation, are entreated of. But this (say they) was spoken of the lawe onely, after which followed the prophecies and the whole ministration of the Gospel. I grant in deed: and I add also, which are rather fulfillings of the law, than additions or diminishings. But if he lord suffred nothing to be added to or taken from the ministerie of Moses, which was (as I may so terme it) darke by reason of many doutfull enwrappings, till by his seruaunts the Prophets, and at length by his beloved Sonne, he ministrd a clearer doctrine: why should we not thinke it much more feeuerely forbidden vs, that we shoulde add nothing to the lawe, the Prophets, the Psalmes, and the Gospel? The Lorde is not gone out of kinde from himself, which hath long ago declared, that he is with nothing so hicely offended, as when he is worshippd with the inuentions of men. Whereof came those notable sayings in the Prophets, which ought to haue continually founded in our cures: I spake no wordes to your fathers, in the day that I brought them out of Aegypt, concerning sacrifice and burnt offering. But this wordes I commanded them, saying: With hearing heare my voice: and I will bee your God, and you shalbe my people, and you shal walke in all the way that I shal command you. Again, I haue with protestinge protested vnto your fathers, Heare my voyce. And other like sayings: but this is notable about the rest. Will God haue burnt offerings & sacrifices, and not rather that his voice be obeyed? For obedience is better than sacrifice, and to harken is better than to offer the fat of rammes. For, to resift is as the sinne of toothsayng: and not to obey is as the wickednesse of idolatrye. Therefor whatsoever intentions of men are in this behalfe defended with the authoritie of the church, forasmuch as the same cannot be excused from the crime of vngodlines, it is easie to prove that it is falsly imputed to the Church.

18. After this fort wee freely inuieye against this tyranny of mens traditions, which is proudly thrust in among vs, ynder the title of the Church. For neither do we scorne the Church (as our adueraries, to bring vs in hatred, do vniustly ly vpon vs) but we giue vnto her the praisse of obedience, than which she knoweth no greater praisse. They rather are very sore wrong doers to the Church, which make her obfinate against her Lorde, while they faine that the hath proceeded further than the lawfully might do by his word of God: though I speake nothing howe it is a notable shamelesnesse joyned with as great malice, continually to crye out of the authoritie of the Church, & in the mane time dissemblingly to hide both what is commanded her by the Lord, & what obedience she oweth to the commanndement of the Lord. But if we haue a minde, as it is meete we should haue, to agree with the Church, this pertaineth rather to the purpose, to haue an eye vnto & remem ber what is commanded by the Lord both to vs and the Church, that wee should with one agreement obey him. For there is no dout but we shal very well agree with the Church, if wee do in all things shewe our selves obedient to the Lorde. But now to father vpon the Apostles, the originall of the traditions wherewith the Church hath bene hitherto oppressed, was a point of mere deceit: forasmuch as the doctrine of the Apostles trauaileth wholly to this end, that conscientes should not be burdened with new obstervationes, nor the worshipping of God be defiled in our inuentions. Moreover if there be any faultfulness in histories and ancient monumets, the Apostles not only never knewe, but also never heard of this that they attribute vnto them. Neither Neither let them prate, that the most part of their decrees were received in vfe & in mens behaviors, which never were put in writing: euen those things forsooth, which, while Christ was yet living, they could not vnderstande, after his ascending they learned by the revelation of the holy Ghost. Of the exposition of that place we haue else where already scene. So much as is sufficient for this present cause: truely they make thefe claes worthy to be laughed at, while they faie that those great mysteries, which so long time were unknowen to the Apoftles, were partly obseruations either lewih or Gentile (of which all the one fort had bin long before published among the fewes, & all the other fort among the Gentiles) and partly foolish gesturings and vaine pettie Ceremonies, which foolish sacrifizing Priests that can neither skill of swimming nor of letters, vfe to do very trimly: yea such as children & foolees doe so aptly counterfeit it may seeme the there be no fitter ministers of such holy mysteries. If there were no histories at all: yet men that have their foeld wit might consider by the thing it selfe, that so great a heape of Ceremonies and obseruations did not suddenly burst into the Church, but by little & little crept in. For when those holier Bishops, which were next in time to the Apoftles, had ordaine some things that belonged to order & discipline, afterward there followed men, some after other, not discreet enough, and too curious and greedy: of which the later that every one was, so he more striued with his predecessors in foolish enious counterfeitings, not to give place in inventing of new things. And because there was peril leaft their deuises would shortly grow out of vfe, by which they coueted to gette praife among their posterity, they were much more rigorous in exact calling vpon the keeping of them. This wrongfull zeale hath breede vs a great part of these Ceremonies which they set out vnto vs for Apoštolike. And all these histories doe testify.

19 Leave in making a register of them we should be too tedious, we will be content with one example. In the ministring of the Lords supper, there was in the Apoſtles example great simplicity. The next succeffors, to garnish the dignity of the mysterie, added somewhat that was not to be difallowed. But afterward there came those foolish counterfeiters, which with now and then patching of pieces together, haue made vs this apparell of the pritf which we fee in the Maffe, those ornamentes of the altar, those gesturings, and the whole furniture of vnprofitable things. But they obiect, that this in olde time was the perfusion, that those things which were with one content done in the vnuerfall Church, came from the Apoſtles themselves, whereof they cite Augustine for witneffe. But I will bring a solution from no other where than out of the wordes of Augustine himselfe. Those things (sayth hee) that are kept in the whole worlde, we may vnderstande to haue beene ordained either of the Apoſtles themselves, or of the generall Councelles, whose authoritative is most healthfull in the Church: as, that the Lordes passion, and resurrection, and his ascending into heaven, and the comming of the holy Ghost, are celebrate with yearely solemnitie: and whatsoever like thing be founde, that is kept of the whole Church, which way foever it be spreade abroad. When hee rekeoneth vppe so fewe examples, who doeth not see that he meant to impuote to authours worthy of credit and reverence, the obseruations that then were vfed, even none but those simple, rare, and sober ones, with which it was profitable that the order of the Church should be kept together? But how far doth this differ from that which the Romish maisters would enforce men to graunt, that there is no petie Ceremony among them that ought not to be judged Apostolike.

20 That it be not too long, I wil bring forth only one example. If any man ask them, whence they have their holy water: they by and by anfwer, from the Apostles. As though the histories do not attribute this inventions to I won not what Bishop of Rome, which truly, if he had called the Apostles to coun-cell, would never have defiled Baptifme with a strange and vnfitte signe. Al-beit I doe not thinke it like to be true, that the beginning of that halowing is fo old as it is there written. For, that which Augustine fayth, that certaine Churches in his time did thun that solemne following of Christs example in washing of fecte, leaft that vlace shoulde seeme to pertaine to Baptifme, le-crely fheweth that there was then no kinde of washing that had any likenes with Baptifme. Whatsoever it be, I wil not graunt that this proceeded from an Apostolike Spirit, that Baptifme, when it is with a daily signe brought in-to remembrance, shoult after a certaine maner be repeated. And I pauie not vpon this, the felfe fame Augustine in another place aatribeth other things also to the Apostles. For though he hath nothing but conicfures, judgement ought not vpon them to be giuen of fo great a matter. Finally, admit that we grant them alfo, that those things which her heartheth came from the time of the Apostles: Yet there is greaete difference betwenee instituting some ex-ercife of Godlineffe, which the Faithfull with a free conscience may vfe, or if the ufe of it shall not be profitable for them, they may forbear it: & making a law that may fgnore confences with bondage. But now, from what author foever they proceeded, fith we fee that they are flidden into fo great abuse, nothing withfandeth, but that we may without offence of him abolish them: forasmuch as they were never fo commended, that they must be perpetually immowable.

21 Neither doth it much helpe them, that to excuse their tyranny they pretend the example of the Apostles. The Apostles (lay they) and the elders of the first Church, made a decree beside the commandement of Chrift, wher-in they commanded all the Gentiles to abstaine from things offred to idols, from strangeld, and from bloud. If that was lawfull for them, why is it not al-so lawfull for their successors, to follow their fame so oft as occasion so requireth? I would to God, they did both in all other things and in this thing follow the. For I denie that the Apostles did there institute or decree any newe thing, which is easie to be proued by a strong reason. For whereas Peter in that coun-cell pronounceth, that God is tempted, if a yoke be layd vpon the necke of the disciples: hee doth himselfe overthrow his owne sentence, if he afterward content to haue any yoke layd vpon them. But there is a yoke layde, if the Apostles do decree of their owne autorticke that the Gentiles shoule be forbidden, that they shoul not touch things offred to idols, blod, & strangeld. In deed there yet remaineth a doubt, for that they doe never the leffe seeme to forbid. But this doubt shall easilly be dissolved, if a man do more necerly confider the meaning of the decree it selfe: in the order and effect were of the chiefe chief point is, that to the Gentiles their libertie is to be left, and that they ought not to be troubled, nor accombred about the observations of the law. Hitherto it very well maketh of our side. But the exception that immediately foloweth, neither is any new law made by the Apostles, but the divine and eternall comandement of God, that charitie ought not to be broken, nor doth diminish one title of that libertie: but onely admonisheth the Gentiles, how they should temper themselves to their brethren, that they abuse not their liberty to the offence of them. Let this therefore be the second point, that the Gentils shold vfe a harmlesse liberty, and wont offence of their brethren. But yet they prescribe some certaine thing: that is, they teach and appoint, so far as was expedient for the time, by what things they might run into the offence of their brethren, that they might beware of those things: but they adde no new thing of their owne to the eternall law of God, which forbiddeth the offending of brethren.

22 Like as if the faithfull Pastors which gouerne the Churches not yet well reformed, should commande all their people, till the weake with whom they liue do growe stronger, they should not openly eate flesh on Friday, or openly labour vpon holy dayes, or any such thing. For although these things setting, superflitio aside, are by themselves indifferent: yet when there is added offence of brethren, they can not be done without a fault. But the times are such, that the faithfull can not shewe such a sight to the weake brethren, but that they shall sore wound their consciences. Who, but a cauiller, will say that so they make a newe lawe, whereas, it is certaine that they doe onely prevent offences, which are expressly enough forbbiden of the Lorde? And no more can it be sayd of the Apostles, whose purpose was nothing els, but in taking away the matter of offences, to call vpon the lawe of God concerning the auoyding of offence: as if they had sayde: It is the Lorde's commandement that ye offende not a weake brother. Yee can not eate thinges offered to images, strangled and bloud, but that the weake brethren shalbe offended. Therefore we commande you in the word of the Lord, that ye eate not with offence. And that the Apostles had respect to the same thing, Paul himselfe is a very good witnesse, which writeth thus, verily none otherwise than according to the meaning of the Councell: Concerning meates that are offered to Idols, we knowe that the Idol is nothing. But some with conscience of the Idol, doe eate it as offered to Idols, and their conscience, forasmuch as it is weake, is defiled. See that your libertie bee not made an offence to the weake. He that shal haue well weyed these things, shal not afterward be deceiued with such a false colour as they make, that pretende the Apostles for defence of their tyrannie, as though the Apostles had begunne w their decree to breake the libertie of the Church. But, that they may not be able to escape, but be driuen euun with their owne confessio to allowe this solution, lette them aunfwere me, by what right they were so bolde to abrogate the same decree. Because there was no more perill of those offences and diffentions, which the Apostles meant to provide for, and they know that the lawe was to be weyed by the ende thereof. Forasymuch as therefore this lawe was made in respect of charitie, there is nothing prescribed in it, but so much as pertaineth to charity. When they confess by the transgrieving of this lawe is nothing.
nothing but a breaking of charity, do they not therewith acknowledge, that it is not a forged addition to the law of God, but a natural and simple applicance to the times and manners whereunto it was directed.

23 But although such lawes be a hundred times vnjust and inurious vnto vs, yet they affirm, that they must be heard without exception: for they say that this is not here intended, that we should consent to errors; but only that being rubieest we should beare the hard commandementes of our gouvenours, which it is not our partes to refuse. But here also the Lorde very well resisteth them with the truth of his word, and deliuereth vs out of such bonddage into the liberty, which he hath purchaseth for vs with his holy blonde, the benefit whereof he hath more than once confirmed with his wordes. For that is not here onely intended (as they maliciously faigne) y weshould suffer some greuius oppression in our body, but that our consciences being spoiled of their liberty that is of the benefit of the bloud of Christ, should bee seriously and tormentedly. Howbeit let vs passe over this also, as though it made little to the matter, But of how great importance do we thinke it is, that the Lords kingdom is taken away from him, which he claimeth to himself with so great severity? But it is taken away so oft as he is worshippeth with the lawes of mens intentions, whereas he will be holden for the onely lawemaker of his owne worship. And leaft any man should thinke it to be a matter of nothing, let vs heare how much the Lord esteemeth it. Because (sayth he) this people hath feared me with the commandement and doctrine of men: behold I will astonish them with a great and wondrous miracle. For wisdom shal perish from the wise men thereof, & understanding shal depart from the elders. In an other place, They worship me in vaine, teaching doctrine, the commandementes of men. And truly whereas the children of Israel did defile themselves with many idolatries, y caufe of all that evil is ascribed to this vncleane mixture, y trespassing the commandementes of God, they have forges newe worshipinges. And therefore the holy hystric reherseth y the new strangers y had bin transplanted by the king of Bablon to inhabitate Samaria, were torn in peeces & consumed of wilde beastes, because they knew not y judgements or statutes of the God of that land. Although they had nothing offended in the Ceremonies, yet God would not have allowed a vaine pompe; but in the meane time he ceased not to take vengeance of the defiling of his worship, for that men did thrust in deuises strange from his word. Whereupon it is af-fterward sayd, that they being made afraide with that punishment, receiued the Ceremonies prescribed in the lawe: but because they did not yet purely worship the true God, it is twise repeated that they did fear him & did not fear him. Whereupon we gather, y the part of reverence which is gien to him, consisteth in this, while in worshipping him wee simply follow what he com-mandeth with mingling none of our intentions. And therefore the godly kings are oftentimes prayst, because they did according to all the commandementes, and declined not to the right hande nor to the left. I go yet further: although in some fained worshipping there do not openly appear vngodlines, yet it is severely condemned of the holy Ghost, so forne as men depart from the commande ment of God. The Altar of Achaiz, the patern whereof was brought out of Samaria, might have seemed to encrease y garnishment of the temple, whereas his devise was to offer Sacrifices thereon to God onely, whereas the statute was at none other cause but for that the inventions of men in the worshipping of God are vnclenee corruptions. And howe much more clearly the will of God is opened vnto vs, so much the leffe excusable is our frowardnesse to attempt any thing. And therefore with this circumstance the crime of Manasses is enforced, for that hee builded a newe altar in Jerusalem, of which God had pronounced I wil there sett my name, because the authoritie of God is nowe as it were of set purpose refused.

24 Many doe maruell why God so sharply threateneth that he wil do things to be wondred at to the people of whomhe was worshipped with v commandements of men, and pronounceth that he is worshipped in vaine with the precepts of men. But if they considered, what it is in the cause of religion, that is to say of heavenly wisdome, to hange vpon the onely mouth of God, they would therewithall see, that it is no felender reason why God so abhorreth such peruerse services, that are done to him according to the luft of mans wit. For although they that obey such lawes for the worshipping of God, have a certaine sheue of humilitie in this their obedience, yet they are not humble before God, to whom they prescribe the same lawes which they themselves doe keepe. This is the reason why Paul willeth vs so diligently to beware, that we be not deceived by the traditions of men, and that which he calleth ethelothreskian, that is, Wilworship invented of men beside the dreine of God. This is verily true, both our owne wisdome, & all mens wisdome must be foolish vnto vs, that we may suffer him alone to be wife. Which way they keepe not which do study with pettie obseruations fained by the will of men to commend themselves vnto him, and do thrust vnto him as it were against his will a tranfgressing obedience towarde him, which is indeede giuen to men. As it hath ben done both in many ages heretofore, and in thy time within our owne remembrance, & is also at this day done in those places where the authorite of the creature is more esteemed than of the creator: where religion (if yet the same be worthy to be called religion) is defyled with more & more vnfauorie superstitions, than euer was any Paynime wickednes. For what could the wit of men breed but all things carnall and foolish and such as truly remeble their authors?

25 Whereas also the Patrons of superstitions alledge, that Samuel sacrificed in Ramatha, and although the same was done beside the law, yet it pleased God: the solution is easie, that it was not a certaine seconde altar to set against the one onely altar: but because the place was not yet appointed for the arke of covenent, he appointed the towne where he dwelld for sacrifices, as the most convenient place. Truly the minde of the holy prophet was not to make any Invocation in holy things, whereas God had so straitly forbidden anything to be added or minified. As for thy example of Menhoah, I say it was an extraordinary and singular case. He being a private man offered sacrifice to God & not without the allowance of God: verily because he interpolated it not of a rash motion of his own mind, but by a heavenly instinct: But how much thy Lord abhorreth those things thy men devise of themselves? to worship him withall, an other not inferior to Gideon is a notable example, whose Ephod turned to destruction not only to him and his family, but to the whole people. Finally every newe founde inaction, where with men content to worship God, is nothing else but a desiring of true holines.

26 Why then (say they) did Christ will that those intolerable burdens should be borne, which the Scribes and Pharisees bounde upon men? But why in an other place did the same Christ will that men should beware of the leauen of the Pharisees: calling leauen (as Matthew the Evangelist expoundseth) all their owne doctrine that they mingled with the purenes of the worde of God? What woulde wee haue more plaine than that we be commanded to flee and beware of all their doctrine? Whereby it is made most certain unto vs, that in <s>other place also the Lord willed not, that the confidences of his shoule be vexed with the Pharisees owne traditions. And the very wordes, if they be not wrested, sounde of no such thing. For the Lorde purposing there to enuie sharply against manners of the Pharisees, did first simple instruct them that hearde him, that although they saw nothing in their life meet for the to follow, yet they should not ceafe to doe those thinges which they taught in wordes, whyle they sat in the chaire of Moses, that is, to declare the lawe. Therefore hee meant nothing else but to proouide that the common people shoule not with the euill examples of the teachers bee brought to despise the doctrine. But forasmuch as many are nothing at all moued with reasons, but alway require authentic, I will alledge Augustines wordes, in which the verie same thing is spoken. The Lordes sheepefolde hath gouvernours, some faithfull, and some hirelinges. The gouvernours that are faithfull, are true Pastors: but heare ye, if the hirelinges also are necessarie: for many in the Church following earthly profits, do preach Christ, and by them the voice of Christ is hearde: and the sheepe doe followe, not a hireling, but the Pastor by the meanes of a hireling. Heare yee that hirelinges are shewed by the Lorde himselfe. The Scribes (sayth he) and the Pharisees sit in the chayre of Moses. Doe yee those thinges that they say, but doe not those thinges that they doe. What other thinge saide hee, but heare the voice of the Pastor by the hirelinges? For in sitting in the chaire they teach the lawe of God: therefore God teacheth by them. But if they will teach their owne, heare it not, doe it not. This faith Augustine.

27 But whereas many vskilleful men, when they heare that consciences are wickedly bounde and God worshipped in vaine with the traditions of men, doe at once blot out altogether all lawes whereby the order of the Church is set in frame: therefore it is convenient also to meete with their error: Verily in this point it is easie to bee deceived, because at the first sight it doeth not by and by appeare what difference is betweene the one frothe and the other. But I will lo plainly in few words set out the whole matter, that the likenesse may deceive no man. First lest vs holde this, that if wee see in euery fellowship of men some policie to bee necessarie, that may serue to nourishe common peace and to reayne concorde: if wee see that in the doing of thinges there is alway some orderly forme, which is behoouefull for publicke honestie and for verie humanitic not to bee refusd: the

the same ought cheevely to bee observed in Churches, which are both best maintained by a well framed disposition of all things, and without agreement are no Churches at all. Therefore if wee will have the safetie of the Church well provided for, we must altogether diligently procure that which Paul commandeth, that all things be done comely and according to order. But forasmuch as there is so great diversitie in the manners of men, so great variety in minds, so great disagreement in judgementes and wits; neither is there any policie steadfast enough, vnlesse it bee established by certaine lawes, nor any orderly vsage can be observed without a certaine appointed forme: Therefore wee are so farre of from condemning the lawes that are profitable to this purpose, that we affirme that when those bee taken away, Churches are disdiluted from their finewes, and utterly deformed and scattered abroad. For this which Paul requireth, that all things bee done decently and in order, cannot bee had, vnlesse the order it selfe and comelinesse bee establisshed, with obseruations adioyned as with certaine bondes. But this onely thing is alway to bee excepted in those obseruations, that they bee not either beleued to be necessarie to salvation, and so bind consciences with religion, or, be applied to the worshipping of God, and so godlines be reposed in them.

28 We haue therefore a very good and most faithfull marke, which putteth difference betweene thesike wicked ordinaunces, by which we haue faide that true religion is darkened and consciences subverted, and the lawfull obseruations of the Church: if wee remember that the lawfull obseruations tende alway to one of these two things or to both together, that in the holy assemblie of the faithfull all things bee done comely and with such dignitie as becommeth: and that the verie common fellowshippe of men should bee kept in order as it were by certaine bondes of humanitie and moderation. For when it is once vnderfoode that the lawe is made for publike honesties fake, the superstition is nowe taken away, into which they fall that measure the worshipping of God by the intentions of men. Againe when it is knowne that it perteyneth to common vs, then that false opinion of bonde and necessitie is overthrown, which did strike a great terror into consciences, when traditions were thought necessarie to salvation. For herein is nothing required but that charitie shoulde with common ducetfull doing be nourished among vs. But it is good yet to define more plainly, what is comprehended vnder that comelinesse which Paul commendeth, and also what vnder order. The ende of comelinesse is, partly that when such Ceremonies are vsed as may procure a reverence to holy things, wee may by such helps be stirred vp to godlinesse: partly also that the modestie and gravitie which ought to be seen in all honest doings may therein principally appeare. In order, this is the first point, that they which gouerne may knowe the rule and lawe to rule well: and the people which are governed may bee accustomed to obeying of God, and to right discipline: Then, that the state of the Church being well framed, peace and quietnesse may be provided for.

29 Therefore wee shall not say that comelinesse is, wherein shall bee nothing but vaine delocation such as wee see in that playerlike apparel, which... the Papistes vse in their ceremonies, where appeareth nothing else but an unprofitable visor of gainesse, and excelse without fruite. But wee shall accoun that to be come to thee of gainesse which shall so bee meete for the reuerence of holy mysteries, that it be a fit exercise to godlinesse, or at least such as shall serve to convenient garnishing for the celebrating thereof and the same not without fruite, but that it may put the faithfull in minde with howe great modelle, religiousnesse and reuerence, they ought to handle holy things.
Nowe, that ceremonies may be exercises of godlinesse, it is necessarie that they leade vs to the freight way to Christ. Likewise wee may not say that order consisteth in those trilling pomps that have nothing else than a vanithing gaynes: but that it standeth in such an orderly framing as may take away all confusion, barbarousnesse, obstinacie, and all straies and discontents.
Of the first sort are these examples in Paul: ye proфанe bankettings shoulde not bee mingled with the holy Supper of the Lorde: that women shoulde come abroade, but covered: and many other which wee haue in common vse: as this, that wee pray kneeling and bare headed: that wee minister the Lords Sacramentes not uncleanly, but with some dignitie: that in the burying of the deade we vse should haue shew: and other things that are of the same sorte. Of the other kinde are the hours appointed for publike prayers, Sermons, and celebrations of mysteries: as Sermons, quietnesse and silence, places appointed, singing together of Hymnes, dayes prefixed for celebrating of the Lords Supper, that Paul forbiddeth that women should reach in the Church, and such like. But specially those things which conerne discipline, as the teaching of the Catechisme, the censures of the Church, excommunication, fastings, and such as may be reckened in the same nu-ber. So all the constitutions of the Church, which wee receive for holy & wholesome, wee may referre to two cheefe titles; for some pertaine to rites, and ceremonies, and the other to discipline and peace.

But because here is peril, least on the one side the false Bishops should thereby catch a pretence to excuse their wicked and tyrannous lawes, and least on the other side there bee some men too speechfull, which admonished with the aforesaid euils doe leave no place to lawes bee they nearer to holy:
here it is good to protest, that I allow only those ordinances of men which be both grounded upon the authoritie of God, & taken out of the scripture, yea and altogether Gods owne. Let vs take for an example the kneeling which is vse in time of common prayer. It is demanded, whether it bee a tradicion of man, which euery man may lawfully refuse or neglect. I say that it is so of men, that it is also of God. It is of God, in respect that it is a part of that com-linesse, the care and keeping whereof is commended vnto vs by the Apo-file: it is of men, in respect that it specially beokeneth that which had in ge-neraliue rather beene pointed to, than declared. By this one example wee may judge, what is to bee thought of that whole kinde: verily because the Lorde hath in his holy Oracles both faithfully contented and clearly for forth both the whole summe of true rightousnesse, and all the partes of the worshipping of his divine Maiestie, and whatsoever was necessarie to salvation: therefore in these things hee is onely to bee hearde as our Schoolmaster. But because in outherd discipline and Ceremonies his will was not to prescribe each thing particularly what wee ought to followe (because hee foresawe this to hang vpon the state of times, and did not thinke one forme to bee fitte for all ages) herein wee must flee to those generall rules which hee hath given, that thereby all these things shoulde be tried which the necessitie of the Church shall require to bee commanded for order and comeliness. Finally, Forasmuch as hee hath therefore taught nothing expressly, because these things both are not necessarie to salvation, and according to the manners of every nation and age ought diversely to be applied to the edifying of the Church: therefore as the profite of the church shall require, it shall bee convenient as well to change and abrogate those that be vied, as to institute newe. I graunt indeede, that we ought not rashly, nor oft, nor for light causes to runne to innovation. But what may hurt or diffe, charitie shal best judge: which if we wil sufuer to be the gouernesse, all shall be safe.

31 Nowe it is the dutie of Christian people, to keepe such things as haue beene ordyned according to this rule, with a free conscience & without any superstition, but yet with a godly and easie redinesse to obey, not to deftine them, nor to paint them ouer with carelesse negligence: so farre is it of, that they ought by pride and obstinacie openly to breake them. What manner of libertie of conscience (wilt thou say) may there bee in so great observation and warenneffe? Yea, it shall stand excellently well when wee shall consider, that they are not stedfast and perpetually stayed lawes, but contrary to wee be bounde, but outwarde rudimes for the weakeennesse of men: which although wee doe not all neede, yet wee doe all vse them, because we are mutually one bound to another, to nourish charitie amongvs. This we may reknowledge in the examples aboue rehearsed. What? Doeth religion stande in a womans veile, that it is not lawfull to goe out of doers with her heade vncovered? Is that holy decree of his concerning silence, such as can not be broken without most hainous offence? Is there any mysterie in kneeling, or in burying of a deade carcase, that may not be omitted without sinne? No, For if a woman need, for the helping of her neighbor, to make such haste as may not suffer her to cover her head, the offendeth not if shee runne thither with her heade vncovered. And it may sometime befall that it may be no lesse convenient for her to speake, than at another time to holde her peace. And there is no caufe to the contrarie, but that he which by reason of disease cannot bow his knees may pray standing. Finally, it is better to buri a deade may speedily in time, than when they lack a winding sheete, or when there be not men present to comuey him, to tarrie till hee be vnburied. But neuer thelesse in these things there is somewhat which the maner and ordinances of the country, and finally very naturally honestie and the rule of modestie appoynteth to be done or avoided: wherein if a manwarie any thing from them, by vnwarneffe, or forgetfulnesse, there is no crime committed: but if vpon contempt, such stubbornes is to bee disallowed. Likewise the dayes themselves, which they bee, and the houres, and howe the places be builded, and what Psalmes be sung vpon which day, it maketh no matter. But it is meete that there bee both certaine daies, and appointed houres, and a place fit to receive all, if there bee regarde had of the prefer-uation of peace. For howe great an occasion of brawlinges shoule the confusion of these things be, if it were lawfull for euerie man as he list, to change those things that belong to common state: forasmuch as it will never come to passe that one same thing shal pleafe all men, if things be lefte as it were in the middest to the choice of euerie man? If anie man doe care against vs, and will here in bee more wise than hee ought, let him see himselfe by what reason hee can defende his owne precifeness to the Lorde. As for vs, this saying of Paul ought to satisfie vs, that we haue not an vs to contend, nor the Churches of God.

Moreover it is with great diligence to bee induceroed, that no error creepe in, that may corrupt or obscure this pure vs. Which shal bee obtained, if all obseruations, whatsoever they shal bee, shal have a shewe of manifest profite, and if verie fewe bee receiued: but principally if there bee adioyned a faithfull doctrine of the Pastor, that may stoppe vp the way to peruerse opinions. This knowledge maketh that in all these things euery man may haue his owne libertie preferred, and neuertheless shal willingly charge his owne libertie with a certaine necessity, so farre as either this comelineffe that wee haue spoken off, or the order of Charitie shal require. Secondly, by both we our selues shoulde without any superstitio be bulhed in the obseruming of those things, and shoulde not too precisely require them of other, so as wee shoulde thinke the worshipping of God to be the better for the multitude of Ceremonies: that one Church shoulde not despife an other for the ducersitie of discipline: last of all that letting herein no perpetuall lawe to our selues, wee shoulde refer the whole vs and ende of obseruations to the edification of the Church, that when it requireth we may without any offence suffer not onely somwhat to be chanched, but all the obseruations that were before in vs among vs, to bee altered. For this age is a present experience, that certaine rites, which other-wise are not vnGodly nor vncomely, may according to the fit occasion of the matter, be conuenientely abrogate. For (such hath beene the blindness and ignorance of the former times) Churches haue heretofore, with so corrupt opinion and with so stiffe affection, sticked in Ceremonies, that they can scarceley be sufficiently purged from monstrosus superstitions, but that manie Ceremonies must be taken away, which in olde time were paraduenture ordained not without cause, and of themselves have no notable vnGodlines in them.

The xj. Chapter.

Of the jurisdiction of the Church, and the abuse thereof, such as is seen in the Papace.

Nowe remaineth the thirde part of the power of the Church, yea & the cheefe part in a well ordered state, which we haue saide to consist in jurisdiction. The whole jurisdiction of the Church pertaineth to the discipline of maners, of which we shal intreate by & by. For as much as no citie or no town can stand without Magistrate & policie: the Church of God (as I haue
I have alreadie taught, but now I am compelled to repete it againe) needeth her certaine spiritual policie: but such as is utterly seuered from the civile policie, and doth so nothing hinder or ministre it, that it rather doeth much helpe and further it. Therefore this power of jurisdiction shall in a summe be nothing else but an order framed for the preseruation of spiritual policie. To this ende from the beginning were ordeined judiciale orders in Churches, which might see examination of maners, correct vices, & exercise the office of the keys. This order Paul speakeeth of in the Epiflle to the Corinthians, when he nameth governements. Againe, to the Romanes, when hee faith: let him that ruleth, rule in carefulnes. For he speakeeth not to the magistrates, for at that time there were no Christian magistrates) but to them that were joyned with the Pastors for the spiritual governement of Church. Alfo in the Epiflle to Timothee, he maketh two sorts of Elders: some, that labor in the word: other some, that do not see the preaching of the word, and yet do rule well. By this later sort it is no doute that he meaneth them ye were appointed to loke into maners, and to the whole vfe of the keys. For this power, of which we nowe speake, hangeth wholly vpon the keys which Christ gave to the Church, in the xvij. Chap. of Matthewe: where he commandeth, that they should be sharply admonifhed in the name of whole Church, that have despisid private monitions: but if they goe forwarde in their obstinacie, he teacheth that they should be put out of the fellowship of the faithful. But these monitions and corrections cannot be without knowledge of the cause: therefore there needeth both some judgement and order. Wherefore vnselle we wil make void the promise of the keys, & take vterly away excommunication, solemn monitions, & all such things whatsoever they bee: we must needs giue to the Church some jurisdiction. Let the readers marke that that place entreateth no of the generall authortie of doctrine, as in the xvj. Chapter of Matthewe, and the xvj. of John: but that the power of the Synagogue is for the time to come transferred to the flocke of Christ. Vntill that day the Jews had their order of governing, which Christ stablisheth in his Church, and that with great penaltie, so much as concerneth the pure institution of it. For so it behoved, as much as other wise the judgement of an vnnooble and unregarded congregation might bee despisid of rash and proude men. And that it should not encomber the readers, that Christ doeth in the same wordes express the things somewhat differing one from the other, it shalbe profitable to disoleue this doubt. There be therefore two places, that speake of binding and loosing. The one is in the xvi. Chapter of Matthewe, where Christ, after that he had promised that he woulde giue to Peter the keys of the kingdom of heauen, immediatly addeth, that whatsoever he shal binde or loose in earth, shalbe confirmed in heauen. In which wordes he meaneth none other things, than hee doeth by other wordes in John, when sending his discipiles to preach, after that hee had breathed vpon them hee saide: whose finnes ye forgiue, they shalbe forgiuen: and whose ye retaine, they shalbe retained in heauen. I will bring an exposition not subtle, not enforced, not wrested: but natural, flowing, and offering it selfe. This commandement of forgiiuing and retaining finnes, & that promise of binding and loosing made to Peter, ought to bee referred to...

no other thing but to the ministerie of the worde: which when the Lorde committed to the Apostles, he did therewith also arm them with this office of binding and loosing. For what is the finne of the Gospel, but that we all being the bondslaves of sinne and of death, are loosed and made free by the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: and that they which do not receive nor acknowledge Christ their deliverer and redeemer, are damned and ad- judged to everlasting bondes? When the Lord deliuered this message to his Apostles, to be carri'd into all nations: to approue that it was his owne & proceeding from himself, he honored it with this noble testimonie: and that to the singular strengthening both of the Apostles themselves, and of all those to whom it shou'd come. It behould that the Apostles shou'd have a stedfaft and founde certaintie of their preaching, which they should not only execute with infinite labours, care, troubles and daungers, but also at the last seale it with their bloud. That they might(I say) knowe the same to bee not vaine nor void, but full of power and force: it behould that in so great carefulnesse, in so great hardnesse of things, and in so great daungers, they should be persuaded that they did the business of God: that when all the worlde withstood them and fought against them, they should knowe that God stood on their side: that having not Christ the authour of their doctrine present by sight in earth, they shoulde vnderstande him to be in heauen, to confirme the truth of the doctrine which he had deliuered them. It behould againe that it should also be most certainly proued by testimonie to the hearers, that that doctrine of the Gospel was not the worde of the Apostles, but of God himselfe: not a voice bred in earth, but come downe from heauen. For these things, the forgiuenesse of sinnes, the promise of everlasting life, the messege of salvation, cannot bee in the power of man. Therefore Christ hath testified, that in the preaching of the Gospel there is nothing of the Apostles, but the onely ministerie: that it was hee himselfe that spake and promised all things by their mouthes as by instruments: and therefore that the forgiuenesse of sinnes which they preached, was the true promise of God: and the damnation which they pronounced, was the certaine judgement of God. But this testifying is guien to all ages, and remaineth in force, to certifie and assure all men, that the worde of the Gospel, by what man soever it be preached, is the verie sentence of God, published at the fouraigne judgement seate, written in the booke of life, ratified, firm and fixed in heauen. Thus wee see that in those places the power of the keys is nothing but the preaching of the Gospel: and that it is not so much a power as a ministerie, if we have respect to men. For Christ hath not guien this power properly to men, but to his owne worde, whereof he hath made men ministers.

2. The other place which we haue said to bee, concerning the power of binding and loosing, is in the xvij. Chapter of Mathewes, where Christ saith: If any brother heare not the Church, let him be to thee as a heathen man or a publicane. Verily I say vnto you: whatsoever ye bind upon earth, shall be bound also in heauen: whatsoever ye loose in earth, shall be loosed. This place is not altogether like the first, but is a little otherwise to be vnderstood. But I do not so make them divers, that they haue not great affinitie together.
This first point is like in both, that either of them is a general sentence: that in both there is alway all one power of binding and loosing, namely by the word of God, all one commandment, all one promise. But herein they differ, that the first place peculiarly belongeth to preaching, which the ministers of the word do execute: this later place to the discipline of Excommunication, which is committed to the Church. The Church bindeth, whom she excommunicateth: not that she throweth him into perpetually urine and desperation, but because she condemneth his life and manners, and vnlesse he repenteth, doth already warn him of his damnation. She loseth whom she receiuteth into communion: because she doth make him as it were partner of the vnitie which she hath in Christ Jesus. Therefore that no man should obstinately despise the judgment of the Church, or little regard that he is condemned by the consenting voyces of the faithful: the Lord testifieth that such judgement of the faithful is nothing else but a publishing of his own sentence: and that whatsoever they do in earth, is confirmed in heaven. For they have the worde of GOD, whereby they may condemne the peruerse: they have the worde, whereby they may receiue the repentant into grace. And they can not erre, nor differ from the judgement of God: because they judge not but after the law of God, which is not an uncertaine or earthly opinion, but the holy wil of God, & a heavenly Oracle. Out of these two places, which I thinke I have both briefly & familiarly and truly expounded, those furious men without difference as they be carried with their owne giddinesse, go about to stablifie sometyme confession, sometyme excommunication, sometyme iurisdiction, sometyme the power to make laws, sometyme pardons. But the first place they alledge to stablifie the supremacy of the Sea of Rome: they can so well skill to fix their keys to all lockes and doores, that a man may say they have practis'd smithes craft all their life.

3. For whereas many thinke that those things endured but for a time, when the Magistrats were yet strangers from the profession of our religion: they are deceived in this: they consider not, howe great difference and what maner of vnlikenesse there is of the Ecclesiastical & civill power. For the Church hath not the power of the worde to punish or restraine, no empire to commande, no prifon, no other pains which the Magistrat is wont to lay vpon men. Again, it tendeth not to this ende, that he that hath sinn'd should be punished against his will, but should with willing chaftisement profess his repentance. Therefore there is a tarme divers order: because neither doth the Church take to it selue any thing which properly belongeth to the Magistrat, nor the magistrat can execute that which the Church doth. This shalbe made plainer by an example. Is any man dronke? In a wel order'd citie prison shalbe his punishment. Hath he committed fornication? He shal haue like, or rather greater punishment. So shall both the lawes, & the magistrat, & outward judgement be satisfied: But it may be that he shal give no signification of repentance, but rather murmure & grudge against it. Shall the Church in this case do nothing? But such can not bee receiued to the Supper, without doing wrong both to Christ and his holy institution. And reason requireth this, that hee which offendeth the Church with an euil example example, should with solemn declaration of repentance take away the offence which he hath raised. The reason which they bring that are of contrary opinion, is too cold. Christ say they committed these doings to the Church, when there was no magistrate to execute them. But it happeneth often times that the magistrate is more negligent, yea sometime peradventure that himselfe is to be chastised, which happened to the Emperor Theodosius. There may beside this as much be said of the ministerie of the word. Now therefore after their sentence, let Pastors cease to blame manifest wicked doings, let them cease to chide, to reprove, to rebuke: for there be Christian magistrates, which ought to correct these things with the lawe & with the sword. But as the Magistrate ought by punishing, & by restraining with force, to purge the Church of offences: so likewise the minister of the word for his part ought to helpe the magistrate, that there may not so many offend. So ought their workings to be conioyned that the one may be a help, not a hinderance to the other.

4 And truly if a man more merely wey the words of Christ, he shall easily perceive that in these places, is describ'd a stayed state, and a perpetuall order of the Church, not such as endureth but for a time. For it is not meete that we should accuse them to the magistrate, that will not obey our monitions: which yet should be necessarie if the magistrate suceeded into the office of the Church. What is this promise: Shal we say that it is a promise of one or a fewe yeres? Verily verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye see bind in earth. Moreover Christ did here institute no newe thing, but followed the custome alwayes obscur'd in the auncient Church of his owne nation: whereby he signified that the Church cannot want the spiritual jurisdicition, which had beene from the beginning. And this hath been confirmed by the consent of all times. For when Emperors and magistrates began to profess Christ, the spiritual jurisdiction was not by and by abolished: but only so ordred, that it should diminisht nothing of the ciuile jurisdiction, or be confounded with it. And rightfully, For the magistrate, if he be godly, will not exempt himselfe from the common subjection of the children of God, whereas it is not the least part to submit himselfe to the Church, judging by the worde of God: so farre it is off, that he ought to take away that order of judgement. For what is more honorable (faith Ambrose) for the Emperor, than to be called the sonne of the Church? For a good Emperor is within the Church, not above the Church, Therefore they, which to honor the magistrate doe spoile the Church of this power, do not onely with false exposition corrupt the sentence of Christ, but also do not slenderly condemn so many holy bishops which have beene from the time of the Apostles, that they have by false pretence visipned the honor & office of the Magistrate.

5 But on the other side it is good to see this, what was in olde time the true vse of the jurisdicition of the Church, and how great abuse is crept in, that we may know what is to be abrogated, and what is to be restored of antiquitie, if we will overthowe the kingdom of Antichrist, and fet vp the true kingdom of Christ againe. First this is the marke to be shot at, that offences be prevented, and if any offence be risen vp, that it may be abolished. In the vse two things are to be considered: first, that this spiritual power bee alto-altogether severed from the power of the sword: then, that it be not executed by the will of one man, but by a lawfull assembly. Both these things were observed in the pure Church. For the holy Bishops did not exercise their power with fines, or imprisonments, or other civil punishments: but they used the only word of the Lord, as they ought to do. For the seuester revenge, and as it were the vtermost thunderbolt of the Church is excommunication, which is not used but in necessitie. But this requireth neither force nor strong hand, but is content with the power of the word of God. Finally, the jurisdiction of the old Church was nothing els but a declaration in præst: (as I may so call it) of that which Paul teacheth concerning the spiritual power of Pastors. There is (faith he) power given to vs, whereby we may throwe downe strong holdes, whereby we may make low all height that lifteth vp itself against the knowledge of God, whereby wee may subdue all thought, & may lead it captive into the obedience of Christ, and wee haue in readiness a revenge against all disobedience. As this is done by the preaching of the doctrine of Christ: so, least the doctrine should bee scorned, according to that which is taught ought they to be judged which professe themselves of the household of faith. But that cannot be done, vnlesse there be annoyed with the ministerie a power to call them that are to bee privately admonished, or to be more sharply corrected, and also a power to exclude them from the communion of the Supper, which can not be receiued without prophaneing of so great a mysterie. Therefore when in an other place he faith, that it belongeth not to vs to judge strangers, he maketh the children subject to the censures of the Church, which may chastise their faultes, and he secretly signifieth that there were then judicail orders in force from which none of the faithfull was free.

6 But such authority (as we haue declared) was not in the power of one man, to do euery thing according to his owne will: but in the power of the assembly of the Elders, which was the same thing in the Church that a Senate is in a citie. Cyprian, when he maketh mention by whom it was exercised in his time, saith to ioyne the whole Clergie with the Bishop. But in another place also he saith, that the verry Clergie so governed, that in the mean time the people was not excluded from the hearing of matters. For thus he writeth: Since the beginning of my bishopprike I haue determined to do nothing without the counsell of the Clergie and confent of the people. But this was the common and vsiall manner, that the jurisdiction of the Church should be exercised by a Senate of Elders: of whom (as I haue saide) there were two fortes: For some were ordered to teaching, and other some were onely judges of maners. By little and little this institution grewe out of kinde from the first beginning of it: so that even in the time of Ambrose onely clerkes were judges in ecclesiastical judgements. Which thing he himselfe complaineth of in these wordes: The olde Synagogue (faith he) and since that time the Church hath had Elders, without whose counsell nothing was done. Which by what negligence it is grown out of vs, I knowe not, vnlesse peraduenture by the flouthfulness or rather the pride of the teachers, while they alone woulde be thought to be somewhat. Wee see howe much the holy man is displeased, that any thing of the better state is decayed, when notwithstanding they had yet continuing an order that was at the least tolerable. What then would he doe if hee lawe these deformed ruines that shew almost no signe of the olde building? What bewailing would he vse? First, against lawe and right, the bishop hath claimed to himselfe alone, that which was given to the whole Church. For it is like as if the Confult, driving out the Senate, should take the empire vpon himselfe alone. But as he is above the rest in honour, so in the whole assemble is more authoritie than in one man. Therefore it was too wicked a deed, that one man, removing the common power to himselfe, hath both opened an entring to tyrannous lust, and hath taken from the Church that which belonged unto her, and hath suppressed and put away the assemble ordained by the spirit of Christ.

7 But (as of one cuill alwaye groweth another) Bishops disdaining it as a thing vnworthie of their care, have committed it ouer to one to other. Hereupon are created Officers to serve that roome: I doe not yet speake what kinde of men they be, but onely this I say, that they nothing differ from prophane Judges. And yet they still call it a spirituall jurisdiction, where men contend about nothing but earthly matters. Although there were no more cuill, with what face dare they call a brawling court the judgement of the church? But there are monitions, there is excommunication. So verily they mocke with God, Doeth a poore man owe a little money? he is cited: if he appeare, he is condemned. When he is condemned, if he do not satisfie it, he is monished: after the seconde monition they proceede one steppe toward excommunication: if he appeare not, he is monished to come and yeld himselfe to judgement: if he then make delay, he is monished, and by and by excommunicate. I beseech you, what is there any thing like either to the institution of Christ, or to the auncient manner, or to an Ecclesiastical order? But there is also correction of vices. But how? verily they not onely suffer but with secret allowance do after a certaine maner cherish and confirm adulteries, wantonnenesse, drunkenesse & sutch kind of mischiefous doings: & not only in the common people, but also in the clergie themselves. Of many they call a fewe before them, either that they should not seeme slouthfull in winking at them, or that they may milke out some money. I speake not of the pillages, robberies, briberies, & sacrileges that are gathered thereby, I speake not what manner of men are for the most part chosen to this office. This is enough & too much, that when the Romanistes doe boast that their jurisdiction is spirituall, it is easie to shewe that there is nothing more contrarie to the order institute of Christ, and that it hath no more likenesse to the auncient custome than darkenesse hath to light.

8 Although we have not spoken all things that might be alleged for this purpose, and those things that we have spoken of are knit vp in fewe words: yet I trust that we have so fought it out, that there is nowe no more cause why any man should doute, that the spirituall power whereof the Pope with all his kingdome proudly glorisheth, is wicked against God, and an vnjust tyranney over his people. Vnder the name of spirituall power, I comprehend both boldnesse in framing newe doctrines, wherewith they have turned away the silly people from the naturall purenesse of the worde of God, and the the wicked traditions wherewith they have snared them, and also the false ecclesiasticall jurisdiction which they execute by Suffraganes and Officials. For if we grant unto Christ a kingdom among vs, it is not possible but that all this kinde of dominion must immediately be overthrown and fall downe. As for the power of the worde which they also giue to themselves, because it is not exercised upon consciences, it pertaineth not to our present purpose to entreate of it. In which behalfe yet it is also to note, that they be alway like themselves, verily nothing lesse than that which they wold be taken for, that is to say, Pastors of the Church. Neither doe I blame the pecuicular faults of men, but the commo wickednes of the whole order, yea the very pestilence of the order: forasmuch as it is thought that the same should be maimed, verily it be gloriously set forth with wealth and proude titles. If we require the authority of Christ concerning this matter, it is no dout but that his mind was to debar the ministers of his word from ciuill dominion and earthly government, when he sayde, The kinges of the Gentils baere rule over them: but you shall not so. For he signifieth not only that the office of Pastor is distinct from the office of a Prince, but that they be things so seuered, that they can not meeete together in one man. For whereas Moses did beare both the offices together: First that was done by a rare miracle: againe, it was but for a time till things were better sette in order. But when a certayne forme was once presebbed of God, the ciuill government was left vnto him, & he was commanded to resigne the priesthood to his brother. And worthily. For it is aboe nature, that one man shold suffice to beare both burdens. And this hath in all ages bin diligently observed in the Church. And there was neuer any of the Bishops, so long as the true forme of the Church endured, that once thought of usurping the power of the worde: so this was a common prouerbe in the time of Ambrose, that Emperours rather counted the priesthood, than priests the empire. For this which he afterward sayth, was emprinted in the mindes of al men, that palaces pertained to the Emperour, and Churches to the Priest.

9 But since that a way hath bin devised, whereby bishops might hold the title, honor & riches of their office without burden or care: least they should be left altogether idle, the power of the worde was giuen them, or rather they did by usurpation take it vpon themselves. By what colour will they defende this shamelesse? Was this the dute of Bishops to wrappe themselves with judiaccall hearing of causes, with the gouvernements of cities and provinces, and through large circuits to meddle in businesse so unappertaining to them: which have so much worke and businesse in their owne office, that if they were wholly & continually occupied in it, and were withdrawn with no callings away from it, yet they were scarcely able to satisfie it? But (such is their unwaresness) they sticke not to boast, that by this means the Church doth flourish according to her worthinesse, and that they themselves in the mean time are not too much drawn away from the duties of their vocation. As touching the first point: if this be a comely ornament of the holy office, that they bee aduanced to such height, that the hiest monarches may stande in feare of them: then they haue cause to quarell with Christe, which hath in such sort grievously pinched their honor. For, at least in their opinion opinion, what could have bin spoken more dishonorably than these words: The kings of the Gentiles and princes bear rule over them, but you shall not so: And yet he laid no harder lawe vpon his seruants than he first laide and received vpon himselfe. Who (faith he) hath made me a judge or deuider among you? We see that he plainly putteeth away from himselfe the office of judging, which he would not do if it were a thing agreeing with his office; wil not the seruants suffer themselues to bee brought into that order, whereunto the Lorde hath yielded himselfe subject? *As for the other point, I woulde to God they could so proue it in experience as it is eafe to speake it. But forasmuch as the Apoftles thought it not good, to leaue the worde of God and minister at tables: thereby, because they will not bee taught, they are convinced, that it is not all one mans worke to be both a good bishop & a good prince. For if they (which according to the largenesse of the gifts wherewith they were endued, were able to satisfie mo and greater cares than any men that haue beene born since them) haue yet confessed that they cannot at once apply the ministerie both of the worde and of tables, but that they shoulde faint under the burden: howe could these that bee men of no valor in comparison of the Apoftles a hundred folde excelle the industrie of the Apoftles? Truely, to attempt it was a point of moste shamelesse and too presumptuous boldnesse: yet wee see that it hath beene attempted: but with what successe, it is evident. For it coulde not otherwise come to passe, but that for forsaking their owne office they shoulde remoue into other mens charge.

10 And it is no doubt but that of small beginning they haue by little and little grewen to so great encrease. For it was not possible that they shoulde at the first step clim vp so hie. But sometime with suttletie and crooked craftie meanes they priuily auanced themselves, so as no man coulde foresee that it woulde come to passe till it was done: sometime when occasion ferued they did by terror and threatenings wring from princes some augmentation of their power: sometime when they sawe Princes not hard laced to giue, they abused their fond and vnaduisd gentleness. In olde time if any controversie happened, the godly, to escape the necessitie of going to lawe, committed the arbitrement to the bishop, because they doubted not his vertuynightnesse. With such arbitrementes the olde bishops were oftentimes encombred, which in deed greatly displeased them (as Augustine in one place testifieth) but least the parties should runne to contentious lawing, they did though against their willes take that encumbrance vpon them. These men haue of voluntarie arbitrementes, which were altogether differing from the noise of judicall courtes, made an ordinarie jurisdiction. In a little while after when cities and countries were troubled with divers hardie distresses, they reforted to the protection of bishops, to be saued by their faithfull succour: the bishops by marueilous suttletie, of protectours made themselves Lords. Yea, and it cannot be denied that they haue gotten the possession of a greate parte by violent seditious partakings. As for the Princes, that willingly gauing jurisdiction to bishops, they were by divers affections moued thereunto. But admitting that their gentlenes had some thewe of godliness: yet with this their wrongfull liberalitie they did not vere well: well provide for the profit of the Church, whose ancient and true discipline they have so corrupted, yea (to say truth) have utterly abolished. But those bishops have abused such goodnes of princes to their own commodity, have by the covenants of this one example enough, and too much testified they are not bishops. For if they had any scruple of an Apostolike spirite, they would without doubt have answered out of the mouth of Paul: The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but spiritual. But they being raised with blind gree-.

dines, have destroyed both themselves, their successors, and the Church.

11. At length the bishop of Rome not contented with meaner lordships, first laid hand upon kingdoms, & afterward upon the very empire. And that he may with some color whatsoever it be retain possession gotten by mere robberie, he sometime bostheth that he hath it by the law of God, he sometime pretendeth the gift of Constantine, sometime some other title. First I answer with Bernard: Admit that he do by any other reason whatsoever, claim this unto him, yet he hath it not by Apostolike right. For Peter could not give which he had not: but he gave to his successors y which he had; the care of churches. But when the Lord and maister faith, that he is not appointed judge between two, a servant and scholar ought not to thinke scorn if he be not judge of all men. But Bernard speaketh of ciuill judgementes. For he addeth: Therefore your power is in crimes, not in possessions: because for those & not for these ye have receiv'd the keys of the kingdom of heaven. For which secteth thou the greater dignity to forgive sinnes, or to divide landes? There is no comparison. These base and earthly things haue Kings and Princes of the earth their judges. Why do ye invade the bounds of other? &c. Againe, Thou art made a superior: (he speaketh to Pope Eugenius) but wherunto? Not to beare lordship, I thinke. Therfore how much fouer we thinke of our felues, let vs remember that there is a ministrerie layde vpon vs, not a lordship giuen vs. Learne that thou haft need of a weede hooke not of a scepter, that thou maist do the worke of a Prophet. Againe, it is plaine: Lordship is forbidden to the Apostles. Go thou therefore, & presume to vsurpe to thy selfe either being a Lord, an Apostleship or being an Apostle, a Lordship. And by & by after: the form of an Apostleship is this, Lordship is forbidden them, ministrerie is bounden them. Whereas these things are spoken of a man, yt it is ensentent to all men that the very truth speaketh them, yea where as the very thing it selfe is manifest without all wordes: yet the Bishoppe of Rome was not ashamed in the Council at Orlaerne to decree, that the supreme power of both the swordes belong to him by the lawe of God.

12. As for the gift of Constantine, they that be but meanly practised in the histories of those times neede not to be taught how much this is not only fabulous, but also to be laughed at. But to passe over histories, Gregoric himselfe is both a sufficient & most full witnesse hereof. For so oft as he speaketh of the Emperor, he calleth him most noble Lord, and himselfe his unworthy seruant. Againe in another place: But let not our Lord by the earthly power be the sooner angry with the priests: but with excellent consideration, for his sake whose seruantes they be, let him so rule over them, that hee also giue them due reverence. We see howe in common subjection he woude be accounted as one of the people. For he there pleadeth not any other man's cause, but his owne. In an other place, I truete in the almyghty God, that he will give a long life to our godly Lorde, and will dispose vs under your hande according to his mercie. Neither have I therefore alledged these things, for that it is my purpose throughly to discusse this question concerning the gift of Constantine: but onely that the Readers shoulde see by the way how childishly the Romanists doe lie, when they goe about to challenge an earthly Empire to their bishop. And so much the more fowle is y shamelesnes of Augustine Steuchus, which in such a dispered cause hath beene so bolde to sell his travaile and tongue to the bishop of Rome. Valla (as it was not hard for a man learned and of a sharp wit) had stronglie confuted that fable. And yet (as a man little exercised in ecclesiastical matters) he had not saide al that might haue made for that purpose. Steuchus hurft in, and scattered slinking trifles to oppresse the clear light. And truely he doth no leffe coldly handle the cause of his master, than if some merie conceited fellowe faining himselfe to do the same, would in deede take Valla partie. But verily it is a worthie cause, for which the Pope shoule hyre such patrones for mony: and no leffe worthie are those hyred losels to be deceived of their hope of gaine, as it happened to Eugubinus.

13 But if any man require to knowe the time, since this fained Empire began to rise vp, there are not yet pased five hundred yeres, since y bishops yet remained in subietion of the Princes, neither was the Pope created without the authoritie of the Emperour, The Emperour Henry the foureth of that name, a light and rash man, and of no forecaft, of great boldnes and disholture life, gaue first occasion to Gregorie the seuenth to alter this order. For when he had in his court the bishoprikes of all Germany partly to bee sold, & partly laide open for spoile: Hildebrand, which had receiued displeasure at his hand, caught hold of a goodly colour to revenge himselfe. But because he seemed to pursue an honest & a godly cause, he was furthered in the favor of many. And Henry was otherwise, by reason of his insolent manner of gouerning, hated of the most part of Princes. At the length Hildebrad, which called himselfe Gregorie the seuenth, as hee was a filthie & naughty man, bewrayed the malice of his heart: which was the cause that hee was forsaken of many that had confpired with him. But he thus much preuailed, y his succeessors might freely without punishment not onely shake off the yoke, but also bring Emperors in subietion to them. Hereunto was added y from thence foorth there were many Emperors liker to Henry than to Iulius Cesar: whom it was no hard thing to subdue, while they fate at home careless of all things & slothfull, when they had most neede with vertue & lawfull meanes to represse the greedines of the bishops. Thus wee see with what colour that fame godly gift of Constantine is shadowed, whereby the Pope faineth that the Empire of the West was deluered into him.

14 In the meane time the Popes ceased not, sometime with fraud, sometime with treason, and sometime with force to inuade other mens dominions: & the very citie it selfe, which before was free, within a hundred & thirtie yeres, or there about they brought into their subietion, til they grew to y fame power which they haue at this day: & for the obtaining or encreasing wherof, whereof they have so troubled Christendom by the space of two hundred years, (for they beganne before that they tooke to them the dominion of the Citie) that they have almost destroyed it. In the olde time when vnder Gregorie the keepers of the goods of church, did take possession of the landes which they reckened to belong to the Church, and after the maner of seasing to the use of the Prince did set titles upon them for tok of claimes, Gregorie assembling a councell of bishopes, inteying fore against that prophane maner, asked whether they did not judge that Clerke accursed which did of his owne will by writing of any title attempt to enter upon any possession. They all pronounced, accursed. If to clame a piece of ground by writing of a title be in a Clarke an offence worthy of accusing: when whole two hundred yeres together Popes do practice nothing else but bar:els, shedding of bloodes, destructions of armies, sackinges of some cities, racing of other, overthrowes of nations, wastinges of kingdomes, onely that they might catch holde of other mens possessions: what surfinges can be enough to punishe such examples? Truely it is very plaine that they seek nothing lesse than the glory of Christ. For if they of their owne will doe wholly resigne at the secular power that they haue, therin is no daunger to the glory of God, no danger to founde doctrine, no daunger to the laffettie of the Church, but they are caried blinde and headlong with only greedinesse of dominion because they thinke nothing safe, vnles they may beare rule with rigorousnes (as the Pro- Ephet faith) and with power.

To jurisdiction is annexed immunitie, which the Romish Cleargie tooke to themselves. For they thinke it against their dignittie, if they anwer in personall causes before a temporall judge; and therein they thinke both the libertie and dignittie of the Church to consist, if they be exempt from common judgementes and lawes. But the olde bishopes, which otherwise were most rigorous in defending the right of the Church, judged themselves and their order to bee nothing hurt, if they were subiect to them. And the godlie Emperorous, without gainesaying of any man, did alwaye cal Clarukes to their judgement feats so oft as need required. For thus saith Constantine in his Epistle to the Nicomedians: If any of the bishopes shall vndiscreetly disorder him selfe, his boldnes shall be restrained by the execution of the minifter of God, that is by my execution. And Valentinian faith: good bishopes do not speake against the power of the Emperor, but doe sincerly both keepe the commandements of God the great king, and also obey our lawes. At that time all men were perswaded of this without controuersie. But Ecclesiasticall causes were referred to the judgement of the Bishop. As if any Clarke had offered nothing against the lawes but only was accused by the Canons: he was not cited to common judgement feats, but in cause had bishop for his judge. Likewise if there were a questio of Faith in controuersie, or such a matter as properly pertained to the Church, the judgement thereof was committed to the Church. So is it to be understood, which Ambrose wrieth to Valentinian: Your father of honourable memorie, not onely aunswered in wordes, but also decreed by lawes, that in a cause of Faith he ought to be judge that is neither vniue in office nor vniue in right. Again: If we haue regard to the Scriptures or olde examples, who is there that canne denie that that in a cause of Faith, in a cause (I say) of Faith, bishops are wont to judge of Christian Emperors, and not Emperors of bishops? Again: I would have come, O Emperor, to your consistory, if either the bishops or the people would haveuffered me to goe: saying, that the cause of Faith ought to be debated in the Church before the people. He affirmeth verily that a spiritual cause, that is to say the cause of religion, ought not to be drawn into \(\ddot{y}\) temporal court where profane causes are pleaded. Worthy do all men praise his constancie in this behalfe. And yet in a good cause he proceedeth but thus farre, that if it come to violence and strong hand, he faith that hee will give place. Willingly (faith he) will not forsake the place committed vnto me; but when I am enforced, I knowe not how to resift: for our armour are prayers and tears. Let vs note the singular modestie and wisdom of the holy man, ioyned with stoutnes of courage and boldnesse. Iustina the Emperours mother, because shee could not drawe him to the Arrians side, practised to drive him from the government of the Church. And so should it haue come to passe, if hee had come when he was called to the palace to pleade his cause. Therefore hee denieth the Emperour to be a competente judge of so great a controverfie, Which manner of doing both the necessitie of that time, and the continuall nature of the matter required. For hee judged that hee ought rather to die, than such an example should by his content be giuen to potenterie: & yet if violence be offered, he thinketh not of resiftance. For he denieth it to be bishoplike, to defende the faith and right of \(\ddot{y}\) church with armes. But in other causes hee heueth himselfe ready to doe whatsoever the Emperour shall commaund him. If hee demand tribut, (faith hee) wee denieth it not: the landes of the Church doe pay tribute. If hee aske landes, hee hath power to claime them, none of vs resifteth. After the same manner also speaketh Gregorie. I am not ignorant (faith hee) of the minde of our most noble soueraigne Lorde, that hee vseth not to intermeddle in causes pertaining to Priestes, lest hee shoulde in any thing be burdened with our sinnes. Hee doeth not generally exclude the Emperour from judging of Priestes: but he faith that there bee certaine causes, which hee ought to leaue to the judgement of the Church.

16 And by this verie exception the holy men sought nothing else, but that Princes leave zealous of religion shoulde not with tyrannous violence and wilfulness interrupt the Church in doing her office. For neither did they disallowe, if princes sometime did vs their authoritie in Ecclesiastical matters, so that it were done to preserue the order of the Church, not to trouble it, to stablishe discipline, not to dissolve it. For such the Church hath not the power of compelling, nor ought to require it (I speake of ciuill constraining:) it is the office of Godly kings and princes to maintaine religion on with lawes, proclamations, and judicall proceedings. After this maner, when the Emperour Maurice had commanded certaine bishops that they shoulde receive their felowe Bishoppes that were their neighbours and driven out by the barbarous nations: Gregorie confirmeth that commande-ment, and exhorteth them to obey it. And when he himselfe is admonisht by the same Emperour to come to attonement with John the Bishop of Constantinople, hee doeth in deed render a reason why hee ought not To Salvation.

Lib. 4.

To be blamed; yet he doth not boast of immunity from the secular court, but rather promises he will be obedient, so far as his conscience will give him leave: and therewith he layeth this, that Maurice did as became a godly Prince, when he gave such commandements to the Priests.

The xii. Chapter.

Of the discipline of the Church, whereof the chief use is in the censures and excommunication.

The discipline of the Church, the entreating whereof we have differed into this place, is briefly to be declared, that we may at length passe over to the rest. But that name for the most part hanceth upon the power of the keies and spirittuall jurisdiction. That this may be the more easilly understood, let vs divide the Church into two principal degrees, that is to say, the Clergy, and the people. Clerkes I call by the vsual name those that execute publique ministry in the Church. First wee will speake of common discipline, to which all ought to be subject: then wee will come to the Clergy, which beside common discipline, haue a special discipline by themselves. But because many for hatred of discipline do abhorre the very name thereof, let them heare this: If no fellowship, yea no house though it haue but a small householde, can be kept in right state without discipline, the same is much more necessary in the church, whose state ought to be most orderly of all. Therefore as the doctrine of Christ which bringeth salvation is the foule of the Church, so discipline is in stead of sinewes therein: whereby it is brought to passe, that the members of the body hang together every one in his fit place. Wherefore whosoever do either desire to haue discipline taken away, or hinder the restoring thereof, whether they do it of set purpose or by vnaduitednes, verily they seek the extreme dissipation of the Church. For what shall betide, if what is lustfull be lawfull to every man? But so would it be, if there were not with the preaching of doctrine adioyned private admonishments, corrections, & such other helps which sustaine doctrine and suffer it not to be idle. Discipline therefore is as it were a bridile wherewith they may be holden backe & tamed which coltishly resist against Christ: or as it were a pricke, wherewith they are not willing enough may be stirred vp: and sometyme, as a fatherly rod, wherewith they which haue more grievously fallen may be chastised mercifully and according to the mildenes of the Spirit of Christ. Sith therefore we do nowe see at hande certaine beginnings of a horrible waftnesse in the Church, because there is no care nor order to keepe the people in awe, very necessitie crieth out that there is neede of remedy. But this is the only remedy, which both Christ hath commanded, and hath alway bin vsed among the godly.

2. The first foundation of discipline is, that private monitions should haue place: that is to say, that if any man of his owne accord do not his duty, if he behaue himself licentioulesly, or liue not honestly, or haue committted any thing worthy of blame, he should suffer himselfe to be admonished: and that every man should study to admonish his brother when occasion shall require. But specially let the Pastors and Priests bee watchfull to do.

do this, whose office is not only to preach to the people, but in every house to admonish & exhort if at any time they do not sufficiently persuade by general doctrine: as Paul teacheth, when he rehearseth that he taught privately & in houses, and protesteth that he is clean from the blood of all men, because he hath not ceas'd with teares day and night to admonish every one. For doctrine doth then obtain force & authority when the minister not only doth declare to all together what their dutie is to Christ, but also hath power & order to require the keeping thereof of whom he marketh to be either not obedient to doctrine, or slothful. If any man do either stubbornly refuse, or in going forward in his faults, do despite such admonishmentes: when he hath bin the second time admonished with witnesses called to it, Christ commandeth them to be called to the judgement of the Church, which is the assembly of Elders: and y there they should be more greatly admonished as it were by publick authority, if he reverence the Church he may submit himselfe & obey. But if he be not hereby subdued, but do continue in his wickednes, then he commandeth him, as a despiser of the Church, to be put away from the fellowship of the faithfull.

Of the first sort Christ sayth to euery private man, Reprove him betweene thee and him alone. Of manifest sins Paul saith to Timothee, Reprove him before all men, that the rest may have feare. For Christ had sayde before, If thy brother have offended against thee. Which wordes (against thee) vnles thou wilt be contentious thou canst not otherwise vnderstande then vnder thine owne secret knowledge, so that there be no more prime to it. But the same thing which the Apostle teacheth Timothee concerning the rebuking of them openly, that sinne openly, he himselfe followed in Peter. For when Peter sinned euens to publicke offence, hee did not admonishe him a parte by himselfe, but brought him forth into the sight of the Church. Therefore this shalbe the right order of doing, if in secret faults wee goe forwarde according to those degrees that Christ hath set: but in manifest faults, we immediately proceede to the Churches Solemn rebuking, if the offfense be publicke.

4 Let this also be an other distinction: that of sinnes some be defaults, other some be wicked doings, or hainous offences. To the correcting of this later sort, not only admonish ment or rebuking is to be vs'd, but also a severer remedy: as Paul sheweth which not only chastiseth with words the Corinthian that had committed inceft, but also punished him with excommunication, so soone as he was certified of his wicked deed. Now therefore we beginne better to see howe the spiritual jurisdiction of the Church, which punishteth sinnes according to the word of the Lord, is the best maintenance of health, and foundation of order, & bonde of vnitive. Therefore when the Church doth banish out of her company manifest adulterers, whoremongers, theuces, robbers, seditious persons, perjured men, false witnesses, and such other, againe, obstinate men, which being orderly admonished eu'n of small faultes, do scorne God and his judgement, she taketh nothing upon her selfe without reason, but executeth the jurisdiction given her of the Lorde. More-Moreover, that none should despise such judgement of the Church, or lightly regard that he is condemned by the confenting voices of the faithful; the Lord hath testified, that the same is nothing else but a pronouncing of his own sentence, and that whatsoever they doe in earth is confirmed in heaven. For they haue the word of the Lord, whereby they may condemne the sowerde: they haue the word, whereby they may receiue the repentant into fauour: They I say that trust that without this bonde of discipline Churches may long stande, are deceived in opinion: vniſſe perhaps we may want that helpe which the Lord foresaw that it should be necessary for vs. And truely how great is the necceſſitie thereof, halbe better perceived by the manifolde vfe of it.

5. There be three endes which the Church hath respecte vnto in suche corrections and excommunication. The first is, that they should not, to the dishonour of God, be named among Christians, that leade a filthy and fittfull life, as though his holy Church were a conspiracie of naughtie and wicked men. For if the Church is the body of Chrift, it cannot bee defiled with such filthie and rotten members, but that some shame must come to their head. Therefore that there should not bee any such thing in the Church, whereby his holy name may be spotted with any reproch, they are to be driven out of their househould, by whose dishonestie any flaunder might redound to the name of Christians. And herein also is consideration to be had of the Supper of the Lord, that it be not profaned by giusing it to all without choife. For it is most true, that he to whom the distribution of it is committed, if he willingly and willingly admit an unworthy man whom he might lawfully put backe, is of guiltie of Sacrilege, as if he did giue abroad the Lords body to dogges. Wherfore Chryſotome greecously inuoceth against his preſts, which while they feare the power of greate men, dare debarre no man. The bloode (faith he) shall be required at your handes. If ye feare man, hee shall laugh you to scorn: but if ye feare God, ye shall be reuerenced alio among men. Let vs not feare maces, nor purple, nor crowne: we haue here a greater power. I verily wil rather deliuer mine owne body to death, and suffer my blood to be shed, than I will be made partaker of this defiling. Therefore leafe this most holy mystery be spotted with flaunder, in the distributing thereof choife is greatly requisite: which yet cannot be had but by the jurisdiction of the Church. The second end is, leafe (as it is won to come to paffe) with the continual company of the euill, the good shoulde be corrupted. For (such is our reade inclination to go out of the way) there is nothing easier than for vs to be led by euill examples from the right course of life. This vfe the Apostle touched, when he commanded the Corinthians to put the incestuous man out of their company. A little leauen (faith he) corrupteth the whole lump of doce. And he foresaw herein fo great danger, that hee forbade him euin from all fellowship. If any brother (faith he) among you bee named either a whoremonger, or a couetous man, or a worshipper of Idols, or a dronkarde, or an euile speaker, with such a one I grant you not leafe so much as to eate. The third end is, that they themselves confounded with shame may begin to repent of their filthineſſe. So it is profitable for them alfo to haue their owne wickedneſſe chastised, that with feeling of the rodde they may bee be awaked, which otherwise by tender bearing with them would have become more obstinate. The same thing doth the Apostle mean where he faith thus: If any doe not obey our doctrine, mark him, and keepe no companie with him, that he may be ashamed. Again in an other place, when he wreteth that he hath deliuered the Corinthian to Satan, that his Spirit might be fauned in the day of the Lorde: that is (as I expounde it) that he went into a damnation for a time, that he might be fauned for ever. But he therefore faith that he deliuereth him to Satan, because the deuill is out of his church, as Christ is in the Church. For whereas some doe referre it to a certaine vexing of the flesh, I thinkte that to be very uncertaine.

6 When these endes be set foorth, nowe it remaineth to see howe the Church executeth this part of discipline which consisteth in jurisdiciion. First let vs keepe the diuision about for, that of sinnes some bee publike, and other some be private or more secrete. Publike are those that have not onely one or two witnesse, but are committed openly and with the offence of whole Church. Secrete I call those, not which are altogether hidden from men, as are the sinnes of Hypocrites, for those come not into the judgement of the Church, but those of the meane kinde which are not without witnesse, and yet are not publike. The first kinde requireth not those degrees which Christ reheareth: but when any such thing appeareth, the Church ought to doe her dutie in calling the sinner and correcting him according to the proportion of the offence. In the seconde kinde according to the rule of Christ, they come not to the Church till there be also obstinacie added. When it is once come to knowledge, then is that other diuision to bee noted betwene wicked doinges and defaultes. For in lighter sinnes there is not to bee vsed so great seueretie, but chastifement of wordes sufficeth, and the same gentle & fatherly, which may not harden nor confound the sinner, but bring him home to himselfe, that he may more rejoyce than be forie that he was corrected. But it is meece that hainous offences bee chastised with straier remedy. For it is not enough, if hee that by doing a wicked deed of evil example hath greuously offended the Church, shoulde bee chastised onely with wordes, but he ought for a time to be deprived of the communion of the supper, till he have gien assurance of his repentance. For against the Corinthian Paul saith not onely rebuking of wordes, but diueth him out of his church, and blameth the Corinthians that it had so long born him. The old & better Church kept this order, when rightfull government flourished. For if any man had done any wicked deed wherupon was grown offence, first hee was commanded to abstaine from partaking of the holy Supper, then both to humble himselfe before God, and to testify his repentance before the Church. There were also certaine solemn victages, which were enioyed to them that had fallen, to be tokens of their repentance. When they had so done, that the Church was satisfied, then by laying on of hands hee was receiued into favor. Which receiuing is oftentimes called of Ciprian peace, who also briefly describeth this vflake. They doe penance (saith he) in a certain full timete they come to confession, and by the laying on of hands of the bishop & the Clergie they receive power to come to the communion. Howbeit the Bishop and his clerdegie had so the ruling of reconciliation, that they did therewith-withall require the consent of the people: as he sheweth in another place.

7 From this discipline there was no man exempted, that even the Princes together with the common people did submit themselves to beare it. And rightfully, sic it was evident that it was the discipline of Christ, to whom it is meete that all scepters and crownes of kings be submitted. So when Theodosius was deprived by Ambrose of power to come to the communion because of the slaughter committed at Thessalonica, he there down all the royal ornament wherewith he was clothed: he openly in the Church belied his sinne, which had crept upon him by fraud of other men: hee craeted pardon with groning and tears. For great kings ought not to think this to be any dishonor to them, if they humbly throw downe themselves before Christ the king of kings, neither ought it to displeasse them, if they be judged by the Church. For sic in their court, they heare nothing else but mere flat-teries, it is more than necessary for them to be rebuked of the Lord by the mouth of the priests. But rather they ought to wish, that the priests shou'd not spare them, that the Lord may spare them. In this place I omit to speak by whose this jurisdiction is to be exercised, because it is spoken of in another place. This only I adde that that is the lawfull manner of proceeding in excommunicating a man, which Paul sheweth: if the Elders doe it not alone by themselves, but with the Church knowing & allowing it: that is, in such sort that the multitude of the people may not gouerne the doing, but may mark it as a witness & a keper: nothing should be done of a fewe by willful affection. But the whole manner of doing, beside the calling upon the name of God, ought to have such grauitie, as may resible the preface of Christ: it may be vndoubted, he there sitteth for rulcer of his owne judgement.

8 But this ought not to be passed over, that such seueritie be commeth from the Church as is joyned with the spiret of mildnes. For we must alway diligently beware as (as Paul teacheth) that he which is punished be not swallowed vp of sorrow: for so shoulde of a remedie be made a destruction. But out of the end may better be gathered a rule of moderation. For whereas this is required in excommunication, that the sinner should bee brought to repentance, and euil examples taken away, left either the name of Christ should bee euil spoken of, or other men be provoked to follow them: if we shal haue an eye to these things, we shall be able easily to judge how farre seueritie ought to proceede & where it ought to end. Therfore when the sinner giveth a testimonie of his repentance, & doth by his testimonie, as much as in him lieth, blot out the offence: he is not to be enforced any further: but if he bee enforced, rigorousnes doth then exceede measure. In which behalf the immeasurable seueritie of the old fathers cannot be excused, which both disagreed from the prescribed order of the Lord, & also was maruellously dangerous. For when they charged a sinner with solemn penance, & deprivacion from the holy communion sometime for seven yeares, sometime four yeares, sometime three yeares, sometime for their whole life: what other thing could follow thereof but either great hypocrisy or most great desperation? Likewise whereas no man had fallen the second time was admitted to seconde penance: but was cast out of the Church even to the ende of his life: that was neither profitable nor agreeing to reason. Therefore whosoever shal wey the matter with found judge-
Of the outward means.

Judgement shall herein perceive want of their discretion. Howbeit I do here rather disallow the publike manner, than accuse all them that used it, whereas it is certain that many of them mislifed it; but they did therefore suffer it, because they could not amende it. Truely, Cyprian declareth, how much beside his owne will he was so rigorous. Our patience (faith he) and easines and gentlenes is readie to them that come. I wish all to returne into the Church: I wish all our fellowsoldiers to be enclosed within the tentes of Christ & in the houes of God the father, I forgive all things, I dissemble many things: for zeale & desire to gather brotherhood together, I examine not with full judgement those things that are committed against God in pardoning defaults more than I ought, I am my selfe almost in defaults: I do with readiness and full love embrace them that returne with repentance, confessing their sinnes with humble & plaine satisfaction. Chrystophtome is somewhat harder, and yet he faith thus: If God be so kind, why will his Priest seeme so rigorous? Moreover we know what gentlenesse Augustine vsed towards the Donatistes, in so much that he sticked not to receiue into bishoprie those that had returned from schisme, even immediately after their repentance. But because a contrarie order had growe in force, they were compelled to leave their owne judgement to follow it.

9 But as this mildnes is required in the whole body of the church, that it should punish them that are fallen, mercifully & not to the extremitie of rigor, but rather according to the precept of Paul, should confirme charitable toward them; so every private man for himselfe ought to temper himselfe to this mercifulnes & gentlenes. Therefore it is not our part to wipe out of the number of the elect such as are druen out of the Church, or to dispaire of them as though they were alreadie lost. We may in deed judge them strangers from the Church, & therefore strangers from Christ: but that is only during the time they abide in diuorse. But if then also they shew a greater resemblance of stubbornnes then of gentlenes, yelet vs commit them to judgement of the Lord, hoping better of them in time to come than wee see in time present, & let vs not therefore cease to pray to God for them, & (to comprehend all in one worde) let vs not condemne to death the person it selfe, which is in the hand & judgement of God alone, but let vs rather weye by the law of the Lord of what sorte every mans workes be. Which rule while we follow, wee rather stande to the judgement of God than pronounce our owne. Let vs not take to our selves more libertie in judging, vnlesse wee will binde the power of God within boundes, & appoint a lawe to his mercie, at whose pleasure when he thinketh it good, very euil men are turned into very good, strangers are graffed & foreins are choisen into the church, And this y Lord doth, theryby to mocke out the opinion of men, & rebate their rashnes; which if it be not restrained, presumeth to take to it selfe power of judg-}

10 For where as Christ promiseth that that shall be bound in heaven, which they that be his shall bind in earth, he limiteth the power of binding, to the Censurof the church: by which they y are excommunicate, are not thrown into euerlasting ruine & damnation: but hearing their liues & maners to be condemned, they are also certified of their owne euerlasting con-
For excommunication herein differeth from accursing, that accursing taking away all pardon doth condemne a man and aiodige him to eternall destruction: excommunication rather reuenge than punisheth maner. And though the same doe also punish the man, yet it doeth so punish him, that in forewarning of his damnation to com, it doeth call him backe to salvation. If that be obtained, reconciliation & restoring to the communion is readie. But accursing is either very seldom or never in use. Therefore, although ecclesiasticall discipline, permiteth not to live familiarly, or to haue friendly conversation with them that bee excommunicate: yet wee ought to endeavour by such means as we may, that returning to amendment, they may returne to the fellowship and vnitie of the Church:as the Apostle also teacheth. Do not (faith he) thinke them as enemies, but correct them as brethren. Vnlesse this gentleness be kept as well privately as in common, there is danger left from discipline we forthwith fall to butcherie.

11 This also is principally required to the moderation of discipline, which Augustine entreateth of in disputing against the Donatistes: that neither private men, if they see faultes not diligently enough corrected by the Counsel of Elders, should therefore by and by departe from the Church: nor the Pastors themselves, if they cannot according to their hearts desire purge all things that need amendment, should therefore throw away the ministe-erie, or with vnwonted rigouroufnes trouble the whole Church. For it is most true which he writeth that he is free & discharged from curse, whatsoever he be that either by rebuking amendeth what he can: or what he cannot amend, excludeth, sauing the bond of peace or what he cannot exclude, sauing the bond of peace, he doth disallow with equitie, and beare with stedfastnes. He rendreth a reason thereof in another place: because all godly order & manner of ecclesiasticall discipline ought alway to haue respect unto the vnitie of the Spirit in the bond of peace: which the Apostle commaundeth to bee kept by our bearing one with another: and when it is not kept, the medicine of punishment beginneth to be not only superfuous, but also hurtfull, and therefore cesseth to be a medicine. He that (faith he) doth diligently thinke upon these things doth neither in preferuing of vnitie neglect the severitie of discipline, nor doth with immeasurablelenesse of correction breake the bond of vnitie. He graunteth in deede that not onely the Pastors ought to travaile to this point, that there may remaine no fault in the Church, but also that every man ought to his power to endeavour therunto: and he plainly declareth that he which neglecteth to monife, repute, and correct euill, although he do not favoure them, nor sinne with them, yet is gillie before the Lord. But if he be in such degree, that he may also sever them from the partaking of sacraments, and doth it not, now he sinneth not by an others euill, but by his own. Only he willeth it to be done, with v sing of discretion, which the Lord also requireth, least while the tares be in rooting out, the corne bee hurt. Hereupon he gathereth out of Cyprian, Let a man therefore mercifully correct what he can: & what he cannot, let him patiently suffer, & with love grone and lament it.

12 This he faith because of the precistens of the Donatistes, who when they saw faults in the Churches which the bishops did in deed rebuke w words, but not punish with excommunication, (because they thought that they could this way nothing preuail) did sharply enuey against the bishops as betrayers of discipline, and did with an vngodly schisme deuide theselves from the flocke of Christ. As the Anabaptistes doe at this day, which when they acknowledge no congregation to bee of Christ, vnlesse it do in euery point shine with angelike perfection, do vnder pretence of their zeale ouerthrowe all edification. Such (faith Augustine) not for hatred of other mens wickedneses, but for desire to maintaine their owne contentions, do couet either wholly to draw away, or at least to deuide the weake people shareed with the boasting of their name: they swelling with pride, mad with stubbornnes, traiterous with slaunders, troublesome with seditions, least it should openly appeare that they want the light of trueth, do pretend a shadow of rigorous seueritie: & those things which in scripture are commanded to be done with moderate healing for correcting of the faultes of brethren, preferring the syncrenes of loue, & keeping the vnitie of peace, they abuse to sacrilege of schisme & occasion of cutting off. So doth Satan transorme himselfe into an angell of light, when by occasion as it were of iust seueritie he persuadeth vnmercifull crueltie, coueting nothing else but to corrupt & break the bond of peace & vnitie: which bond remaining faft among Christians, all his forces are made weake to hurt, his traps of treasons are broken, & his counsels of ouerthrowing do vanish away.

13 This one thing he chieffely commendeth, that if the infection of sin haue entred into the whole multitude, then the seuer mercie of liuely discipline is neceffarie. For (faith he) the deuises of separation are vaine, and hurtful & full of sacrilege, because they are vngodly & proud, & do more trouble the weake good ones, than they amend the stout euiul ones. And which he there teache other, he himselfe also faithfully folowed. For writing to Aurelius bishop of Carthage, he complaineth that drunkennes which is so fore condemned in scriptures, doth range vnpunished in Afrika: & he adviseth him, that assembling a Counsell of bishops he should prouide remedie for it. He addeth by and by after: These things (as I thinke) are taken away not roughly, not hardly, not after an imperious maner, but more by teaching than by commanding, more by admonishing than by threatening. For so must we deale with a multitude of sinners, but seueritie is to be exercised vpon the sinnes of fewe. Yet he doeth not meane that Bishops shoulde therefore winke or hold their peace at publike faults, because they cannot seuerely punish them: as he himselfe afterward expoundeth it: But he willeth that the measure of correction be so tempered, that so farre as may be, it may rather bring health than destruciton to the body. And therefore at length he concludes thus: Wherefore both this commandement of the Apostle is in no wise to be negleected, to seuer euiul, when it may be don without peril of breaking of peace: & this is also to be kept, y bearing one with another, we should endeouer to prouide vnitie of the Spirit, in the bond of peace.

14 The part that remaineth of discipline, which properly is not contained in the power of keies, standeth in this, y according to the necessity of times the Pastors should exhort the people either to fasting, or to common suppli-supplications, or to other exercises of humility, repentance, & faith, of which things there is neither time, nor measure, nor forme prescribed by the word of God, but is left in the judgement of the church. The observing of this part also, as it is profitable, so hath alway bin vsed of the olde church even from ye verie Apostles. Howbeit the Apostles themselves were not the first authors of them, but they tooke example out of the law & the Prophets. For wee see that there so oft as any weightie businesse happened, the people were called togither, common prayers enioyned, & fasting commanded. Therefore the Apostles followed that which both was not new to the people of God, & they forefawe that it should be profitable. Likewise is to be thought of other exercises, wherewith the people may either be stirred vp to their dutie, or be kept in awe and obedience. There are examples eche where in holy histories, which we neede not to gather together. In summe this is to be holde, that so oft as there happeneth any controversie of religion, which must bee determined eithe by a Synode or by ecclesiastical judgement, so oft as they be about choosing of a minister, finally, so oft as any hard matter or of great importance is in doing againe, when there appeare tokens of the wrath of God, as pestilence, & warre, & famine: this is a holy ordinance & profitable for all ages, that the Pastors should exhort the people to common fasting, & to extraordinarie prayers. If any man doe not allow the testimonies which may be alledged out of the old testament, as though they were not meete for the Christian Church, it is certaine that the Apostles also did the same. Howbeit of praiers I think there will scarcely any be founde that will move any question. Therefore let vs say somewhat of fasting: because many when they understand not what profit it hath, do judge it not to necessarie: some alfo do utterly refuse it as superfluous: and when the vse of it is not well known, it is easie to slide into superstition.

15 Holy & true fasting hath three endes. For wee vs it, either to make leane and subdue the flesh, that it should not waxe wanton, or that we may be better disposed to prayers & holy meditations, or that it should be a testimonie of our humbling before God, when we be willing to confess our guiltinesse before him. The first end hath so oft so often place in common fasting, because al men have not like estate of body, nor like health; therefore it rather agreeeth with private fasting. The second end is common to both, for as well the whole Church as every one of the faithful hath neede of such preparation to prayer. The third also is likevise common. For it shall sometime befall that God shall strike some nation with warre, or pestilence, or with some calamitie. In such a common scourge the whole people must accuse themselves, and openly confess their owne guiltinesse. But if the hand of the Lord do strike any private man, he ought to do the same, either alone, or with his own familie. That standeth chiefly in the affection of the mind. But when the minde is affected as it ought to be, it is scarcely possible, but that it will breake out into outward testifying; and then chiefly if it turne to common disposing, that altogether in openly confessing their sinne should yelde praise of righteousness to God, and every one mutually exhort other with their example.

publicly, than among private men, howsoever it be common, as is already said. Therefore as touching the discipline whereof we now entreate: so oft as we must make supplication to God for any great matter, it were expedient to command fasting together with prayer. So when the Antiochians laied hands upon Paul and Barnabas, that they might the better commend to God their ministry which was of so great importance, they joined fasting with prayer. So both they afterward, when they made ministers over Churches, were wont to pray with fasting. In this kind of fasting they had regard to none other thing, but that they might be made furer and more vncombed to pray. Verily this wee finde by experience, that when the bellie is full, the minde is not so lifted vp to God, that it can both with heartie and fervent affection be carried to prayer, and continue in it. So is that to be understood which Luke rehearseth of Anne, that shee surued the Lorde in fastinges and prayers. For he doeth not set the worshipping of God in fasting; but signifieth that the holy woman did after that manner exercise her selfe to continuance of prayer. Such was the fasting of Nehemias when he did with earnestly bent zeale pray to God for the deliverance of his people. For this cause Paul teacheth that the faithful do well, if they abstaine for a time from their wedding bed, that they may the more freely apply prayer and fasting. Where joining fasting to prayer in stead of a helpe, he putteth vs in minde that it is of no value but so farre as it is referred to this ende. Again, when in the same place hee giueth a rule to married folkes, that they shoule mutually render good will one to another, it is plaine that hee doeth not speake of daily prayers, but of such prayers as require a more earnest intentituensesse.

17 Again, if either pestilence, or famine, or warre beginne to range abroad, or if any calamitie otherwise seem to hang over any country & people; then also it is the duty of Pastors to exhort the Church to fasting, y they may humbly beseeche the Lord to turne away his wrath. For hee giueth warning that he is prepared and in a manner armed to revenge, when hee maketh any danger to appeare. Therefore as accused men in time past with long hanging beard, with vncombed hair, with blacke array, were wont humbly to abase them selues, to procure the mercie of the judge: so when we are accused before the judgement seate of God, it behoueth both for his glory, & for common edification, and also is profitable and heaith full for vs, that we shoule in piteous array easte to escape his feueruite. And that this was vset among the people of Israel, it is easie to gather by the words of Joel. For when he commandeth a trumpet to be sounded, the congregation to be gathered together, fasting to be appointed, and the rest that follow: he speakest of thinges received in common custome. Hee had a little before said, that examination is appointed of the wicked deedses of the people, and had declared that the day of judgement was nowe at hande, and had sumonned them being accused to pleade their cause: then hee crieth out that they shoule haue to sacke cloth and ashes, to weeping and fasting: that is, that they shoule also with outwarde testifyinges throwe themselves downe before the Lord, Sacke cloth and ashes paraduenture did more agree with those times: but there is no doubt that the calling together, and weeping, and and fasting & such like do likewise pertain also to our age, so oft as the state of our things doth so require. For sith it is a holy exercise, both to humble men, and to confess humility, why should we lesse vie it than the olde people did in like necessity? We read that not onely the people of Israel, which were informed and instructed by the worde of GOD, but also the Ninivites which had no doctrine but the preaching of Jonas, fasted in token of sorrow. What cause is there therefore why we should not doe the same? But it is an outwarde ceremonie, which was with the rest ended in Christ. Yea rather even at this day it is, as it alway hath beene, a very good helpe to the faithfull, and a profitable admonition, to stirre vppe them selues, that they should not with to great carolessesse & sluggifhnes more and more prouoke God when they are chastised with his scourges. Therefore Christ when he excuseth his Apostles for that they fast not, doth not say that fasting is abrogate: but he appointeth it to times of calamity, and joineth it with mourning. The time shall come (lafeth he) when the bridegome shall be taken away from them.

18 But that there should be no errour in the name, let vs define what fasting is. For we do not here vnderstande by it only abstinence and sparing in meate and drinke, but a certaine other thing. The life of the godly ought in deede to be tempered with honest sparing & sobrietie, that so neere as is possible it may in the whole course thereof beare a certaine resemblance of fasting. But beside this there is an other fasting for a time, when wee withdrawe any thing of our wotted diet, either for one day or for a certaine time, & do charge our selues with a straiter and seedeer abstinence in diet than ordinance. This consisteth in three things, in time, in qualitie of meates, and in smallnes of quantitie. I meaneth by time, that we should vs those doings fasting, for which fasting is ordained. As for example, if a man fast for common prayer: that he come emptie vnto it. Qualitie standeth in this, that all deintinesse should be abstent, & being content with common and baser meates, we shold not stirre vp appetite with delicates. The rule of quantitie is in this, that we eate more sparingly and lesse than we be wont, only for necessity, and not also for pleasure.

19 But we must alway principally beware, that no superstition crepe vp on vs, as it hath heretofore happened to the great hurt of the Church. For it were much better that there were no vs at all fasting than that it shoude be diligently kept, and in the meanes time be corrupted with false and hurtful opinions, whereunto the world sometime falleth, vnlesse the Pastors do with great faithfulnessse and wisedome prevent it. The first point therefore is, that they shoude alway enforce that which Joell teacheth, that they shoule cut their heartes and not their garmentes: that is, that they shoule admonishe the people, that God doth not greatly esteeme fasting of it selfe, vnlesse there be an inward affection of the hearte, a true misliking of sinne and of himselfe, true humbling, & true sorrow through the feare of God: yea that fasting is profitable for no other cause, but for that it is joyned to these as an inferiour helpe. For GOD abhorreth nothing more than when men in setting signes and an outwarde shewe in stead of innocence of heart, do labor with false color to deceuie themselfes. Therefore Elia most sharply inuoceth against this hypocrite, that the Iewes thought that they had satisfied God, when they had onely fasted, howsoever they did nourish vngodlines and vn-clean thoughts in their heart, is it (faith he) such a fasting which the Lord requireth? and so forth as followeth. Therefore the hypocritical fasting is not only an vnprofitable and superfluous wearying, but also a great abomination.
An other euill neere vnto this is chiefly to be taken heed of, that it be not taken for a meritorious worke, or a forme of worshipping God. For ifth it is a thing of it selfe indifferent, & hath no value but by reason of those endes which it ought to haue respect vnto, it is a most hurtfull superstition, to confounde it with the worke ned of God and necessary of themselves with other respect. Such was in olde time the dotation of the Mani-cheses: whome when Augustine confuteth, he doth plainly enough teache, that fasting is to be judged by no other ends than those which I haue spoken of, and is no otherwise allowed of GOD, vnlesse it be referred to the fame.
The thirde error is in deede not so vngodly, yet it is perillous: to require the keeping of it more precifely and rigorously as it were one of the chiefe ductes, and so to advaunce it with immeasurable praiyes, that men should thinke they have done some excellent thing when they haue fasted. In which behalfe I dare not altogether excuse the olde fathers, but that they haue fowed some seedes of superstition, and giuen occasion to the tyrannie which hath risen since. There are founde in deede sometimes in them founde and wise sentences, of fasting, but afterward we now and then meete with immeasurable praiyes of fasting which aduance it among the chiefe verues.

20 And at that time the superstitious obseruing of lent was eu where grown, in vse: because both the common people thought that they did therein some notable servicie to God, and the Pastors did commende it for a holy following of Chrifi: whereas it is plaine, that Chrift did not fast to prescribe an example to other, but that in so beginning the preaching of the Gosspell, he might in very deede prove that it was not a doctrine of men, but descended from heauen. And it is meruellous, that so grosse an error, which is confuted with so many and so euident reasons, could creepe into men of so sharpe judgement. For Chrift did not fast oft (which hee must needes haue done if he would haue set forth a lawe of yearely fasting) but onely when he prepared himselfe to the publishing of the Gosspell. And he fasted not after the manner of men, as it was meete that hee shoulde haue done if hee would haue prouoked men to followe him: but rather he sheweth an example, whereby he may rather drawe men to wonder at him than stirre them up to followe him. Finally there is none other cause of this fasting, than of that which Mofes fasted, when he receiued the lawe at the hande of the Lorde. For fith that miracle was shewed in Mofes to stablifi the authoritie of the Lawe, it ought not to haue beene omitted in Chrift, least the Gosspell should seeme to giue place to the lawe. But since that time it never came in any mans minde vnnder colour of following of Mofes to require such a forme of fasting in the people of Israel. Neither did any of the holy Prophets and fathers follow it, when yet they had minde and zeale enough to godly exercises. For, that which is sayde of Helias, that hee passed forty daies without mean.
meate and drinke, tended to no other ende but that the people should know that he was stirred vp to be a restorer of the lawe from which almost all Israel had departed. Therefore it was a mere wrongful zeale and ful of superstition, they did set forth fasting with the title & color of following of Christ. Howbeit in the manner of fasting there was then great diuersitie, as Caffiodorus &c. hearceth out of Socrates in the ninth booke of his historie. For the Romanes (faith he) had but three weakes, but in these three there was a continual fasting, except on the Sunday and Saturday. The Saluonians and Grecians had five weakes: other had seuen: but their fasting was by deuided times. And they difagreede no leffe in difference of meates. Some did eate nothing but bread and water: some added herbes: some did not forbeare fishe and fowles: some had no difference in meates. Of this diuersitie Augustine also maketh mention in the latter Epistle to Januarie.

21 Then followed worse times, and to the preposterous zeale of the people was added both ignorance and rudenesse of the Bishops, and a luft to beare rule, and a tyrannous rigor. There were made wicked lawes, which straine confciences with pernicious bonds. The eating of fleshe was forbiddden, as though it defiled a man. There were added opinions full of facriledge one upon another, til they came to the bottome of all errors. And that no peruerse nor should be omitted, they began with a most fonde pretence of abstinence to mocke with God. For in the most exquisit deintines of fare is sought the prayse of fasting: no delicats doe then sufficce, there is never greater plenty, or diueritic or sweetnesse of meates. In such and so gorgious preparation they thinke that they sere God rightly. I speake not howe they never more fowly glutton themselves, than when they would be counted moft holy men. Briefly, they count it the greatest worshipping of God to absteyne from fleshe, and (these excepted) to flowe full of all kinde of deinties. On the other side they thinke this the extreemest vngodlinesse, & such as scarcely may be recompened with death, if a man taft neuer so little a peace of bacon or vnfaucry flesh with browne brecde. Hierome teloth, that AdNepotia even in his time were some with such follies did mock with God: which because they would not eate oyle, caused moft diemt fmeats from euery place to be brought them: yea to oppresse nature with violence, they abstinence from drinking of water, but caufed sweete and costly suppers to be made for them, which they did not drinke out of a cup, but out of a shell. Which faulte was then in a fewe, at this day it is a common fault among all rich me that they fast to no other ende but that they may banket more sumptuously and deintilie. But I will not waft many worde in a matter not doubtfull. Only this I say, that both in fasting and in all other partes of discipline, the papistes so haue nothing right, nothing pure, nothing well framed and orderly, whereby they may haue any occasion to be proud, as though there were any thing remaining among them worthy of praise.

22 There followeth another parte of discipline, which peculiarly belongeth to the clergie. That is contained in the canons which the olde Bishops haue made over themselfes and their order. As these be: y no clearke shoulde glie him selfe to hunting, to dicing, nor to banketting: that none Hhh s. should.

should occupie vtilitie, or marchandisie: that none should be present at wanton dauncings: and such other ordinances. There were also added penalties whereby the authoritie of the canons was established, that none should break them unpunished. For this ende to every Bishope was committted the governement of his owne clergie, that they should rule their clerkes according to the canons, and holde them in their dutie. For this ende were ordeyned yearly overhearings and Synodes, that if any were negligent in his dutie, he should be admonished: if any had offended, he should be punished according to the measure of his offence. The Bishops also theselves had yearly their provincial Synodes, and in the olde time yearly two Synodes, by which they were judged if they had done any thing beside their dutie. For if any Bishope were too haarde or violent against his clergie, they might appeale to those Synodes, although there were but one that complained. The feuerest punishment was that he which had offended should bee remoued from his office, & for a time be depriued of the communion. And because the same was a continual order, they never vfed to dismiss any Synode, but that they appointed a place and time for the next Synode. For, to gather a generall Council, perteined to the Emperour only, as al so old summonings of Councils doe testifie. So long as this seueritie florished, their clerkes did require in word no more of people, than themselves did perform in example & deed. Yea they were much more rigorous to them selues then to the people. And verily so it is meete, that the people should be ruled with a gentler and looser discipline, as I may so term it: but the clerkes should vse sharper judgements amongst themselues, and should lesse beare with themselues, then with other men. How all this is grown out of vse, it is no neede to rehearse, whie at this day nothing can be imagined more vnbredled and dissolute then the clergie, and they are broken foorth to so great licentiousnes, that the whole world crieth out of it. That all antiquitie should not seeme to be utterly buried among them, I graunt indeede that they doe with certaine shadowes deceiue the cies of the simple: but those are such as come no noicer to the auncient manners, than the counterfeitings of an ape approcheth to which men do by reason and aduice. There is a notable place in Xenophon, where he teacheth how sulwly the Persians had swarued from ordinances of their Elders, and were fallen from the rigorous kind of life, to softnes & daintines, yet they couered this shame, saying that they diligently kept ancient visages. For when in the time of Cyrus sobrietie and temperance so far flourished that men needed not to wepe, yea and it was accompted a shame, with posteritie this continued a religious observation, that no man should drawe snottte at his nose thrombles, but it was lawfull to sucke it vp, and secede with in euin till they were rotten the skinking humours which they had gathered by gluttonous eating. So by the olde order it is vnlawfull to bring winepots to the borde: but to will in wine that they neede to be caried away drunken is tolerable. It was ordained to eate but once in a day: this good succesors have not abrogate, but they gaue leave to continue their surfeittings fro mid day to mid night. The custome was that men should make an end of their yeares journey fasting. But it was at libertie and vsedly the custome, for for avoiding of wearinesse, to shorten their journey to two houres. Whence-uer the Papites shall pretende their bastarde rules, to shew themselves to bee like to the holy fathers: this example shall sufficiently reprove their fonde counterfeiting, that no paynter can more liuely expresse it.

23 In one thing they bee too rigorous and vnentreatable, that they giue not leave to Priests to marrie. But howe great libertie there is among them to vs whoredome vnpunished, is not needfull to bee spoken: and bea- ring them bolde vpon their stinking vnmarried life, they have hardened themselves to all wicked doings: But this forbidding doeth plainly shew, howe pestilent all their traditions are, forasmuch as it hath not onely spo- led the Church of good and fitte Pastor, but also hath brought in a hor- rible fincke of mischecues, and thrown many soules into the gulfe of de- peration. Truely whereas marriage hath beene forbidden to Priests, that fame hath beene done by wicked tyrannie, not onely against the worde of God, but also against all equitie. First to forbidde that which the Lorde had left at libertie, was by no meanes lawfull for men. Againe, that GOD hath expressly proydedd by his worde that this libertie shoulde not be bro- ken, is so evident that it needeth no long demonstration. I speake not how Paul in many places willeth a Bishopp to bee the hufbande of one wife. But what coulde bee more vehemently spoken, than where hee pronounceth by the holy Ghost, that there shal be in the last times wicked men that shal forbidde marriage: and hee calleth them not only deceivers, but diuellies? This therefore is a Prophecie, this is a holy Oracle of the holy Ghost, where- with hee willed to arme the Church aforehande against daungers, that the forbidding of marriage is the doctrine of Diuels. But they think they have gayly escaped when they wret this sentence to Montanus, the Tatrans, Enratites, and other olde heretikes. They onely (say they) condemned marriage: but wee doe not condemne it, but debarre the clercie from it, for whome wee thinke it not to bee conveniet. As though albeit this pro- phecie was first fulfilled in those aforesaid men, it might not also bee appli- ed to these: or as though this childlike fonde suttletie were worth the hear- ing, that they say that they forbidde it not, because they forbid it not to all. For it is all one as if a tyrant woulde affirme that it is not an vnjust lawe, with vnjustitce whereof one parte alone of the Citie is oppres- sed.

24 They obiect, that the Priest doeth by some marke differ from the peoplc. As though the Lorde did not also foersee this, with what ornaments Priests ought to excell. So they accuse the Apostle of troubling the order and confounding the comelinesse of the Church, which when hee portray- ed out the absolute forme of a good Bishopp duft set marriage among the other gifts which he required in him. I know how they expound this, name- ly that none is to bee choosen that hath had a second wife. And I grant that this is not a new exposition: but that it is a false exposition, appareth by the text it self, because he by & by after fetteth out of what qualities the wives of Bishops and Deacons ought to be. Paul reckneth marriage among vs vertues of a Bishop: these men teach that it is an intollerable fault in the order of clercie. And, on Gods name, not contented with this generall diipple they call call it in their canons vncleanesse and defiling of the flesh. Let euery man thinke with himselfe out of what workesheppe these things be come: Christ vouchsafteth so to honour marriage that he willeth it to bee an image of his holy conioyning with the Church. What could be spoken more honourably to set out the dignitie of Mariage? With what face therefore shal it be called vnclean or defiled wherein thineth a likenesse of the spiritual grace of Christ?

25 But nowe when their forbidding is evidentlie figheth with the word of God, yet they finde in the scriptures wherewith to defende it. The Leuitical Priestes were bound to lie a snder from their wyues, so oft as it came to their turns to minister, that they might handle the holy things pure & vndefiled. Therefore it were vertic vnconeyly, that our holy things, fishe they be both much more noble and dayly, should be handled of married men. As though there were all one person of the minister of the Gospel, as was of the Leuitical Priesthood. For they, as figures, represented Christ, which being a mediator of God & men should with most absolute purenes reconcile Father vnto vs. But when sinners could not in every behalfe express the figure of his holinesse, yet that they might with certaine grosse draughtes yeeld a shadowe of him, they were commended to purifie themselves beyond the the manner of men, when they came to the Sanctuarie: namely because they then properly figurred Christ; for that as pacifiers to reconcile the people to God they appeared at the tabernacle the image of the heavenly judgement seate. For as much as the Paffors of the Church do not beare this person at this day, therefore they are vainely compared with them. Wherefore the Apostle doth without exception boldly pronounce, that marriage is honorable among all men, but that for whoremongers and adulterers abideth the judgement of God. And the Apostles themselves did with their owne example approue that marriage is not vnmeet for the holinesse of any office be it neuer so excellent. For Paul witnesses that they did not onely kepe wyues, but also caried them about with them.

26 Againe it was a meruellous shamelesneas that they durst set out this comelines of chaftitie for a necessarie thing, to the great reproch of the old Church: which when it abounded with singular learning of God,yet excelled more in holinesse. For if they passe not vpon the Apostles, (as they are wont sometime floutely to delpise them) what I beeche you will they doe to all the olde fathers, whose it is certayne to haue not onely suffered but also allowed marriage in the order of Bishops? They forsooth did nourithe a filthie profaning of holy thinges, forasmuch as fo the mysteries of the Lord were not rightly reverenced among them. It was moued indeed in the Nycene Synode to haue unmarrie life commended: as there alway want not some superstitious men, which doe ever inuent some new thing, to bring themselfes in admiration. But what was decreed? The sentence of Paphnutius was assented to, which pronounced that a mans lying with his owne wise is chaftitie. Therefore marriage remained holic among them: neither did it turne them to any shame nor was thought to spot the ministrie.

gle life grew in force. Hereupon came those often and vnmeasurable advanced prayles of virginicitie, so faintly any other vertue was thought among the people to be compared with it. And although marriage was not condemned for vnclene, yet the dignitie thereof was so diminished, and the holiness of it obscured, that hee seemed not to aspire with a courage strong enough to perfection, that did not refrain himselfe from it. Hereupon came those canons whereby it was first forbidden that they which were come to the degree of Priesthoode should not contract marriage: then, that none should be taken into that order but vnmaried men, or such as did for sake marriage together with their wiuves. These things, because they seemed to procure reuencence to Priesthoode, were (I grant) euen from antiquitie received with great wel lking. But if the aduersaries object antiquitie against me, first I answer that this libertie remained both under the Apostles and in certaine ages after them, that Bis hops might be maried: that the Apostlesthemselves, and other Pastors of great authoritie which succeeded in their places, vfed the same without sticking at it. The example of that ancienter Church ought worthily to be of greater weight with vs, than that we should thinke that to be either vnlawefull or vncomely for vs which was then with prayse received and vfed. Secondly I say that that age which for immeasurable affection to virginicitie began to be partiaall against marriage, did not so lay vpon Priestes the laue of vnmaried life, as though it were a thing necessarie of it self: but because they preferred vnmaried men aboue the married. Finally I answer that they did not so require it that they did with force and necessity constrain them to continence which were not fit to keepe it. For when they punished whoredomes with most seuerelawes, of them that contracted marriage they decreed no more but that they shold give over the execution of their office.

28 Therefore whensoever the defenders of this newe tyranny shal seake the pretence of antiquitie to defende their vnmaried life: so oft we shall answer them with requiring them, that they restore the old chaftnesse in their Priestes: that they remoue adulterers and whoremongers: that they suffer not those in whom they suffer not honest and chaft vse of marriage bed, to run vnpunished into all kinde of lust: that they call againe the discontinued discipline, whereby all wantonnesse may be restrained: that they deliver the Church from this so wicked filthiness, wherewith it hath beneene long deformed. When they have granted this, then they must againe be put in mind that they boast not that thing for necessarie, which being of it selfe at libertie hangeth upon the profit of the Church. Yet I say not this for that I thinke that in any conditiō place is to be giuen to those canons which lay the bond of vnmaried life vpon the order of Priestes: but that the wiser forre may understand with what face our enemies doe censure holy marriage in Priestes by obiecting the name of antiquitie. As touching the fathers, whose writings remaine, even they when they speake of their owne judgement, except Hierome, did not with so great spitefulness deface the honestie of marriage. We shalbe content with one commendation of Chryfoftom: because he, if he was a principall esteemere of virginicitie, can not be thought to have beene more lauith then other in commendation of marriage. Thus he sayth:
But sith some things are by gods goodnesse giuen vs,and other some things by his equitie denied vs: let every man (as Paul commandeth ) haue respect to the measure of grace giuen vnto him. Therefore I doe here meane nothing else, but that vowes must bee tempered to that measure which the Lorde prescribeth there in his giuing: least if thou attempt further than hee permitteth, thou throw thy selfe downe headlong with taking too much vpon thee. As for example. When those murthereers, of whome mention is made in Luke, vowed that they woulde taste of no meate till Paul were slain: although the deuife had not beeene wicked, yet the rashnesse it selfe was not to be suffered, that they made the life and death of a man subject to their power. So Iephthe suffered punishment for his folly, when with headlong heart he conceived an vnadvised vowe. In which kinde vnmarried life hath the cheefe place of mad boldnesse. For sacrificing Priestes, monkes, and Nonnes, forgetting their owne weakenesse, thinke themselves able to keepe vnmarried life. But by what Oracle are they taung that they shall haue chastitie throughout all their life, to the very ende whereof they vowe it? They heare the worde of God concerning the vniuersall state of men. It is not good for man to be alone. They understande, and woulde to God they did not feele, that sinne remaining in vs is not without most sharp pricks. With what confidence dare they shake of that generall calling for all their life long; whereas the gift of continence is oftener granted for a certaine time as opportunitie requireth? In such stubbornnesse let them not looke for God to bee their helper: but let them rather remember that which is said. Thou shalt not tempt the Lorde thy God. And this is to tempe God, to endeavour against the nature put in vs by him, and to despise his present gifts as though they nothing belonged vnto vs. Which they not onely doe: but also marriage, it selfe, which God thought it not against his majestie to institute, which hee hath pronounced honourable in all men, which Christ our Lorde hath sanctified with his presence, which hee vouchsaied to honour with his first miracle, they dare call defiling, onely to aduance with maruellous commendations a certaine vnmarried life of what suffeuer it bee. As though they themselves did not shewe a cleare example in their life, that vnmarried state is one thing, and virginitie an other: which their life yet they most shamelesly call Angelike, doing herein verily too great iniurie to the Angels of God, to whom they compare whoremongers, adulterers, and somewhat else much worse and filthier. And truely here need no arguments when they are openly confuted by the thing it selfe. For wee plainly fee, with howe horrible paines the Lorde doeth commonly take vengeance of such arrogance, and contempt of his gifts by too much trust in themselves. I spare for shame to speake of the more secrete faultes, of which eu'n this that is already perceiued is too much. It is out of controversy that we ought to vowe nothing, that may hinder vs from serving of our vocation. As if a householder shoulede vowe, that he will leve his wife and his children and take other charges in hand; or if hee that is fit to beare office, when hee is chosen doe vowe that he will be a private man. But what is meant by this, that our libertie shoulede not be despised, hath some difficultie if it bee not declared. Therefore thus in fewe words I expounde it. Sith God hath made vs Lords of all things, and hath so made them subject vnto vs that we hold vs them all for our commoditie: there is no cause why we should hope that it shalbe an acceptable worke to God if we yeilde our selues into bondage to the outward things which ought to be a helpe vnto vs. I say this for this purpose, because many do hereby feele praise of humilitie, if they share them- selues with many observations, from which God not without cause willed vs to be free & discharged. Therefore if we will escape this danger, let vs alway remember that we ought not to departe from that order which the Lorde hath ordeine in the Christian Church.

4  Now I come to that which I did set in the thirde place: it is much material with what minde thou makest a vowe, if thou wilt haue it allowed of God. For sith the Lorde regardeth the heart, not the outwarde shewe, it commeth to passe that the selfe same thing, by changing the purpose of the mind, doth sometime please him and is acceptable vnto him, and sometime heily displeaseth him. If thou so vowe the abstaining from wine, as though there were any holinesse in it, thou art superflitious: if thou haue respect to any other ende which is not eui, no man can disallowe it. But in my judgement there be foure endes, to which our vowes shall be rightly directed: of which for teachings sake I referre two to the time past, and the other two to the time to come. To the time past belong those vowes, whereby wee do either testifie our thankfullnesse to God for benefites receiued: or to craue thy turning away of his wrath, wee our selues do punish our selues for the oﬀences that wee have committed. Let vs call the first sort, if you will, the exerci- ses of thanksgiving, the other of repentance. Of the first kinde we haue an example in the thirte which Iacob vowed, if the Lorde did bring him home-safe out of banishment into his countrey. Againe in the olde Sacrifices of the peace oﬀerings, which godly kingses and capaines, when they tooke in hande righteous warre, did vowe that they would pay if they had obtained the victorie, or at least when they were oppressed with any great diﬀerse, if the Lorde had deliuered them. So are all those places in the Psalms to bee understood which speake of vowes. Such vowes may at this day also bee in vs among vs, so oft as the Lord hath deliuered vs either out of any calamity, or from a hard silkenesse, or from any other danger. For it is then not a-gainst the dutie of a godly man, to consecrate to God his vowed oﬀeration, as a solemn token of his reknowned, least he should seeme vnthankful to-warde his goodnesse. Of what sort the seconde kinde is, it shall suﬃce to shewe with one onely familiar example. If any by the vice of gluttonie bee fallen into any oﬀence, nothing withstandeth but that to chastise his intemperance hee may for a time for sake all deintie meates, and may do the same with a vowe adiouned, that hee may binde himselfe with the striater bonde. Yet I doe not so make a perpetuall lawe to them that have likewise oﬀended: but I shewe what is lawfull for them to doe, which shall thinkes such a vowe profitable for themselves. I doe therefore so make such a vowe lawfull, that in the meane time I leaue it at libertie.

5  The vowes that are applied to the time to come, partly (as we have al-readie said) do tende to this end that we may be made the water: & partly

& 56. 13. &
that as it were by certaine spurres we may be pricked forward to our duty.
Some man seeth himselfe to be so inclined to some certaine vice, that in a thing which otherwise is not euill hee cannot temper himselfe from falling soorthwith into an euill; hee shall doe nothing inconueniently if he doe for a time by vowe cut off from himselfe the use of that thing. As if a man knowe that this or that apparell of bodie is perilous vnto him, and yet enticed with desire he earnestly couet it,what can he do better,than if in putting a bridle vpon himselfe,that is in charging himself with necessitie of abstaining from it, he deuier himselfe from all douting? Likewise if a man bee forgetfull or slowe to necessarie duties of godlinesse, why may he not by taking a vowe vpon him both awake his memorie & shake off his slothfulness? In both I graunt that there is a forme of childish schooling:but even in this that they are helpes of weakeenesse,they are not without profyte of the rawe & vn-perfect. Therefore we shall say that those vowe are lawfull which haue respect to one of these ends,especially in outward things,if they both be vphol-den with the allowance of God, and do agree with our vocation, & be meaured by the power of grace given vs of God.
6 Now also it is not hard to gather what is generally to be thought of all vowe. There is one common vowe of all the faithfull,which being made in baptism wee do conforme and as it were stablish by Catechisme and receiving of the Supper. For the Sacramentes are as charters, by which the Lord deliuereth vs his mercie and thereby everlafting life, and we againe on our behalves do promise him obedience. But this is the forme or verify the forme of the vowe, that forsaking Satan we yeld vs foules into service to God, to obey his holy commandements, and to follow the peruerse desires of our flethes. It ought not to be doubted but that this vowe, fith it hath testimonie of the Scripture, yea and is required of all the children of God, is both holy and profitable to salvation. And it maketh not to the contrary, that no man in this life performeth the perfect obedience of the law which God requireth of vs. For fith this forme of covenentant is comprized within the covenent of grace, ynder which is contained both forguenees of sins and the Spirit of sanctification: the promise which we there make is ioyned both with beseeching of pardon and with crauing of helpe. In judging of particular vowe, it is necessarie to keepe in minde the three former rules, whereby wee may safely weye of what sort euery vowe is. Neither yet thinke that I so commend the verie same vowe which I affirme to bee holy, that I would haue them to be daily. For though 1 dare teache no certaine rule of the number or time: yet if any man obey my counfel, he shall take vpon him none but sober and for a time. For if thou oftentimes breake soorth into making of many vowe, all religiuoues will with verie continuance growe out of estimation with thee, and thou shalt come to a bending readinesse to fall into superstition. If thou bind thy selfe with a perpetuall vowe, either for great paine and tediousnesse thou shalt vs do it, or beeing weared with long continuance thou shalt at one time or other, be bolde to breake it.
7 Now also it is plaine with how great superstition in this behalfe the world hath in certain ages past bin possed. One man vowed y hee woulds abstaine.
To Salvation. Lib. 4. 428

abstaine from wine: as though abstaining from wine were of itself a worship acceptable to God. An other bound himself to fasting, another to abstaining from flesh for certaine days, in which he had with vaine opinion fained to be a singular holines aboute the rest. And some things also were vowed much more childish, although not of children. For this was holden for a great wisdome, to take upon them vowed pilgrimages to holier places, and sometime either to go all their journey on foot, or with their body halfe naked, that by their weeres the more merite might be gotten. These & such others, with incredible zeal whereof the world hath a while swelled, if they be examined by those rules, which we haue aboue set, shalbe founde not only vaine & trifling, but full of manifest vngodlines. For howsoever the flesh judge, God abhorreth nothing more than fained worshippings. There are beside this those pertinacious & damned opinions. Ye hypocrits when they haue such trifles think that they haue gotten no small righteousnes: they repose the summe of godlinesse in outwarde obseruations: they despise all other that are lesse carefull of such things.

8 To reckon vp all the particular forms, is nothing to purpose. But forasmuch as the monkish vowes are hadde in greater reverence, because they seeme allowed by the common judgement of the church: of those it is good to speake briefly. First leaff any shoulde by prescryption of long time defende monkery, such as it is at this day, it is to be noted that in old time there was in monasteries a far other order of living. Such as were disposed to exercise themselues to greatest seuerity and patience, went thither. For what maner of discipline they say that the Lacedemonians had vnder the lawes of Lycurgus, such was at that time among the monks, yea and much more rigorous. They slept vpon the ground: their drinke was water: their meate was bread, herbes and rotes: their chiefe deincties were in oyle and eiches. They abstained from all delicate diet and trimming of body. These things might seeme aboue trueth, if they were not written by witnesses that saw & proued them, as Gregory Nazianzen, Basile, and Chryfoftome. But with such introductions they prepared themselues to great offices. For, thay colleges of monks were then as it were the seedeplots of the order of ministeres of the Church, both these whom we haue now named are a prooфе plaine enough, (for they were all brought vp in monasteries and from thence called to the office of bishops) and also many other singular and excellent men in their time. And Augustine sheweth that this was alfo vfed in his time, that monasteries yeelded clerkes to the Church. For hee speakeoth thus to the monks of the Isle of Caprarea: But you brethren we exhort in the Lord, that ye kepe your purpose & continue to the end: and if at any time our mother the Church shall require your travaile, do ye neither with gredy pride take it vp by you, nor with flattering slothfulnesse refuse it: but with meeke heart obey to God. Neither pre ferre ye your owne quiet leasure aboue the necessities of the Church: to whom if no good men would haue ministered in her travaile, you should not haue founde howe you should have beene borne. He speakeoth there of the ministerie, by which the faithfull are spirually borne againe. Also to Aurelius: There is both occasion of falling given to themselues, and most haynous wrong done to the order of the Clergy, if forsakers of monasteries be chosen to the soldiership of the Clergy: when even of those ye remain in the monasteries; we see to take into the Clergy none but the most approved and best. Unless perhaps as the common people say, he is an euill piper but a good fiddler: so it shall also be stedlingly sayd of vs, he is an euill monke, but a good Clerk. It is too much to be lamented, if we lift vp monks into such a rummous pride, and thinke Clerkes worthy of so great reproche, whereas sometime euem a good monke maketh not a good Clerk, if he haue sufficient cotine, and yet want necessarie learning. By these places it appeareth, that godly men were wont with the discipline of monkes to prepare themselves to the government of the Church, that they might the fitter and better instructed take so great an office upon them. Not that they all attained to this end, or yet tended toward it, when for ye most part they were unlearned men: but such were chosen out as weremeet for it.

9 But chiefly in two places he painteth out vnto vs the forme of the olde monkerie. In the booke Of the manners of the Catholike Church, where he seteth the holinesse of that profession against the slaunders of the Manichees: & in another booke he entitled Of the work of monkes, where he inueth against certaine degenderd monkes, which beganne to corrupt that order. I will here so gather a summe of those thinges which he saith, that so near as I may I will vs his owne words. Despifing (saith he) the entisements of this world gathered into one most chaft and holy life, they spende their time together, living in prayers, readings, and disputations, not swelling with pride, not troublesome with stubbornesse, not wanne with enuiousness. None poufeleth any thing of his owne, none is burdensome to any man. They get by working with their handes those thinges wherewith both their body may be fedde, and their minde may not be hindered from God. Their worke they deliuer to them whom they call Deanes. Tho those Deanes despifing all thinges with great carefulnesse make account thereof to one whom they call Father. These fathers not onely most holy in maners, but also most excellent in godly doctrine, hye in all thinges, do with no pride provide for them whom they call children, with great authority of them in comanding, and great willingness of the other in obeying: They come together at the vefl aft time of the day, every one from his dwelling, while they be yet fasting, to heare that Father: and there meete together to every one of those fathers at least three thousand men, (he speaketh chiefly of Egypt, and of the east) then they refresh their body, so much as suffiseth for life and healthfulnesse, every man restraining his desire, not to take largely euem of those thinges that they haue present very spare & vile. So they do not only ab: stain from flesh and wine, so much that they may be able to tame their lusts, but from such thinges which doe so much more greedily provoke appetize of the belly and throte, how much they seeme to other, to be as it were cleaner, by colour whereof the filthy desire of exquisite meats, which is not in flethes, is wont to be fondly and lowly defended. Whatsoever remaineth above necessarie foodes (as there remaineth oftentimes much of the workes of their handes and pinching of their fare) is with greater care distributed to the poore, than it was gotten by them that distributeth it. For they doe in no wise travaille that they may haue abundance of these thinges, but they by all by all meanes endeavour that that which they haue abounding may not remaine with them. Afterward when he hath rehearsed the hardnes, whereof hee himselfe had scene examples both at Millaine and els where: among these things (saith hee) no man is enforced to hard things which hee cannot beare: no man is charged with that which he refuseth: neither is hee therefore condemned of the rest, because hee confesseth himselfe to want strength in following of them: for they remember how much charitie is commended: they remember that all things are cleane to the cleane. Therefore all their diligence watcheth, not to therrefusing of kindes of meate as uncleane, but to tame luft, and to retaine the loue of brethren. They remember, meate for the bellie, and the bellie for meates.&c.Yet many strong do abstaine for the weakes fakes. Many of them haue no neede to do thus; but because it pleaseth them to sustaine theirfelves with balcer diet and nothing sumptuous. Therefore they themfelves, which being in health do not refear, if consideration of their health compell, when they are sicke do take without any feare. Many drinke no wine, & yet they thinke not themfelves defiled with it: for they most gently cause it to be given to the fainter, and to them that cannot get the health of their bodie without it: and some which foolishly refuse it, they do brotherly admonifh that they be not with vaine superstition sooner made weaker than holier. So they diligently exercise godlines: but they knowe that the exercifing of the body pertaineth but to a short time. Charity is chiefly kept, to charitie the diet, to charitie the speech, to charitie the apparel, to charitie your countenance is fittet. They meet and confpire into one charitie. To offend it is accounted as haynous as to offende God. If any refit charitie, he is cast out and shunne. If any ofende charitie, he is not sufferd to abide one day. For as much as in these wordes, as in a painted table, that holy man seemeth to haue set out what maner of life monkerie was in olde time, although they were somewhat long, yet I was content to entercace them her: because I faw that I should haue bene somewhat longer if I had gathered the fame things out of diuerse, how much soever I studied for briefenesse.

10 But my purpose here is not to go through this whole matter, but only by the way to point out, not only what maner of monks the old Church had, but what maner of thing the profefion of monks was at that time: so as the sound witted readers may judge by the comparison, what face they haue which alleage antiquitie to maintaine the present monkerie. Augustine when he depainteth vnto vs a holy & true monkerie, would haue to be absent all rigorous exacting of those things which by the word of the Lord are left vs at libertie. But there is nothing that is at this day more seuerely requir'd. For they count it a mischief that can never be purged, if any do never so little swarde from the prescribed rule in colour or fashion of garment, in kind of meat, or in other trifling & cold ceremones. Augustine stoutly main- De opere taineth, yt it is not lawful for monks to lume idle vpon other mens. He denieth monach. there was euier in his time any such example of a wel ordered monasterie. For if you take idlenes from them, where shalbe y contemplative life whereby they boast they excel all other men, & approch nere vnto Angels? Finally, Augustine requieth such a moniker, as should be nothing but an exercise & help to the duties of godlines which are commended to al Christians. What when he makest charitie the chief, yea & almoost only rule therof, do we thinke y he praiseth a conspiring, whereby a fewe men being bound together, are feuered from y whole bodie of the church? But rather he will eth them w their example to give light to other to kepee the vntrie of y church. In both these points there is so much difference of the monkerie at this present, that a man can scarcely find any thing more vntrie, I wil not say contrary. For our monkes not contented with that godlines, to the studie of which alone Christ commandeth them y are his continually to apply, doe imagine I wote not what new godlines, by meditation whereof they may be perfecter than other.

11 If they denie this, I would know of them why they vouchsafe to give to their owne order alone the title of perfection, and take away the same fro all the callings of God. Neither am I ignorant of that sophistical solution, y it is not therefore so called because it doth containe perfection in it, but because it is the best of all other to attaine perfection. When they are disposed to boast themselves before the people, when to share vnskillfull and vnware yong men, when to maintaine their privilegles, when to aduaunce their own dignitie to the reproch of other, then they boast that they are in the state of perfection. When they are so yne driven that they cannot defende this vaine arrogancie, then they flee to this starting hole, that they have not yet attained perfection, but that they are in the same state wherein they aspire vnto it above other. In the meane time that admiration among y people remaineth, as though the only monkish life were angelike, perfect, and clenched from all fault. By this pretence they make most gainful marketes, but that same moderation lieth buried in a fewe bookees. Who doth not see y this is an intollerable mockerie? But let vs so reason with them, as though they gave no more to their profession than to call it a state of attaining perfection. Verily in giving it this name, they do as by a speciell mark maketh differing from other kinds of life. And who can abide this, that so great honor should be giuen away to an ordinance that is no where by any one yfellable allowed: and that by the same all other callings of God, which are by his owne holly mouth not onely commaunded, but also commended with notable titles of praise, are by the same accounted vnworthie? And how great wrong (I beseech you) is done to God, when I wote not what new found thing is preferred above all the kinde of life ordained by himselfe, and praised by his owne testimonie?

12 But goes, let them say that it is a flander which I have before saide, that they are not contented with the rule prescrib'd of God. Yet though I holde my peace, they themselfes do more than enough accuse themselves. For they openly teach, that they take upon them more burden than Christ laid upon his: because forsooth they promise to kepee the counsels of y gospel concerning louing their enemies, not countinge of revenge, not swearing, &c. To which things Christians are not generally bounde. Herein what antiquitie wil they shewe fowth against vs? This never came in any of the old fathers mindes. They all cries out with one voice that there was no one little worde at al ytered of Christ, which ought not necessarly to be obied.

without any doubting they do everywhere teach, that these very same things by name were commandments, which these good expounders strikingly say, that Christ did but counsel. But forasmuch as we have before taugh't this is a most pestilent errour, let it suffice here to haue briefly noted that the monkeyry which is at this day, is grounded upon the same opinion, which all the godly ought worthily to abhor: which is, that there should be imagined some perfecter rule of life, than this common rule which is given of God to the whole Church. Whatsoever is builded upon this foundation, can not be but abominable.

13 But they bring an other proofe of their perfection, which they think to be most strong for them. For the Lorde sayde to the yong man that asked him of the perfection of righteousnes, If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast and giue it to the poore. Whether they do so or no, I do not yet dispute: but graunt them that for this present. Therefore they boast that they are made perfect by forsaking all theirs. If the summe of perfection stande in this, what meaneth Paul when he teacheth, that he which hath distributed all his goods to the poore, vnleffe he haue charitie, is nothing? What manner of perfection is this, which if charity be absent, is brought with man to nothing? Here they must needs anfwere, that this is the chiefest in deede, but not the only worke of perfection. But here also Paul crieth against them, which stieke not to make charitie the bond of perfection, without any such forsaking. If it be certaine that betweene the master and the discipyle is no disagreement, and the one of them clearly denieth the perfection of man to consist in this that he should forfaie all his goods, and againe affirmeth, that perfection is without it: we must see howe that saying of Christ is to be taken, if thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou haft. Nowe, it shalbe no darke sense, if we wey (which we ought alway to marke in all the preachinges of Christ) to whom these worde be directed. A yong man asketh, by what worke hee shall enter into euerlasting life. Christ, because hee was asked of worke, sendeth him to the lawe, and rightfully: for it is the way of eternal life, if it be consider'd in itselfe, and is no otherwise vnable to bring salvation vnto vs but by our owne peruerseness. By this anwære Christ declared, that he teacheth no other rule to frame life by, than the same that had in olde time bin taught in the lawe of the Lord. So did he both giue witnessinge to the lawe of God, that it was the doctrine of perfecte righteousnes: and therewithall did meece with scoundrels, that hee should not sceme by any newe rule of life to surre the people to forsaikinge the lawe. The yong man beeinge in deede not of an euill minde, but swelling with vaine confidence, aunswered that he had from his childhoode kept all the commandementes of the lawe. It is most certaine that hee was an infinite space distant from that to which hee boasteth that he had attained. And if his boastinge had beene true, he had wanted nothing to the hieft perfection. For wee haue before shewed, that the lawe containeth in it selfe perfecte righteousnes: and the same appeareth hereby that the keeping of it is called the way of eternal salvation. That he might be taugh't to knowe howe little he had profited in that righteousness, which he had too boldely aunswered that he had fulfilled, it was profitable to shewe out a familiar fault of his. When he abounded in riches, he had his heart

Cap. 13. Of the outward means fastened upon them. Therefore because he felt no this secret wound, Christ launced him. Go (sayth he) fell all that thou haft. If he had beene so good a keeper of the lawe as he thought he was, he would not have gone away sorrowfull when he heard this worde. For who so loueth God with all his heart, whatsoeuer disagreeth with the loue of him, he not onely taketh it for dorg, but abhorreth as bringing destruction. Therefore whereas Christ commanded the courteous riche man to leaue all that he hath, it is all one, as if he should commande the ambitious man to forfakke all vlonours, the voluptuous man all delites, and the vnchaft man all the instrumentes of luff. So confciences that are touched with no feeling of generall admonition, must be called backe to the particular feeling of their owne euill. Therefore they do in vaine drawe this speciall case to generall exposition, as though Christ did set the perfection of a man in forsaking of goods: whereas he meant nothing else by this saying, than to drive the yong man that floode too much in his owne concite, to feele his owne sore, that he might understand that he was yet a great way distant from perfect obedience of the lawe, which otherwise he did falsely take upon him. I grant that this place hath bin euill understanded of some of the fathers, and that thereupon grew this coueting of wilfull poverty, whereby they only were thought to be blessed, which forsaking all earthly thinges, did dedicate themselues naked to Christ. But I trust that all the good & not contentious men will be satisfieth with this my exposition, so that they shall no more dout of the meaning of Christ. Howbeit the Fathers thought nothing lefse, than to stablish such a perfection, as hath since bin tramed by the cowled Sophisters, thereby to raise vp a double Christianitie. For that doctrine full of sacrilege was not yet borne, which compareth the profecion of monkerie to Baptisme, yea and openly affirmeth, that it is a forme of seconf Baptisme. Who can dout that the Fathers with al their heart abhorred this blasphemy? Nowe as touching that last thing, which Augustine sayeth to haue bin among the olde Monkes, that is, that they applied themselves wholly to Charity: what neede I to theewe in worde that it is most far from this new profecion? The thing it selfe speaketh, that all they that goe into Monafteries, depart from the Church. For why? Doe not they seuer themselves from the lawfull fellowship of the faithful, in taking to themselues a pecural ministry and private ministration of Sacramentes? What is it to dissole the Communion of the Church, if this be not it? And (that I may follow the comparision which I beganne to make, and may once conclude it) what have they in this behalfe like to the old monks? They although they dwelt seuerally from other men, yet hadde not a seuerall Church: they did partake of the Sacramentes together with other: they appeared at solemnne assemblies: there they were a part of the people. These men, in erecting to themselues a private altar, what have they else done but broken the bond of vniety? For they haue both excommunicate themselues from the whole body of the Church, and haue defiſped the ordinary ministrie, whereby the Lord willed to haue peace & charity kept amog his. Therefore how many ministries there be at this day, I say there be so many assemblies of schisma- tikes, which troubling the order of the Church, are cut of from the lawfull fellowship of the faithful. And this departing should not be secret, they haue giuen

To Salvation.

15 These differences which I haue hitherto rehearsed betweene the old monks and the monks of our age, are not differences in maners, but in the profession it selfe. Therefore let the readers remember that I haue rather spoken, of monkery than of monks, & haue touched those faultes, not which flick in the life of a few of them, but which can not be seuered from their very order of living it selfe. But what difference is in their maners, what neede I particularly to declare? This is certaine, y there is no degree of men more defiled with all filthyneffe of vices: no where more are factions, hatredes, afectiones of parties, ambitions whetter than among them. In deed in a few monastryes they liue chaftly, if it be to be called chaftitie where lust is so farre kept downe that it be not openly euill spoken of: yet a man shall scarcely find every tenth monastery which is not rather a stewes than a holy house of chaftity. But what honest sparing is in their diet? Swine be none otherwise fatted in fities. But least they should complaine that I handle them too vngently, I go no further. Howbeit in those fewe thinges which I haue touched, whosoever knoweth the thing itselfe will confesse that there is nothing spoken accuserlike. Augustine, when according to his testimonie monks exceeded in so great chaftity, yet complaine that there were many vagabundes, which with euill craftes & deceits wiped simple men from their money, which with careing about the reliques of martyrys did vse filthy marchandisinges, yea & in steede of the reliques of martyrys did thewe forth the bones of any other dead men, & which with many fuch wicked doings inflamed the order. As he reporteth that he saw no better men than the which have profited in monastryes, so he lamenteth that he hath seene no worse men than those disprofited in monastryes. What would he say if at this day he saw all monastryes to swell, and in a maner to burst with so many and so deseireed vices? I speake nothing but y which is well knownen to all men. Yet doth not this despise pertaine to all without any exception at all. For as there was noer rule & discipline of living so holily established in monastryes, but that there remained some drones much vnlike the rest: so I doe not so y monks are at this day so run out of kinde from that holy antiquitie, but that they haue yet some good men in their flocke. But they lye hidden a fewe and scattered in that huge multitude of naughty & wicked men: and they are not only despised, but also Lewdly railed at, & sometime cruelly handled of other, which (as the Milesians proverbe is) thinke that there ought to be no place for any honest man among them.

16 By this comparison of the olde and presente monkerie, I trust I haue brought to passe that which I purposed, that it may appeare that our cowled men men do fallly pretend the example of the first Church for defence of their profession: forasmuch as they no leefe differ from them than apes from men. In the mean time I sticke not to declare, that even in that old forme which Augustine comendeth, there is somwhat which little pleaseth me. I grant that they were not superstitious in exacting the outward exercises of rougher discipline, but I say that there wanted not to much affectation & wrongful zeale. It was a goodly thing, forsoaking their goods, to be without earthly carefulnesse: but God more effectueth care to rule a householde goddily, when a holy householder being loose and free from all couerousnes, ambition, & other desires of the fleece, travaileth to this purpose to serve God in a certain vocation. It is a goodly thing to play the Philosopher in wildernesse far from the company of men: but it agreeth not with Christian gentlenesse as it were for hatred of mankind to fly into desert and solitarinesse, & therewithall to forsake those duties which the Lordc hath chiefly commaundeth. Although wee grant that there was no other euill in that profession, yet this verily was no small euill, that it brought an vunprofitable and perillous example into the Church.

17 Nowe therefore let vs see what manner of vowes they be, wherewith monkes at this day are professe into this goodly order. First, because their minde is to institute a newe and fained worshipping to deserve Gods favour: I concluded by the thinges afore spoken that whatsoever they vowe is abhominable before GOD. Secondely without any regard of Gods calling, without any his allowance, they invent for them such a kinde of lyuing as pleaseth them selues. If yee that it is a raftie and therefore an unlawful enterpris: because their conscience hath nothing whereupon it may vpholde it selfe before GOD, and whatsoever is not of faith, is sinne. Moreover when they binde themselues to many peruerse and wicked worshippinges, which the monkery at this day containeth in it. I affirm that they be not consecrate to God, but to the Deuill. For why was it lawfull for the Prophete to say, that the Israelites offered their children to Deuils and not to God: only for this that they had corrupted the true worshipping of God with prophane Ceremonies: and shall it not be lawfull for vs to say the same of monkes, which with their cowle doe put vp themselues a share of a thousande wicked superstitions? Nowe what sortes of vowes are there? They promisse to GOD perpetuall virginitie, as though they hadde bargayned with God before, that he shoulde deliuer them from neede of marriage. There is no caufe why they shoulde alleage, that they do not make this vowe but trusting upon the grace of GOD. For fith hee pronounceth that hee giueth it not to all men, it is not in vs to conceiue a confidence of a speciall giftes. Lette them that haue it, vs it. If at any time they feele themselves to be troubled of their fleexe, let them flie to this helpe by whose onely power they may resit. If they preuaile not, let them not despise the remedy that is offered them. For they by the certaine word of God are called to marriage, to whom power of continence is denied. Continence I call, not whereby the body is onely kept cleane from whoredome, but whereby the minde keepeth chastitie undefiled. For Paules commangeth not onely outwarde wantonesse, but also the burning of the minde, to be auoyded. This (saye they) they) hath from furthest time of memorie beene obscured, that they which woulde dedicate themselves wholly to the Lorde, shoulde binde themselves to the vowe of continence. I graunt indeede that this manner hath also bin of auncient time receiued: but I do not graunt that that age was so free from all fault, that whatsoever was then done must bee taken for a rule. And by little and little this vnperfeafe feueritie crept in, that after a vowe made there was no roome for repentance. Which is evident by Cyprian. If virgins haue of faith dedicate themselves to God, let them continue shamefally, and chastly without any faining. So being strong and steadfast, let them looke for the rewarde of virginitie. But if they will not or can not continue, it is better that they shoulde marrie than with their delights fall into the fire. What reproches woulde they nowe spare to teare him withall, that woulde with such equitie temper the vowe of continence? Therefore they are departed farre from that auncient manner, which will not onely admit no moderation or pardon if any be found vnable to performe his vowe: but they do without all shame pronounce that hee sinneth more greciously if he remedy the intemperance of the fleith with taking a wife, than if he defile both his body and soule with whore dome.

18 But they still enforce the matter, and goe about to shewe that such a vowe was vsed in the Apostles time: because Paul faith that the widowes which haue beene once receiued into the Publike ministerie did marrie, denied their first faith. But I do not deny to them, that the widowes, which bounde themselves and their seruices to the Church, did therewithall take vppon them the bonde of continual unmarried life: not because they reposed any religion therein, as it afterward began to be vsed: but because they could not beare that office but being at their owne libertie and loose from yoke of marriage. But if, when they had once giuen their faith, they looked backe to newe marriages, what was this elles but to flake of the calling of God? Therefore it is no maruell that with such defires he faith that they wake wanton against Christ. Afterwarde to amplifie the matter hee faith, that they doe so not performe that which they haue promised to the Church, that they doe also breake and make voide their first Faith giuen in Baptisme: in which this is comprehended, that every man shoulde answere his calling. Unless perhaps you had rather under stande it thus, that having as it were lost all shame, they did from thence forth cast away all care of honestie, did giue soorth themselves to all wantonnesse and vniclai'tic, and did in licentious and desolute life resemble nothing lefse than Christian women: which sense I like very well. Therefore we answere, that those widowes which were then receiued to publike ministerie, did lay vppon them selves a bond to continue unmarried: if they afterward marrie, wee easly perceiue that that happend to them which Paul speake th of, that calling away shame they became more wanto than besemb Christiain women. That so they not onely finned, in breaking their Faith giuen to the Church, but swarowed from the common law of Godly women. But first I denye that they did professe unmarried life for any other reason, but because marriage agreed not with the ministerie which they took in hand: and I deny that they did bind themselves at al to single life, but so far as necessity of their vocatio did here.
Againe I doe not grant that they were so bounde, but that it was then also better for them to marrie, than either to be troubled with the prickinges of the fleete, or to fall into any vncleanenesse. Thirdly I say that that age is appointed of Paul, which is commonly out of danger: specially if hee com-mandeth the onlye to be chosen, which contended with one marriage haue alreadye hewed a token of their continencie. And wee doe for no other reason disallowe the vow of vnmarried life, but because it is both wrongfully taken for a service of God, and it is rashly vowed of them to whome power of continence is not giuen.

19 But howe was it lawfull to drawe this place of Paul to Nunnes? For there were created deaconisses, not to delight God with singing & with muf-bling not understonded, and live the rest of their time idle: but they should execute publike minimisation towards the poore, that they should with all studie, carnestnes and diligencie, endeavour themselves with the duties of charitie. They did not vowe unmaried life, to yeeld therby any worship to God because they abfeyned from marriage: but onely because they were thereby the more uncombed to execute their office. Finally they did not vowe it, either in the beginning of their youth, or yet in the midst of their flowing age, that they might afterwarde learne too late by experience into howe great a headlong dowe fall they had thrown themselves: but when they seemed to have passed all danger, then they vowed a no lesse safe than holy vowe. But (not to enforce their first two pointes) I say it was not lawfull to haue women received to vowe continence before the age of three score yeares: forasmuch as the Apostle admitteth onlye women of sixtie yeares: olde, and commandeth the younger to marrie and bring forth children. Therefore neither that releas made of 12. yeares, and then 20, and afterwarde of thirtie yeares, can bee any way excused: and much lesse is it tolerable, that fillie maides, before that they can by age knowe themselves, or haue any experience of themselves, are not onely trained by fraud, but contrayned by force and threateninges to put on those cursed snares. I will not tary vpon confuting the other two vowes. Onely this I say: beside this that they be intangled with not a fewe superstitious, (as the matter is noweadies) they seeme to be made to this purpose, y they which vow them should mocke both God & men. But leaft we should seeme too maliciously to shake vp every smal parcel, we will be content with that general confusion which is aboue let.

20 What manner of vowes be lawfull and acceptable to God, I think is sufficiently declared. Yet because sometime vnskilfull and fearefull con-sciences, even when they mislike or disallow any vowe, do noterthelesse doubt of the binding, & are greuellously tormented, when they both dread to break their faith given to God, & on the other side they feare least they shold more sin in keeping it: where they are to be siccouerd, that they may, winde themselves out of this distresse. But, to take away all doubt at once: I say all vowes being not lawfull, nor rightly made, as they are nothing worth before God, so ought to be voide to vs. For if in contractes of men those promises only do bind, in which he with whom we contract, wold haue vs bound: it is an absurditie, that we should be driven to ye keeping of those things which God doth not not require of vs; specially sith our works are no otherwise right, but when they please God, & when consciences have this testimonie that they please him. For this remaineth certaine, whatsoever is not of faith, is sinne. Whereby Paul meaneth, that the works which is taken in hande with doubting, is therefore faultie, because faith is the roote of all good works, by which we are assured that they be acceptable to God. Therefore if it be lawfull for a Christian man to doe about nothing without this assurede: if by fault of ignorance they haue taken any thing in hande, why should they not afterward give it over when they be delucred from errors? Sith vowes vnadvisedly made are such, they do not only nothing bind, but are necessarily to be vndone. Yea what if they are not onely nothing esteemed, but also are abominable in the sight of God, as is aboue shewed? It is needless to discorde any longer of a matter not needfull. This one argument seemeth to mee to bee enough to pacifie godly consciences and deliuer them from all doubt: y whatsoever works do not flow out of the pure fountaine and bee not directed to the lawfull end, are refused of God: and so refu'd that he no leffe forbidde vs to goe forward in them, than to beginne them. For hereupon followeth, that those vowes which proceede of error and superstition, are both of no value before God, and to be forsoaked of vs.

21 Moreover he that shall know this solution, shall haue wherewith he may defende against the flanders of the wicked, them that depart from monerie to some honest kind of life. They are greucousely accused of breach of faith and perjurie, because they haue broken (as it is commonly thought) the insoluble bonde wherewith they were bound to God and to the Church. But I say, there was no bond, where God doeth abrogate which man confirmed. Moreover, admitting that they were bond, when they were holden intangled with not knowing of God: and with error: nowe since they are lightened with the knowledge of the truth, I say that they are therewithal free by the grace of Christ. For if the croffe of Christ have so great effectuallnesse, that it looseth vs from the curse of the law of God, wherein we were holden bound, how much more shall it deliuer vs from forcine bonds, which are nothing but the snaring nets of Satan? To whomsoever therefore Christ shineth with the light of his Gospell, it is no doubt that he looseth them from all snares which they had put upon them through superstition. Howbeit they want not yet an other defence, if they were not fit to live unmarried. For if an impossible vow be a sure destrucfiō of the soule, whom the Lord would haue saied and not destroyed, it followeth that we ought not to continue therein. But howe impossible is the vowe of continence to them that are not indued with a singular gift, wee haue already taught, and experience speaketh it though I holde my peace. For neither is it unknownen with howe great filthinesse almost all monasteries doe swarme. And if any of them doe come honest, and more shamefast than the rest; yet they are not therefore chaft because they suprress and keepe in the fault of vncharitie. So verily God doth with horrible examples take vengeance on the boldnes of men, which forgetting their owne weakenes doe against nature couet that which is denied them, and disposing the remedies which the Lorde had giuen them at hande, doe tru't that they can with stubbornesse and obstinacie overcome:

The outward meanes of the disease of incontinence. For what else shall we call it but stubbornesse, when one being warned that he needeth marriage, and that the same is giuen him of the Lord for a remedy, doth not onely despise it, but also bindeth himselfe with an oath to the despising of it?

The xxxiii. Chapter.

Of Sacramentes.

Besides the preaching of the Gospell, and other helpe of like force is in the Sacramentes: of which to haue some certaine doctrine taught, is much behooueful for vs, whereby we may learne both to what end they were ordained, and what is nowe the use of them. First it is mee to consider what is a Sacrament. It seemeth to mee that this shall bee a plaine and proper definition, if wee say that it is an outward signe, wherewith the Lorde sealeth to our consciences the promises of his good wil toward vs, to sustaine the weaknesse of our Faith: and we againe on our behalves doe testifie our godlinesse toward him as well before him and the Angels as before men.

We may also with more breuenesse define it otherwise: as to call it a testimonie of Godes favoure toward vs confirmed by an outward signe, with a mutual testifying of our godlinesse toward him. Whetherfouer you choose of these definitions, it differeth nothing in sense from that definition of Augustine, which teacheth that a sacrament is a visible signe of a holy thing, or a visible forme of inuisible grace: but it doeth better and more certainly expresse the thing it selfe. For whereas in that breuenesses there is some darknes, wherein many of the vnskilfuller sorte are deceived, I thought good in more words to giue a fuller sentence, that there should remaine no doubt.

2. For what reason the old writers vsed this worde in that sense, it is not hard to see. For so oft as the old tranlatter would render in latine this greek worde Mystereion mysterie, specially when divyne matters were intreated of, hee tranlated it Sacrament. So to the Ephesians, That hee might make knowne vnto vs the Sacrament of his will. Againe, if yet ye haue heard the distribution of the grace of God, which is giuen to mee in you, because according to revelation the Sacrament was made knowne to me. To the Colossians, The mystery which hath bin hidden from ages & generations, but now is manifested to his Saints, to whom the Lord would make knowne the richesse of this Sacrament. &c. Againe, to Timothee, A great Sacrament of godlinesse: God is openly shewed in the flesh. He woulde not say a secrete, least he should be seene to say somewhat under the greatnessse of the things. Therefore hee hath put Sacrament in stead of Secretes, but of a holy thing. In that signification it is sometime found among the ecclesiastical writers. And it is well enough knowne, that those which in Latine are called Sacraments, in Grecce are Mysteries: which expressing of one thing in two feuerall wordes endeth all yet contention. And hereby it came to passe that it was drawne to those signes which had a reuerende representation of hie and spirituall things. Which Augustine also note he in one place. pertaine to divine things, are called Sacramentes.

3 Nowe of this definition which wee haue set, wee understande that a Sacrament is never without a promise going before it, but rather is adjoined as a certaine addition hanging to it, to this ende that it shoule confirm and seale the promise it selfe, and make it more approoved vnto vs, yea after a certaine manner ratified. Which meane the Lorde foreseeeth to be needeful first for our ignorance and dulnes, and then for our weaknesses and yet (to speake properly) not so much to confirm his holy worde, as to stablishe vs in the Faith thereof. For the truth of God is by it selfe founde and certaine enough, and cannot from any other where receive better confirmation than from it selfe. But our Faith, as it is small and weake, vnlesse it be stayed on every side, and bee by all meanes vp held. is by and by shaken, staggereth, yea and fainteth. And herein verily the merciful Lorde according to his great tender kindenesse tempereth himselfe to our capacitie: that whereas we be natural men, which alway creeping upon the grounde and sticking fast in the flesh, doe not thinke nor so much as conceiue any spirituall thing, hee vouchfaeth even by these earthly elements to guide vs vnto himselfe, and in the flesh it selfe to set forth a mirror of spirituall things. For if we were vnbodyd, (as Chrysostome faith) he would haue giuen vs the verie same thinges naked and vnbodyd. Now because we haue foules put within bodies, he giueth spirituall thinges vnnder visible things. Not because there are such gifts planted in the natures of the things which are set forth to vs in the Sacraments; but because they were signed by God to this signification.

4 And this is it which they commonly say, that a Sacrament consisteth of the worde and the outward signe. For wee must understande the word to bee, not that which being whispered without meaning and faith, with one ly noise as it were with a magicall enchantment hath power to consecrate the element: but which being preached made vs to understand what the visible signe meaneth. Therefore that which was vsially done vnder the tyrannie of the Pope, was not without a great profaning of the mysteries. For they thought it ynowe, if the Prieft, while the people stoode amasedly gazing at it without understanding, did mumble vp the forme of consecration. Yea they of fer purpose provided this, that no whit of doctrine shoulde thereof come to the people: for they spake all things in Latine before vnlearned men. Afterwarde superstition brake out to farre, that they beleued that the consecration was not formally made, vnlesse it were with a hoarse whispering founde which fewe might heare. But Augustine teacheth farre other wise of the Sacramentall worde. Let the worde (faith hee) bee added to the element, and there shal be made a Sacrament. For whences commeth this so great strength to the water, to touch the body and wash the soule, but by the worde making it? not because it is spoken, but because it is beleued. For in the verie worde it selfe the founde which paffeth is one thing, and the power which abideth is an other. This is the word of Faith which wee preach, saith the Apostle. Wherupon in the Actes of the Apostles it is faide, by faith cleansing their hearts. And Peter the Apostle saith, So baptism alfo faueth vs not the putting away of the filthines of the flesh,

Hom. 6c. & popul. Rom. 10. 8. Lib. 4. 427
Of the outward means

The word of faith which we preach: by which without doubt, that it may be able to cleanse, Baptiz'me alfo is halowed. You see howe it requireth preaching, whereupon faith may grow. And we neede not to trauel much in provid'ce hereof, forasmuch as it is cleare what Christ did, what he commanded vs to doe, what the Apos'tles followed, what the purer Church observed. Yea euen from the beginning of the worlde it is known, that so often as God offered any signe to the holy fathers, there was added an vnseparable knot of doctrine, without which our senses should be made ashamed with bare beholding. Therefore when wee heare mention made of the Sacramental word, let vs understand the promife, which being with a loude voice preached of the minifter, may leade the people thither as it were by the hande, whither the signe tendeth and directeth vs.

5 Neither are some to bee heard which trauel to fight against this, with a double horned argument rather little than sounde. Either (say they) wee knowe, or we knowe not, that the wordes of God which goeth before the sacrament, is the true will of God. If wee knowe it, then wee learne no newe thing of the sacrament which foloweth after. If we know it not, then neither will the sacrament teach it, whose whole force standeth in the word. Where-into let this briefly be for an anwser: th[e]t the seals which are hanged at patentes and other publike instrumentes, taken by themselues are nothing, forasmuch as they should be hanged in vaine if the parchment had nothing written in it: yet they doe not therefore not confirme and seal that which is written, when they are added to writings. Neither can they say that this similitude is lately fained by vs, which Paul himselfe vied, calling Circumcision a seal, where he purposely traueltheth to prooue, that Circumcision was not righteousnes to Abraham, but a sealing of that covenant, by faith wherof he had already beene justifie before. And what, I beseech you, is there may much offend any man, if we teach ye the promife is sealed with sacramentes, when of the promifes themselves it is evident that one is confirmed with an other? For as euery one is manifest, so is it more fit to vpholde faith. But the Sacramentes doe both bring most clear promifes, and have this peculiar more than the word, that they lively represent them to vs as it were painted out in a table. Neither ought that distinction any thing to moue vs, which is wont to bee objected, between Sacraments and seals of parents: that whereas both consist of carnall elements of this worlde, those can not suffice or be meet to seal the promifes of God, which are spiritual & everlafting, as there are wont to be hanged too, for sealing of the grants of Princes concerning fading and fraile things. For a faithful man, when the sacramentes are present before his eyes, liceth not in that fleshly sight, but by those degrees of proportion, which I have spok'no, beeth with godly consideration to the he mysteries which lie hidden in the Sacramentes.

6 And fith the Lorde calleth his promisses, covenantes: and his Sacramentes, seals of covenantes: a similitude may well bee brought from the covenantes of men. What can a few killed work, if wordes were not vied: yea vnlesse they wet before? For fowes are many times killed without any more in-inwarde or hier mysteries. What can the giving of a mans right hand doe, ifth often times handes are matched with enmities? But when wortes have gone before, by such signes the lawes of leagues are stablished, although they were first conceived, made, and decreed in wortes. Therefore Sacramentes are exercises which make the credit of the worde of God certainer vnto vs; and because we are carnall, they are deliuered vnder carnall things, that so they shoule instruct vs according to the capacitie of our dulnesse, and guide vs by the hande as schoolmasters guide children. For this reason Augustine calleth a Sacrament, a visible worde; because it reprenteth the promises of God as it were painted in a table, & setteth them before our sight cunningly expressed & as in an image. Other similitudes also may be brought, where by Sacraments may be more plainly set out, as if wee call them pillers of our Faith. For as a biling standeth and resteth vpon the foundation; yet by setting vnder of pillers, it is more sorely stablished: so, Faith resteth vpon the worde of God, as vpon a foundation: but when Sacramentes are added, it staith yet more soundly vpon them as vpon pillers. Or if wee call them looking glasse, in which wee may beholde the richesse of the grace of God, which he giueth vs. For (as we have alreadie said) he doeth in them manifestly the he himselfe to vs, so much as is giuen to our dulnesse to knowe, and doeth more expressly testifie his good will and loue toward vs than by his worde.

7 Neither do they reason sittly enough to the purpose, when they laboure to prove hereby, that they are not testimonies of the grace of God, because they are also giuen to the wicked, which yet do thereby feele God no thing more favorable to them, but rather procure to themselves more grievous damnation. For by the same argument neither shoulde the Goodelle, which is heard and despised of many, be the testimonie of the grace of God: nor yet Christ himselfe, which was scene and known of many, of whom verie fewe we receiued him. The like wee may also see in patentes. For a great parte of the multitude laugheth at and scorneth that authentike seale, howsoever they know that it proceeded from the Prince to seale his will withall; some regard it no, as a thing not pertaining to them: some also abhorre it: so that considering this fo egall relation of both, that same similitude which I haue aboue vfed, ought more and more to be liked. Therefore it is certain that the Lorde doeth offer vnto vs mercie and a pledge of his grace both in his holy worde and in the Sacraments: but the same is not receiued but of them which receive the worde and Sacraments with sure faith, like as Christ is offred of the Father vnto faulation, to all, yet he is not acknowledged and receiued of all. Augustine in one place minding to declare the same, saide that the effectuallnesse of the worde is shewed forth in the Sacrament; not because it is spoken, but because it is believed. Therefore Paul, when hee speaketh to the faithfull, so entreateth of Sacraments that he included the communion of Christ in them, as when he faith: all ye that are baptised, haue put on Christ. Againe, we are all one bodie and one Spirit, which are baptised in Christ. But when hee speaketh of the wrongfull use of Sacramentes, he giueth no more to it than to colde and voide figures. Whereby hee signifieth, that howsoever the wicked and hypocrites with their puerilities do either oppress or darken or hinder the effect of the grace of God in the Sacraments, yet that withstandeth not but that where and so oft as it pleaseth God, both they may bring a true testimonie of the communicating of Christ, and the Spirit of God himselfe may deliuer and perform that which they promise. We determine therefore that Sacraments are truely called testimonies of the grace of God, and as it were certaine scales of the good will which he beareth toward vs; which by sealing it vnto vs, doe by this meane sustaine, nourish, confirm, and encreas our faith. As for the reasons which some are wont to object against this sentence, they are too trilling and weake. They say that if our Faith be good, it cannot be made better: for they say that it is no Faith, but which without shaking, fledfailely, and with out withdrawing, resteth vpon the mercie of God. It had beene better for such to pray with the Apostles that the Lord would encrease their Faith, than carelessly to pretend such a perfection of faith, which never any of the sonnes of men hath obtained, nor any shall obtaine in this life. Let them answer, what manner of faith they thinke that hee had which said: I beleue the Lord, helpe my vnbelieuingnesse. For euën that faith, howsoever it was but a begon faith, was a good faith, and might bee made better when vnbelieuingnesse were taken away. But they are confuted by no certaine argument then by their owne conscience. For if they confess themselves sinners, (which whether they will or no they cannot deny) they must needs impute the fame to the imperfection of their faith.

Mar. 9.24.

Act. 8.37.

8 But (say they) Philip aunswered the Eunuch, that he might be Bap tized, if he beleued with all his hart. What place here hath the confirmation of Baptisme, where faith filleth the whole heart? Again I ask them whether they do not feele a good part of their heart voide of faith: whether they do not daily acknowledge newe encreases. The heathen man gloried that he waxed old with learning. Therefore we Christians be thrife miserable, if we waxe olde with profiting nothing, whose faith ought to go forward by all degrees of ages, till it growe into a perfect man. Therefore in this place to beleue with all the heart, is not perfectly to beleue Christ, but onely from the heart and with a syncre minde to embrace him: not to be full with him, but with fervent affection to hunger, and thirst, and sigh toward him. This is the maner of the Scripture, to say that that is done with the whole heart, which it meaneth to be done syncrely and hartily. Of this sort are these sayings: I have in all my hart sought thee: I will confesse to thee in al my heart, and such other. As on the other side, where he rebuketh guilefull and deceitfull men, he saith to reprove them with heart and heart. Then they say further, that if faith be encreased by Sacraments, the Holy Ghost is giuen in vaine whose strength and worke it is to begin, maintaine, and make perfect faith. To whom in deed I graunte, that faith is the proper & whole worke of the Holy Ghost, by whom being enlightened wee know God and the treasure of his goodnesse, and without whose light our minde is so blind, that it can see nothing, so fenslethe, that it can smell nothing of spirituall things. But for one benefit of God which they set forth, we consider three. For first the Lord teacheth & instructeth vs with his wordes: then he strengtheneth vs with Sacraments: last of all he shineth into our minde with the light.
light of his holy Spirit, and openeth an entry for the word and Sacraments into our hearts, which otherwise should but strike our cares, & be present before our eyes, and nothing more the inwards partes.

9 Wherefore as touching the confirmation and increas of faith, I would have the reader warned (which I think: I have already in plaine words expressed) that I do as assigne that ministration to the Sacraments, not as though I thought that there is perpetually in them I wore not what secret force, by which they may of themselves be able to further or confirm faith: but because they are ordained of the Lord to this end, that they should serve to the establishing and increas of faith. But then only they do truly performe their office, when that inward schoolmaster the Spirit is come to them, with whose onely power both the heartes are peeced, and affections are moved, and the entrie is set open for the Sacramentes into our soules. If he be absent, Sacraments can do no more to our minds, than if either the brightness of the Sunne should shine upon blinde eyes, or a voyce founde to daufe cares. Therefore I do make division betweene the spirit and sacraments, that the power of working remaine with the spirit, and to the sacramentes bee left onely the ministration, yea, and the same voide and trifling without the working of the spirit: but of much effectualnesse, when hee inwardly worketh and putteth forth his force. Nowe it is plaine in what forre according to this sentence, a godly minde is confirmed in the faith by sacraments: that is to say, euyn as the eyes see by the brightness of the Sunne, and the cares are by the founde of a voyce: of which neither the eyes shoulde any whit perceive any light, vnlesse they had a sight in themselves that might naturally be enlightened: and the cares should in vaine be knocked at with any crying whatsoever it were, vnlesse they were naturally made and fitte to heare. But if it bee true, which ought at once to bee determined among vs, that what the spirit worketh in oure cyes to seeing of the light, what the hearing worketh in our cares to the perceiuing of a voyce, the same is the worke of the holy Ghost in oure heartes, both to the conceiuing, and susteining, and cherishing and stablising of faith: then both these things doe likwise followe: that the sacramentes doe nothing at all profite without the power of the holy Ghost: and that nothing withstandeth but that in heartes already taught of that schoolmaster, they may make faith both stronger and more increas of. Onely this difference there is, that the power of hearing & seeing is naturally set in our cares and eyes: but Christ before the measure of nature doth by speciall grace worke the same in our mindes.

10 Whereby those objections also, which comber some men, are dissolved: That if we ascribe to creatures either the increase or confirmation of faith, there is wrong done to the Spirit of God, whom wee ought to acknowledge the onely aucthor thereof. For neither doe we in the mean time take from him either the praise of confirming or increasing it: but rather we affirme, that euyn this that he encreaseth and confirmeth faith, is nothing else but with his inward enlightening to prepare our mindes to receive that confirming which is set forth by the sacraments. But if it be yet too darkly spoken, it shalbe made very cleare by a similitude which I will bring. If thou purpose with wordes to persuade a man to doe any thing, thou wilt...

Search out all the reasons, whereby he may be drawn to thy opinion, and may be in a manner subdued to obey thy counsel. But thou hast hitherto nothing prevailed, vnlesse he likewise have a percing & sharp judgement, whereby he may wee what pith is in thy reasons; vnlesse also hee have a tractive wit and ready to harken to teaching; finally vnlesse he have conceited such an opinion of thy faithfullnesse and wisedome, as may be to him like a certaine forjudgement to cause him to subscribe. For both there are many stubborne heads, which a man can never bowe with any reasons; and also where credite is suspected, where authoritie is despised, little good is done even with the willing to learn. On the other side let all those things be present, they will truely bring to passe that y hearer, to whom thou giest counsell, will obey the selfe same counsels which otherwise he would have laug hed to scorne. The same worke also the Spiriite worketh in vs. For least the worde should beate our eares in vaine, leat the Sacramentes shoulde strike our eyes in vaine, hee sheweth vs that it is God which speaketh therein, hee softeneth the stubborne of our heart, and frameth it to the obedience which is due to the worde of the Lorde. Finally he conueceth those outward words and Sacramentes from the eares into the soule. Therefor both the word and the Sacraments do confirme our faith, when they set before our eyes y good will of the heauenly father toward vs, by knowledge of whom both the whole faithesfaines of our faith standeth fast, & the strenght of it encreaseth: the spirit confirmeth it, when in engraving the same confirmation in our minds he maketh it effectuall. In the meane time the father of lights can not bee forbidden, but as he enlighteneth the bodly eyes with the beames of the sunne, so hee may enlighten our minde with Sacramentes, as with a brightnesse let meane betweneve.

Which propertie the Lord taught that there was in his outward word, when in the parable he called it seede. For as seede, if it fall vpon a deserte and untilled piece of ground, wil do nothing but die: but if it be throwen vpon arable lande well manured and tilled, it will bring forth her fruit with very good encreafe: so the word of G O D, if it light vpon a stiffe necke, it will grow barren as that which is sowne vpon sand: but if it light vpon a soule manured with the hande of the heauenly Spirite, it will be most frutesfull. But if there be like reafor of seede and of the worde: as wee say that out of seede corne both springeth and encreaseth, and groweth vpte to ripeness: why may wee not saye that faith taketh out of the worde of G O D both beginning, encreafe, and perfection? Paul very well expresseth both these things in sundry places. For when hee goeth about to put the Corinthians in remembrance how effectually God vied his travaile, he glorieth that he hath the ministerie of the Spirite, as though the power of the holy Ghost were with an vnseparable knot joyned with his preaching, to enlighten and thoroughly moue the minde. But in an other place when he mindesth to admonish them, of what force the worde of God is of it selfe being preached by man, he compareth the ministers them selves to husbandemen, whiche when they have bestowed their labour and travaile in tilling the earth, have no more to do, But what should tilling, and sowing, & watering profit, vnlesse that which is sowne should receive luclinesse by heauenly benefite? Therefore Therefore he concludes, that both he that planteth and he that watereth are nothing: but that all things are to bee ascribed to God, which alone giveth the increase. Therefore the Apostles do in their preaching utter the power of the Spirit, so farre as God vseth the instruments ordained by himselfe to the setting forth of his spiritual grace. Yet we must kepe still that distinction, that we remember, what man is able to do by himselfe, and what is proper to God.

12 Sacraments are so confirmations of our faith, that many times where the Lord meaneth to take away the confidence of the very things that are by him promised in the Sacraments, he taketh away the sacramentes themselves. When he spoyleth and thruifteth away Adam from the gift of immortality, he faith: Let him not cate of the fruites of life, leaft he live for euer.

What faith he? Could that fruite restore to Adam his vncorruption, from which he was now fallen? No. But this is all one as if he had saide: Leaft he should enjoy a vaine confidence if he keepe still the signe of my promise, let that be shaken away from him which might bring him some hope of immortalitie. After this manner when the Apostle exhorteth the Ephesians to remember that they were forieignes of the testaments, strangers from the fellowship of Israel, without god, without Christ, he faith, that they were not partakers of Circumcision. Whereby he doth (by figure of transmigration) signifyeth that they were excluded from the promise itself, which had not received the signe of the promise. To their other objection, that the glory of God is conteynd to creatures, to whom much power is ascribed, & that thereby it is so farre diminished, we haue in redinese to answere that we set no power in creatures: One ly this we say, that God vseth neanes and instruments, which he himselfe feeth to be expediente: that all things may serve his glory; forasmuch as he is Lorde and judge of all. Therefore as by bread and other nourishments he feedeth our body: as by the sunne he enlighteneth the world: as by fire he warmeth; yet neither bread, nor the sunne, nor fire, are any thing but so farre as by those instruments he doeth distribute his blessings vnto vs: so spiritually he nouriseth faith by the Sacramentes, whose onely office is to fet his promises before our eyes to be looked vpon, yea to be pledges vnto vs of them. And as it is our dutie to fasten none of our affiance in other creatures, which by the liberalitie and bountifulnesse of God are ordained to our vs, and by the ministerie whereof he giueth vs his gifts, nor to have them in admiration, & praise them as caufes of our good, so neither ought our confidence to sticke fast in the Sacramentes, nor the glorie of God to be remoued vnto them: but leaving all things, both our faith and confession ought to rise vp to him the author both of the sacraments and of all things.

13 Whereas some bring an argument out of the verie name of a Sacrament, it is nothing strong. A Sacrament (say they) whereas it hath among allowed authors many significations, yet it hath but one which agreeeth with the signe: that is, whereby it signifieth that solene othe which the soldior maketh to his capitaine when he entreth into profession of a soldior. For as by that othe of warfare new soldiors do bind their faith to the capitaine, & professe to be his soldiers: so by our signes we professe Christ our capitaine.
and do testifie that we serue under his banner. They ad similitudes to make thereby the matter more plaine. As a gowne made the Romanes severally known from the Greeks which did wear clokes: as the verie degrees of men at Rome were disterrned by their severall signes: the degree of Senators from the degree of knightes, by purple cote & piked shoes: againe a knight from a commoner, by a ring: so wee beare our signes that may make vs severally known from prophane men. But by the things aboe saide it is euident enough that the olde writers, which gave to the signes the name of Sacraments, had no regarde how this worde was vfed among Latine writers, but for their owne purpose fained this new signification, whereby they signified onely holy signes. But if wee will search the matter more deeply, it may seeme that they haue with the same relation applied this worde to such a signification, wherewith they haue removed the name of faith to that senie wherein it is nowe vfed. For whereas faith is a trueth in performing promises: yet they haue called faith an affurredneffe, or sure persuasion which is had of the trueth itselfe. Likewise whereas a Sacrament is the soldiours part whereby he voweth himselfe to his captaine: they haue made it the capitaines parte, whereby he receiveueth soldiours into roomes of seruice. For by the Sacrament the Lorde doth promise that hee wil bee our God, and that wee shall be his people. But wee passe ouer such suttelties: for asmuch as I thinke I haue proued with arguments plaine enough, that they had respect to nothing else but to signifie that these are signes of holy and spirituall things. We receive in deede the similitudes which they bring of outarde tokens: but wee allowe not that that which is the last point in the sacramentes, is by them set for the chiefe, yea and onely thing. But this is the first point, that they should serue our faith before God: the later point that they should testifie our confession before men. According to this later consideration those similitudes have place. But in the meantime let that first point remaine: because otherwise (as we haue alreadie proued) the mysteries should be but colde, vnlesse they were helps to our faith, & additions to doctrine ordered to the same vfe and ende.

14 Againe we must be warned, that as these men doe weaken the force, and ytterly overturne the vfe of sacraments: so on the contrarie side there be some, which fain to sacraments I wote not what secret vertues, which are no where red to be put in them by God. By which errour the simple and vnskilfull are dangerously deceived, while they are both taught to seeke the gifts of God where they cannot be found, & are by little and little drawn away from God, to embrace mere vanitie instead of his veritie. For the Sophistical schooles have taught with great content, that the Sacramentes of the newe lawe, that is to say those which are newe in vfe in the Christian Church, do justify and giue grace, so that we do not lay a stoppe of deadly sinne. It cannot be expressed howe pernicious and pestilent this opinion is, and so much the more, because in many ages heretofore, to the great losse of the Church it hath prevailed in a great part of the world. Truely it is ytterly diuertiſh. For when it promiseth righteousnes without faith, it driueth soules headlong into deſtruction: then because it feteth the cause of righteousnes from the sacraments, it bindeth the miserable mindes of men alreadie readie of their owne accord to much bending to the earth, with this super-stonition that they rather rest in the sight of a bodily thing than of God himselue. Which two things I wold to God we had not so proued in experience, so little neede they any long prooue. But what is as sacrament taken without faith, but the most certaine destruc[n]ion of the Church? For whereas nothing is to be looked for thereof without the promise, &: the promise doeth no lesse threaten wrath to the vnlawful, than it offreth grace to the faithful: he is de-ceued that thinketh that there is any more giuen to him by the sacraments, than that which being offred by the word of God, hee receueth by faith.
Whereupon another thing also is gathered,  the assurance of salvation hangeth not vpon the partaking of the sacrament, as though justification con-lisht therein: which we know to be reposed in Christ only, and to be communicated vnto vs no lesse by the preaching of the Gospel, than by the see-ling of the sacrament: and that without that it cannot wholly stand. So true is that which Augustine also writeth,  that invisib[le sanctification may be without a visible signe, and againe that a visible signe may be without true sanctification. For (as he also writeth in another place,) men do put on Christ som-time vntill the receiuing of a sacrament, sometime euin vntill the sanctification of life. And that first point may be common both to good and to euill, but this other is proper to the good & godly.

15 Hereupon cometh that distinction if it be well vnderstanded, which the same Augustine hath often noted, between a sacrament, and the thing of the sacrament. For it not onely signifieth, that the signe and truth are there contained, but that they do not so hang together, but that they may be sacred: and that euin in the verie conioyning the thing must alway be discerned from the signe, that wee giue not to the one that which belongeth to the other. He speaketh of the separation, when he writeth that  sacraments do worke in the onely elect that which they figure. Again[e, when he writeth thus of the Iewes: When the sacramentes were common to all, the grace was not common, which is the power of the sacramentes. So nowe also the washing of regeneration is common to all: but the grace it selfe, whereby the members of Christ are regenerate with their head, is not common to all.
Again[e, in another place of the Supper of the Lorde, We also at this day receive visible meate. But the sacrament is one thing, and the power of the sacrament another thing. What is this, that many receive of the altar and dy, and in receiuing do dy? For the Lordes morsef was poifon to Iudas: not because he received an euil thing, but because he being euill received a good thing euilly. A lude after: The sacrament of this thing, that is of the vnite of the bodie and blood of Christ, is somewhere prepared on the Lordes table daily, somewhere by certaine distances of dayes: and thereof is receiued vnto life to some, and vnto destruction to some. But the thing it selfe whereof it is a sacrament, is receiued vnto life to all men, but vnto destruction to no man, whoseoeuer is partaker of it. And a litle before hee had saide, He shall not dy which eateh: but he which partaketh to the power of the sacrament, not to the visible sacrament, which eateh within, not without: which eateh with heart, not he which preefteth with tooth. Thus you heare euery where, that a sacrament is so seuered from his owne truth by the unworthiness of the receiver, there remaineth nothing but a vaine and unprofitable figure. But if thou maist have nor a signe void of true: but the thing, the signe, thou must conceiue by faith the word which is there enclosed. So how much thou shalt by the sacraments profite in communica ting of Christ, so much profite shalt thou take of them.

16 If this be somewhat darke because of the shortnes, I will set it out in mo wordes. I say that Christ is the matter, or (if thou wilt) the substance of all sacraments: forasmuch as in him they haue all their perfection, and do promise nothing without him. So much leffe tolerable is the error of Peter Lombard, which doth expressly make them causes of righteousnesse and salva tion, whereof they be partes. Therefore bidding all causes farewell which manks wit dooth faie to it selfe, we ought to stay in this one cause. There dowhere how much wee be by their miniftere holpen to the nourishing, confirm ing, and encreasing of the true knowledge of Christ in vs, and to the pos sessing of him more fully, and to the enjoying of his riches, so much effes tualnesse they haue with vs. But that is done when wee doe with true faith receiue that which is there offered. Do the wicked then (wilt thou say) bring to passe by their vnthankfulnesse, that the ordinances of God be void and turne to nothing? I anfwer that that which I haue faide, is not fo to be ta ken, as though the true and trueth of the sacrament did hang vpon state or will of him that receiueth it. For that which God hath ordind remain eth steadfast and keepeth still his nature, however men do varie. But sith it is one thing to offer, another to receiue: nothing withstandeth but that the signe halowed by the worde of God may be in deed that which it is cal led, and kepe his owne force: and yet that there come thereby no profite to an euil doer and wicked man. But Augustines dooth in sewe wordes well afforde this question. If (saith he) thou receiuest carnally, it causeth not to be spirituall: but it is not to thee. But as Augustine hath in the aforesaid pla tes shewed that a sacrament is a thing nothing worth, if it be seuered from the trueth thereof: so in another place he giueth warning that euin in the vere conioyning needeth a distinction, least we sticke too much in the out ward signe. As (saith he) to followe the letter, and to take the signes in ceede of the thinges, is a point of a femelle weakenesse: so to expound the signes unprofitably is a point of euill wandring error. Hee nameth two faultes which are here to bee avoided: The one when we so take the signes as though they were giuen in vaine, and when with abasing or diminishing their secreete significations by our enuiousnesse, we bring to passe that they bring vs no profite at all. The other, when in not raising our mindes be yond the visible signe, wee giue away to the sacrament the praise of all those good things which are nor giuen vs but of Christ onely, and that by the Holy Ghofte, which maketh vs partakers of Christ himselfe: and in deed by the helpe of the outward signes: which if they allure vs to Christ, when they bee vRESTED an other way, the whole profite of them is unworthily o uerthrown.

17 Wherefore let this remaine certaine, that there is no other office of the sacraments than of the worde of God: which is to offer and set foorth Christ vnto vs, and in him the treasures of heavenly grace: but they auail or profite nothing, but being receiued by faith: even as wine, or oyle, or any other liquor, though you powre it on largely, yet it will run beside and perish, vnlesse the vesseles mouth be open to receiue it, and the vesseill though it bee wettte rounde about on the outside, shall never the lesse remaine empie and voyde within. Befide this we must beware, leaft those things which haue bin written by the olde writers somewhat too gloriously to amplifie the dignitie of sacramentes, should leade vs away into an error neere to this: namely that we shoulde thinke that there is some secret power kniue and fastened to the sacramentes, that they may of them selues giue vs the graces of the holy Ghost, like as wine is giuen in a cup: whereas onely this office is appointed to them by God, to teftifie and stablish to vs the good will of GOD towardes vs, and doe profite no further vnlesse the Holy Ghost ioyne himselfe to them, which may open our mindes and heartes, and make vs partakers of this testimonie, wherein also doe clerely appeare divers and seuerall graces of God.

For the sacramentes, as we haue abowe touched, are that thing to vs of God, which to men are messengers of joyfull things, or earnestes to stablishing of bargaines: which doe nor of themselues giue any grace, but doe tell and shew vs, and (as they be earnestes & tokens,) do ratifie vnto vs those things that are giuen vs by the liberalitie of God. The Holy Ghost (whome the sacramentes do not in common without difference bring to all men, but whom the Lorde peculiarly giueth to them that be his) is he that bringeth the graces of GOD with him, which giueth to the sacramentes place in vs, which maketh them to bring foorth fruite. But although wee doe nor denye that God himselfe with the most present power of his Spiritie is present with his owne institution, least the ministiration which he hath ordained of the sacramentes should be fruitless and vaine: yet we affirme that the inwarde grace of the Spiritie, as it is seuered from the outward ministerie, so ought to be severally weyed and conside red. God therefore truely performe in deede whatsoever he promiseth and figureth in signes: neither doe the signes want their effect, that the author of them may be proued true and faithfulfull. The question here is onely whether GOD worketh by his owne and by inwarde power (as they call it) or doe resigne his office to outwarde signes. But wee affirme, that whatsoever instrumentes he vs, his original working is nothing hindered thereby. When this is taught concerning the sacramentes, both their dignitie is honorably set out, and their vs is plainly shewed, and their profitableness is abundantly reported, and the best meane in all these things is receiued, that neither any thing bee giuen to them which ought not, nor againe any thing be taken from them which is not convenient to be taken from them. In the meane time that fained deuise is taken away, whereby the cause of justification and power of the holy Ghost is enclosed in elementes as in vesseles or waggons, and that principall force which hath beene omitted of other is exposedly set out. Here also it is to be noted, that God inwarde worketh that which the minister figureth & teftifieth by outwarde doing: leaft that be drawn to a mortall man, which God claimeth to himselfe alone. The same thing also doth Augustine wisely touch. Howe (sayth he) doth both Moses sanctifie, and God? Not Moses for GOD: but Moses with visible sacramentes by his ministerie; but GOD with inuincible grace... grace by his holy Spirit: where also is the whole fruit of visible sacraments. For without this sanctification of invisible grace, what do those visible sacraments profit?

18 The name of sacrament, as we have hitherto entreated of the nature of it, doth generally contain all the signs that ever God gave to me, to certify and assure them of the truth of his promises. Those he sometime willed to remaine in natural things, sometime he delivered them in miracles. Of the first kinde these bee examples, as when he gave to Adam and Eve, the tree of life for an earnest of immortalitie, that they might assure themselves of it, so long as they did eate of the fruite thereof. And when he did set the heavenly bowe for a monument to Noe and his posteritie, that hee woulde no more from thence forth destroy the earth with overfloynig of water. These Adam & Noe had for sacramentes. Not that the tree did give them immortalitie, which it could not give to it selfe: nor that the bowe (which is but a striking backe of a sunbeame vpon the cloudes against it) was offorce to hold in the waters: but because they had a marke grauen in them by the worde of God, that they shoule be examples and scales of his testamentes. And the tree was a tree before, and the bowe a bowe. When they were written vpon with the worde of God, then a newe forme was put into them, that they should beginne to be that which they were not before. That no man shoulde thinke those things spoken without cause, the bowe it selfe is at this this day also a witnes of that covenante, which God made with Noe: which bowe so oft as we beholde, wee reade this promise of God written in it, that the earth shal not ever be destroyed with overfloynig of waters. Therefore if any fond Philosopher, to scorn the simplicitie of our faith, do affirme that such varietie of colours doeth naturally arise of reflected beames and a cloudie settinge against them: lette vs graunt it in deede, but lette vs laughe to scorn his senflessfe follye, which doth not acknowledge God the Lord and gouernour of nature: which at his owne will vseth all the elementes to the feruice of his owne glorie. If he had emprinted such tokens in the sunne, the staries, the earth, stones, and such like, they shoulde all have beene sacramentes to vs. Why are not vncoyneyd & coyned sluer both of one value, sith they are both one metall? even because the one hath nothing but nature: when it is striken with a common marke, it is made money, and receiued a new valuation. And shal not God be able to mark his creatures with his word, that they may bee made sacramentes, which before were naked elementes?

Of the second kinde these were examples, when hee shewed to Abraham a light in a smoking oven: when hee watered the fleece with dewe, the earth remaining drye: againe hee watered the earth, the fleece being untouched, to promise victorie to Gedeon: when he drewe the shadow of the diale lines backward, to promise saetic to Ezecchias. These things, when they were done to relieue and stablish the weakenesse of their faith, were then also sacramentes.

19 But our present purpose is, to discourse peculiarly of those sacramentes, which the Lord willed to bee ordinarily in his Church, to nourish his worshippers and seruantes into one faith and the confession of one faith. For (to vie the wordes of Augustine)men can bee congeled together into no name of religion either true or false, vnlesse they bee bounde togeth er with some fellowship of visible signes and sacraments. Sith therefore the moft good father forefaue this necessitie, he did from the beginning or dene certaine exercises of godlinesse for his seruantes, which afterwa\nd Satan by turning them to wicked and superstitious worshippinges, hath manoy waiues depraued and corrupted.Hereupon came those solemn profession of the gentiles into their holy orders, and other bastarde vpiages, which although they were ful of error and superstition, yet they also were therewith a prooue that men could not in profession of religion bee without such outward signes. But because they neither were grounded vpon the worde of God, nor were referred to that trueth whereunto all signes ought to bee directed, they are unworthie to be rehearsed where mention is made of hy holy signes which are ordained of God and haue not swarued from their foundation, that is, that they shouelde be helpeles of true godlinesse. They connot of bare signes, as were the boawe and the tree, but vpon Ceremonie or rather the signes that be here givien are Ceremonies. But as it is to be saide, that they be on the Lords behalfe testimonies of grace and saluation: so they be againe on our behalfe markes of profession, by which were on-sly swearie to the name of God, for our partes binding our faith vnto him. Therefore Chryfoftome in one place fitly calleth them couenantinges whereby God bindeth him selfe in league with vs, and wee be bounde to purenesse & holinesse of life, because there is made a mutuall forme of couenanting betweene God and vs. For as the Lorde therein promiseth that hee will can-cell and blot out whatsoever guiltines and penaltie we haue gathered by offending, and doth reconcile vs to himselfe in his only begotten Sonne: so we again on our behalfe doe by this profession bind our selves vnto him to the following of godlinesse and innocencie: so that a man may rightly say that such sacramentes are ceremonies, by which God will exercise his people first to the nourishing, stirring vp, and strengthening of faith inwardly, then to y tesifying of religion before men.

20 And euem these sacramentes also were diverse, after the diverse order of time, according to the distribution whereby it pleaseth the Lorde to shewe himselfe after this or that manner to men. For to Abraham and his posteritie Circumcision was commanded whereunto afterward purifyings and Sacrifices, and other Ceremonies were added out of the Lawe of Moses. These were the Sacramentes of the Jews vntill the comming of Christ:
at which comming those being abrogate, two sacramentes were ordered, which nowe the Christian Church vseth Baptisme, and the Supper of the Lord. I speake of those that were ordeyned for the vs of the whole Church.
For as for the laying on of handes, whereby the ministers of the Church are entred into their office, as I doe not unwillingly suffer it to bee called a Sacrament, so I doe not reckon it among the ordinarie sacramentes. As for the rest which are commonly called sacramentes, what they are to bee accounted, wee shall see by and by. Howebeit the olde sacramentes also had respecte to the same marke, whereunto ours doe tende, that is, to direct and in a manner lead by the hande to Christ: or rather as images to represent him, and shewe him forth to be knowen, For whereas wee haue alrea-
die taught, that they are certaine scales wherewith the promises of God are sealed: and where it is most certaine, that there was never offered any promise of God to men but in Christ: that they may teach vs of some promise of God, they must needs shewe Christ. Whereunto pertayneth that heavenly patern of the tabernacle and of the worshipping in the lawe, which was given to Moses in the mount. One onely difference there is, that those did shalowe our Christ being promised, when hee was yet looked for; these doe testifie him already giuen and deliuered.

21. When these things shall be particularly and eche one severally declared, they shall bee made much plainere. Circumcision was to the lawes a signe, whereby they were put in minde, that whatsoeuer cometh of the seede of man, that is to say the whole nature of man, is corrupte, and hath neede of proyning. Moreouer it was a teaching, and token of remembrance whereby they shoulde confirme themselves in the promise giuen to Abraham, concerning that blessed seede in whom all the nations of the earth were to bee blessed, from whome they had their owne blessing to bee loked for. Nowe that healthfull seede (as we are taught of Paul) was Christ, in whom alone they hoped that they shoulde recouer that which they had lost in Adam. Wherefore Circumcision was to them the same thing which Paul faith that it was to Abraham, namely the seede of the righteousnesse of faith: that is to say, the seede whereby they shoulde bee more certainly assured, that their faith, wherewith they looked for that seede, shoulde bee accounted to them of God for righteousnesse. But wee shall vppon a better occasion in another place goe through with the comparison of Circumcision & Baptisme. Baptisings and purifyinges did set before their eyes their owne uncleanesse, filthinesse and pollution, wherewith they were defiled in their owne nature; but they promised an other washing, whereby al their filthinesse should be wiped and washed away. And this washing was Christ, with whose bloode wee being washed doe bring his cleannesse into the sight of GOD, that it may hide all our defillings. Their Sacrifices did accuse them of their owne wickednesse, and therewithall did teach, that it was necessarie that there shoulde bee some satisfaction which shoulde bee paid to the judgement of God. That therefore there should bee some one cheefe Bishoppe, a mediatour betweene God and men, which shoulde satisfie God by shedding of bloode, and by offering of a Sacrifice which shoulde suffice for the forguenesse of sinnes. This cheefe Priest was Christ: hee himselfe shed his owne bloode: hee himselfe was the Sacrifice: for hee offered himselfe obedient to his father vnto death: by which obedience hee tooke away the disobedience of man, which had provoked the displeasure of God.

22. As for our sacramentes, they doe so much more cleerely present Christ vnto vs, as hee was more neerely shewed to men, since he hath minst truly delivered of his father such as hee had beene promised. For Baptisme doeth testifie vnto vs that wee are cleansed and washed, & Supper of thanksgiving testifieth that wee bee redeemed. In water, is figured washing: in bloode, satisfaction. These two things are founde in Christe, which (as John faith) came in water and bloode, that is to say that hee might cleanse and redeeme. Of which thing the spirit of God also is a wunenes. Yea there are three witnesses in one, Water, Bloud, and Spirit. In water and bloud we have a testimonie of cleansing and redeeming; but Spirit the principal witness bringeth vs unto vs assured credit of such witnessing. This hie mysteric hath notably well been shewed vs in the crofe of Chrift, when water and bloud flowed out of his holy side: which side for that caufe Augustine rightfully called the fountain of our Sacramentes: of which yet we must entreat somewhat more at large. There is no doubt but that more plentiful grace also of the Spirit doth here shewe soother it selfe if you compare time with time. For that pertaineth to the glory of the kindom of Chrift, as we gather out of many places, but specially out of the 7. Chapter of Iohn. In which sentence we must take that saying of Paul, that vnder the lawe were shadowes, but in Chrift is the body. Neither is it his meaning to spoyle of their effect the testimonies of grace, in which Gods will was in the olde time to prooue himselfe to the Fathers a true speaker, even as at this day he doeth to vs in Baptisme and in the holy Supper. But onely his purpose was by way of comparison to magnifie that which was giuen to, leaft any should thinke it maruelous, that the Ceremonies of the lawe were abolished by the coming of Chrift.

23 But that same schoole doctrine (as I may also briefly touch this by the way) is utterly to be hilles out, whereby there is noted so great a difference between the Sacramentes of the olde and new law, as though these did nothing but shadowe out the grace of God, and these do presently giue it. For the Apostell speaketh no lesse honorable of these than of these, when he teacheth that the Father did eare the same spirituall meate which we eate, and expoundeth that same meate to be Chrift. Who dare make that an emptie signe, which deliuered to the Iewes a true communion of Chrittes? And the grounde of the cause which the Apostell there handeleth, doeth plainlye fight on our side. For, that no man trusting vpon a colde knowledge of Chrift, and empty title of Christianitie, and outward tokens, should presume to despise the judgemenr of God: hee sheweth forth examples of Gods seueritie to be seene in the Iewes: that we should knowe that the same paines which they have suffrered, hang ouer vs, if wee followe the same faultes. Now that the comparision might be fitt, it behoued that he shoulde shew that there is no vnequalitie betweene vs & them in those good things whereof he did forbidde vs to boast falsely. Therefore first he maketh vs e- quall in the Sacramentes, and leaueth to vs not so much as any small piece of prerogatiue, that might encourage vs to hope of ecapeing unpunished. Neither verily is it lawefull to giue any more to our Baptisme, than he in an other place giueth to circumcision, when he calleth it the seale of the righteousnesse of Faith. Whateuer therefore is at this day giuen vs in our Sacramentes, the same thing the Iewes in olde time receiued in theirs, that is to say, Chrift with his spirituall richesse. What power our Sacramentes haue, the same they also felt in theirs: that is to say, that they were to them seales of Gods good will towards them, into the hope of eternall salvation. If they had bene apt expostors of the Epistle to the Hebrues, they would not have so bene blindered. But when they reade there, that sinnes were not cleansed by the Ceremonies of the lawe, yea that the olde shadowes had no

Of the outwarde means: they neglecting the comparison which is there handled, while they took hold of this one thing, that the lawe of it selfe nothing profited the followers of it, thought simply that the figures were voide of truth. But the Apostles meaning is to bring the ceremoniall lawe to nothing, that it will come to Christ, upon whom alone hangeth all the effectuallnesse of it.

24. But they wil obiect those things which are read in Paul concerning circumcision of the letter, that it is in no estimation with God, that it giueth nothing, that it is vain. For such sayings seeme to preffe it downe farre beneath Baptisme. Not so. For the very same might rightfully bee faide of Baptisme. Yea and also the same is saide, first of Paul himselfe, where he saith that God regardeth not the outwarde washing whereby wee enter into profession of religion, vntil the minde within bee both cleansed and continue in cleanness to the ende: againe of Peter, when he testifieth that the truth of baptism standeth not in the outwarde washing, but in a good witnessing of conscience. But hee seemeth also in an other place vtilly to despiete the circumcision made with hande, when hee compareth it with the circumcision of Christ. I anfwer that even in this place nothing is abated of the dignitie of it. Paul there disputeth against them, which required it as necessarie when it was now abrogate. Therefore hee warneth the faithfull, that leaving the olde shadowes they should stande fast in the truth. These matters (faith he) instantly call vpon you, that your bodies may be circumcised. But ye are spirittually circumcised according to the soule and bodie. Ye have therefore the deluerance of the thing in deed, which is much better than the shadowe. A man might take exception to the contrary and say that the figure is not therefore to be despised because they had the thing in deed: for as much as the putting off of the olde man, of which he there spake, was also among the Fathers, to whom yet outward circumcision had not bin superfluous. He preuenteth this obiection, when he by and by addeth, that the Colossians were buried with Christ by Baptisme. Whereby hee signifieth that at this day Baptisme is the same to Christians, which circumcision was to the old people: and therefore that circumcision cannot bee enjoined to Christians without wrong done to Christ.

25. But that which followeth and which I even nowe allaged, is harder to atioyle, that all the Jewishe ceremonies were shadowes of things to come, and that in Christ is the bodie: but most hard of all is that which is entreated in many Chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrues, that the blood of beasts attained not to consciences: that the lawe had a shadowe of good things to come, not an image of things: the followers of it obtained no perfection of Ceremonies of Moses & such other. I goe back to which I have already touched, that Paul doth not therefore make the Ceremonies shadowish, because they had no found thing in them: but because the fulfilling of them was after a certaine manner hanged in suspense vntill the delivering of Christ. Againe I say that this is to be understood not of the effectuallnesse, but rather of the manner of signifying. For till Christ was manifsetly shewed in the flesh, all the signes did shadowe him out as abson, howsoever hee did inwarde ly vter to the faithfull the presence of his power and of himselfe. But
But this we ought cheerfully to mark, that in all those places Paul doeth not speake simple, but by way of contention. Because he striued with the false Apostles, which would have godlinesse to consist in the Ceremonies only without any respect of Christ: to confute them, it sufficeth onely to intreate, of what value Ceremonies are by themselues. This markes also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes followed. Let vs therefore remember y here is dispursed of Ceremonies, not as they bee taken in their owne and natural signification, but as they bee wrested to a false and wrongfull exposition: not of the lawfull use of them, but of the abuse of superstition. What manuell is it therefore if Ceremonies being seperated from Christ, are vnclad of al force? For all signes whatsoever they be, are brought to nought, when the thing signified is taken away. So when Christ had to doe with them which thought that Manna was nothing else but meat for the belly, he applyeth his speech to their grosse opinion, and faith that he ministred better meat, which may feede soules to hope of immortalitie. But if you require a plainer solution, the summe of all tendeth to this: First, that all that furniture of Ceremonies, which was in the lawe of Mofes, is a vanishing thing and of no value, vnlesse it be directed to Christ. Secondly, that they so had respect to Christ, when he at length was manifestly shewed in the fleas, they had their fulfilling. Finally that it behooved that they should bee taken away by his comming, euenc as a shadowe vanished away in the cleare light of the sunne. But because I doe yet differre longer discourse of that matter vnpo that place where I haue purposed to compare baptisme with circumcision, therefore I doe now more sparingly touch it.

26 Perhappes also those immeasurable praises of Sacraments, which are read in olde writers concerning our signes, deceived those miserable Sophisters. As this of Augustine. That the Sacramentes of the olde lawe did one ly promise the Saviour, but ours doe gie salvation. When they marked not that these and such other forma of speaking were spoken: they also published their excessefull doctrines, but in a clean contrary sense from the writing of olde fathers. For Augustine ment no other thing in y place, than as the same Augustine wrieth in an other place, That the Sacramentes of the lawe of Mofes did foretell of Christ, but ours do tell of him present. And against Faustus. That those were promises of things to be fulfilled, these were tokens of things fulfilled: as if hee should say, that those figured him when hee was looked for, but ours doe as it were shew him present, which hath bin alreadie delivered. Moreover he speaketh of the manner of signifying, as also he sheweth in an other place. The lawe (faith hee) and the Prophets had Sacramentes, foretelling of a thing to come: but the Sacraments of our time doe testify that that is already come, which those did declare to be to come. But what he thought of the thing and effedtualitie, hee expounded in many places: as when he faith, that the Sacraments of the Iewes were in signes, diverse: but in the thing signified, euall with ours: diverse invisible forme, but euall in spiritual power. Again: In diverse signes is all one faith: fo in diverse signes, as in diverse wordes: because wordes chaunge their soundes by times: and truly words are nothing but signes. The Fathers did drinke the same spiritual drinke, for they dronke not the same bodily drinke.
Cap. 15. Of the outwarde means

See ye therefore, Faith remaining one, the signes varied. To them the rocke was Chrift: to vs that is Chrift which is set upon the altar. And they dronke for a great Sacrament, the water flowing out of the rocke: what we drinke, the faithfull knowe. If thou consider the visible forme they dronke an other thing; if an unnderstandable signification they dronke the same spirituall drinke. In an other place, in the mysterie the same is their meate and drinke which is ours; but the same in signification, not in forme: because the same Chrift was figured to them in the rocke, and shewed to vs in the flesh. Howbeit in this behalfe allow we grant that there is some difference. For both sacramentes doe testifie that the fatherly good will of God and the graces of the holy Ghost are offered vs in Chrift: but our Sacraments testifie it more clearly and brightely, in both is a delivering of Chrift: but in these more plenteous and fuller, namely as that difference of the olde and newe Testament beareth, of which we haue entreated before. And this is it that the same Augustine meant (whom we more often allage as the best and faith-fullest witness of all the olde writers) where he teacheth, that when Chrift was revealed, Sacraments were ordeyned both in number fewer, in signification hier, in force more excellent. Of this thing also it is expedient that the readers briefly be warned, that whatsoever the Sophisters haue striftingly taught concerning the worke wrought, is not onely false, but disagree with the nature of the sacramentes, which God hath ordeyned, that the faythfull being voyde and needie of all good thinges shoule bring nothing thither but beggerie. Whereupon followeth that in receiuing them, thse men doe nothing whereby they may deserve praise: or that in doing (which in this their respect is meeere paffiue) no worke can be ascribed vnto them.

The xv. Chapter.

Of Baptisme.

Baptisme is a signe of the entring wherewith we are received into fellowship of the Church, that being graffed into Chrift, we may bee reckned among the children of God. Now it was giuen vs of God to this end, (which I haue taught to be comon to all the mysteries) first, that it should serve to our faith with him, and to our confession before men. Wee will orderly declare the manner of both purposes. Baptisme bringeth three thinges to our Faith, which also must bee feerally intreitted off. This is the first which the Lorde setteth out vnto vs, that it shoule be a token and prooue of our cleansing: or to express mine minde better it is like to a certaine sealed charter, whereby hee confirme vs to, that all our sines are so defaced, cancelled, and blotted out, that they may never come in his sight, not be rehearsed, not be imputed. For he willeth that all they that beleue, should be baptiied into fortiuencesse of sines. Therefore they which thought that bap-tisme is nothing else but a marke and token whereby wee professe our religion before men, as soldiers beare the conuance of their capitaine for maark of their profession, wey not that which was the cheefe thing in Baptisme. That is this, that wee shoule receive it with this promise, that whosoever bebeleeue & are baptised, shall be saued.

2. In this sense is that to be understande which Paul writeth, that the Church is sanctified of Christ her spouse, and cleansed with washing of water in the word of life. And in another place, that we are saued according to his mercie by the washing of regeneration and of the renewing of the holy Ghost. And that which Peter writeth, that baptism saueth vs. For Pauls will was not to signifie, that our washing and saluation is perfectly made by water, or that water containeth in it selfe the power to cleanse, regenerate, & renewe. Neither did Peter meane the cause of saluation, but onely the knowledge and certainie of such gifts to bee receiv'd in this Sacrament which is evidently enough express'd in the worde's themselves. For Paul knitteth together the worde's of life, and baptism of water: as if he had said, that by the Gospel the message of washing and sanctifying is brought vs, by baptism such message is seal'd. And Peter immediatly adiowneth, that that baptism is not the putting away of the filthines of the flesh, but a good conscience before God, which is of Faith. Ye a baptism promiseth vs no other cleansing, but by the sprinkling of the blood of Christ: which is figur'd by water, for the likenesse of cleaning and washing. Who therefore can say that wee be cleansed by this water, which certainly testifieth that the blood of Christ is our true and onely washing. So that from no where else can be fetched a sinner reason to confute their blinde error which referre all things to the power of the water, than from the signification of Baptism it selfe: which doeth withdrawe vs as well from that visible element which is set before our eyes, as from all other meaneas, that it may bind our minde's to Christ alone.

3. Neither is it to be thought that Baptisme is applied only to the time past, that for newe failings, into which we fall backe after Baptisme, we must seek newe remedies of cleansing in I wote not what other Sacramentes, as though the force of Baptisme were worn out of vfe. By this errour it came to passe in olde time, that some would not bee baptised but in the utmost peril of life, and at their last gaspings, that so they might obtaine pardon of their whole life. Against which waywarde sitttle prouison the olde Bishopps so oft inuyed in their wrtings. But thus wee ought to thinke, that at what time soever we be Baptised, we are at once washed and cleansed for all our life. Therefore so oft as we fall we must go back to the remembrance of Baptisme, & therewith we must arme our mind, that it may be alway certaine & assured of the forguenes of sinnes. For though when it is once minisfrd, it seemeth to be past, yet by later sinnes it is not abolisshed. For the cleannes of Christ is therein offer'd vs: that alway florishteth, is oppresst w no spots, but ourwhelmeth & wipeth away all our filthines; yet ought we not to take thereof a libertie to sinne in time to come (as verily we be not hereby armed to such boldnes) but this doctrine is gien onely to them, which when they have sinned, doe groane weried & oppresst under their sinnes, that they may haue wherewith they may raise vp & comfort themselues, leaft they should fall into confusion & desperation. So Paul saith, that Christ was made to vs a propitiat or, vnto the forguenes of faults going before. Wherein he denyeth not, for therein is obtained perpetuall & continuall forguenesse of sinnes. even unto death: but he meaneth that it was given of the Father, only to poor sinners, which wounded with the searing iron of conscience, doeth to the Phisitian. To these the mercie of God is offered. They which by escaping of punishment do hunt for matter & libertie to sinne, do nothing but provoke to them selues the wrath and judgmemt of God.

4 I know in deedethat it is commonly thought otherwise, that by the benefite of repentance & of the keies we do after Baptisme obtaine forgiveneesse, which at our firft regeneration is given vs by only Baptisme. But they which deuise this do erre herein that they do not remember the power of the keies, whereof they speake, doth so hang vpon Baptisme that it ought in no wise to be euere. The sinner receiueth forgiveneesse by the ministrie of the Church, namely not without the preaching of the Gospel. But what manner of preaching is that? That wee be cleansed from sinnes by the bloud of Christ. But what signe & testimonie is there of that washing, but Baptisme? We see therefore how that absolution is referred to Baptisme. And this error hath bred vs the sained Sacrament of penance: of which I haue touched somewhat before, & the residue I will make an end of in place fit for it. But it is no maruelling if men, which according to the grossenesse of their wit were immeasurably fast tied to outward things, haue in this behalf also bewrayed that fault, that not contented with the pure institution of God, they did thrust in newe holpes sained of themselves. As though baptisme it selue were not a Sacrament of repentance. But if repentance be commended to vs for our whole life, the force also of baptisme ought to be extended to the same bounds. Wherefore it is also no dout but that all the godly throughout all their life long, so oft as they be vexed with knowledge in conscience of their owne sinnes, dare call backe themselves to the remembrance of baptism, y thereby they may confirme themselues in the affiance of that only & continuall washing which we haue in the bloud of Christ.

5 It bringeth also another fruite, because it sheweth vs our mortification in Christ, & new life in him. For (as the Apostle saith) wee are baptised into his death, being buried together with him into death, that wee may walke in newnesse of life. By which words he doth not only exhort vs to the following of him (as though he did say, that we are by baptism put in minde, that after a certaine example of the death of Christ, wee should die to our lustes: and after the example of his resurrection, wee should bee raised vp to righteousnesse,) but he fetcheth the matter much deeper: that is to say, that by baptism Christ hath made vs partakers of his death, that wee may bee grafted into it. And as the grafted substance and nourishment of the roote into which it is grafted, so they that receive baptism with such faith as they ought, do truely feel the effectuallnesse of the death of Christ in the mortifying of their flesh: and therewithall also they feel the effect of his resurrection in the quickening of the Spirit. Hereupon he gathereth matter of exhortation: that if wee be Christians, we ought to be dead to sinne, and to live to righteousnesse. This same argument he vseth in another place: that wee be circumcised, and haue put off the olde man, since that wee bee buried in Christ by Baptisme. And in this sense, in the same place which wee haue before allaged, he calleth it the washing of regeneration and of reuinc.
To Salvation. Lib. 4.

Therefore first free forgiveness of sins and imputation of righteousness is promised vs, and then the grace of the holy Ghost, which may reform us into newness of life.

6. Laft of all our Faith receiueth also this profit of baptism, that it certainly testifieth vnto vs, that we are not onely grafted into the death & life of Christ, but that we are so united to Christ himselfe that we are partakers of all his good things. For therefore he hath dedicated and hallowed Baptisme in his owne bodie, that he might have it common with vs, as a more strong bond of the vnitie and fellowship which he vouchsaue to enter into with vs: so that Paul proueth thereby that we are the children of God, because wee have put on Christ in baptism. So we see that the fulfilling of baptism is in Christ, whom also for this reason we call the proper object of baptism. Therefore it is no marueile if it be reported that the Apostles baptized into his name, which yet were commanded to baptize into the name of the Father also and of the holy Ghost. For whatsoever gifts of God are set forth in baptism, are found in Christ alone. And yet it cannot bee, but that hee which baptized into Christ, doe therewithall call vpon the name of the Father and of the holy Ghost. For wee are therefore cleansed with his blood, because the mercifull Father according to his incomparable kindness, willing to receive vs into favour, hath set him a mediatrix in the middest to procure to vs favour with him. But regeneration wee so onely obtaine by his death and resurrection, if being sanctified be the Spirit, we be endued with a newe and spirituall nature. Wherefore both of our cleansing & regeneration: we obtaine and after a certaine maner distinctly perceive the cause in the Father, the matter in the Sonne, and the effect in the holy Ghost. So lohn first baptized, so afterward the Apostles, with the baptism of repentance into the forgiveness of sinsne: meaning by this word repentance, such regeneration: and by forgiveness of sinsne, washing.

7. Whereby also it is made most certaine, y the minifterie of lohn was altogether the same which was afterward committed to the Apostles. For the divers hands wherewith it is ministred, make not the baptism divers: but the same doctrine is veth with it to be the same baptism. lohn and the Apostles agreed into one doctrine, both baptized into repentance, both into the forgiveness of sinsne, both into the name of Christ, from whence was both repentance and forgiveness of sinsne. lohn said y he was the lamb of God, by whom the sinsne of the worldde should be taken away: where hee made him the Sacrifice acceptable to the Father, the propitiator of righteousnes, the author of salvation. What could the Apostles add to this confession? Wherefore let it trouble no man, that the old writers laber to feuer the one from the other, whose voice were ought not so much to esteeme that it may shake the certaintie of the Scripture. For who will rather harken to Chrisfisme denying that forgiveness of sinsne was comprehended in the baptism of lohn, than to Luke contrariwise affirming y lohn preached the baptism of repentance into the forgiveness of sinsne? Neither is that suttilete of Augustine to be receiued, that in the baptism of lohn, sinsne were forgiven in hope, but in the baptism of Christ they are forgiven in deedes. For whereas the Evangelist plainly testifieth, that lohn in his baptism promised the forgiveness of sins: what needest we to abate this title of commendation, when no necessary compelleth vs to it? But if any man seek for a difference out of the word of God, he shall finde none other but this, that John baptized into him that was to come, the Apostles into him that had alreadie presented himselfe.

8 As for this that more abundant graces of the Spirit were poured out since the resurrection of Christ, it maketh nothing to establish a diuersticke of baptisms. For the Baptisme which the Apostles ministred while he was yet conuerfant in earth, was called his: yet it had no larger plentifulness of the Spirit, than the baptisme of John. Yea, even after his ascension, the Spirit was not given to the Samaritans above the common measure of the faithfull before the ascension, although they were baptized into the name of Jesus, till Peter and John were sent vnto them to lay their handes upon them. This onely thing, as I think, deceived the olde writers, that they saide that the baptisme of John was but a preparation to the baptisme of Christ, because they read, that they were baptized againe of Paul, which had once received the baptisme of John. But how much they were herein deceived, shall eie where be plainly declared in place fit for it. What is it therefore that John saide, that he baptized in deed with water, but that Christ should come which should baptize with the holy Ghost, and with fire? This may in fewe words be affoyled. For he meant not to put difference betwene the one baptisme and the other, but he compared his owne person with the person of Christ, saying that himselfe was a minister of water, but Christ was the giver of the holy Ghost, and should declare his power by visible miracle the same day that he shoulde sende the holy Ghost to the Apostles vnder fyrie tongues. What could the Apostles boast of more than this? What more could they also that baptize at this day? For they be onely ministers of the outward signe, and Christ is the author of the inward grace: as the same olde writers themselves do euer where teach, & especielly Augustine, whose principall stay against the Donatiftes is this, that what a one focuer he be, & baptizeth, yet onely Christ is ruler of it.

9 These things which we have spoken both of mortification & of washing, are shadowed out in the people of Israel, where for the same cause the Apostol faith to have bene baptized in the cloude and in the sea. Mortifying was figured, when the Lord delivering them out of the hande of Pharaoh and from cruel bondage, made for them a way through the red sea, and drowned Pharaoh himselfe, and the Egyptians their enemies, that followed them haire at their backes, and were euene in their necks to ouertake them. For after the same maner also he promised to vs in baptisme, and by a signe giuen sheweth vs, that we are by his power brought forth and delivered out of the thrall-dome of Egypt, that is to say, out of the bondage of sinne: that our Pharaoh is drowned, that is to say the diuell, although euene so also he ceaseth not to exercife & wearable vs. But as that Aegyptian was not throwne downe into the bottome of the sea, but being overthrownen on the shore, did yet with terrible fight make the Israelites afraid, but could not hurt them: so this our enemy yet in deed threatenceth, sheweth his weapons, is felt, but cannot overcome. In the cloud was a signe of cleansing. For as then the lord covered covered them with a cloud cast over them, and gave them refreshing cold, Num. xii. 4; least they should faint and pine away with too cruel burning of the sunne: so in baptism we acknowledge our selves covered and defended with the bloud of Christ, least the seueritie of God, which is in deed an intollerable flame, should lie vpon vs. But although this mystical was then darke & knowvn to fewe; yet because there is none other way to obtaine salvation, but in those two graces, God would not take away the signe of them both from old fathers, whom he had adopted to be heires.

10 Nowe it is cleare, how false that is which some have lately taught, & wherein some yet continue, that by baptism we bee loosed and delivered from original sinne, and from the corruption which was from Adam spread abroade into his whole posteritie, and that we bee restored into the same righteousnes and purenes of nature, which Adam should have obtained, if he had stand fast in the same vertuynesse wherein he was first created. For such kinde of teachers never understood what was original sinne, nor what was original righteousness, nor what was the grace of baptism. But wee haue alreadie proved, that original sinne is the peruersitie and corruption of our nature, which first maketh vs guilty of the wrath of God, and then also bringeth forth works in vs, which the Scripture calleth the works of the flesh. Therefore these two points are severally to be marked, namely that we being in all partes of our nature defiled and corrupted are alreadie for such corruption only, holden worthyly condemned & conuicted before God, to whome nothing is acceptable but righteousness, innocencie and cleanness.
Yeа, & verie infants them selves bring their owne damnation with them from their mothers wombe. Who, although they have not yet brought forth the fruites of their iniquitie, yet haue the feede thereof inclosed within them.
Yeа, their whole nature is certaine feede of sinne, therefore it cannot but be hatefull and abominable to God. The faithfull are certified by baptism that this damnation is taken away, and driven from them: forasmuch (as wee haue alreadie faid) the Lord doth by this signe promiseth vs that full and perfect forgiveness is granted both of the fault which should have beene imputed to vs, & of the paine which wee should have suffered for the fault: they take hold also of righteousness, but such as the people of God may obtaine in this life, that is to say by imputation only: because the Lord of his own merce taketh them for righteous and innocent.

11 The other point is, that this peruersitie never ceaseth in vs, but continually bringeth forth new frutes, namely those works of the flesh which we haue before described: none otherwise than a burning fornaice continually bloweth out flame & sparces, or as a spring infinitely cafteth out water. For lust never utterly dyeth & is quenched in men, untill being by death delivered out of the bodie of death, they haue utterly put off themselves.
Baptisme in deede promiseth vs our Pharaoh is drowned, & the mortification of sin: yet not for it is no more, or may no more trouble vs, but onely it may not over come vs. For so long as we lie inclosed within this prison of our body, the remnants of sinne shall dwell in vs: but if we holde fast by faith the promise gien vs of God in baptism, they shall not bear rule nor reigne. But let no man deceive himselfe; Let no man flatter himselfe in his owne
own evil, when he heareth that sinne alway doth in vs. These things are not spoken to this ende, that they should carelessly sleepe vpon their sins, which are other wise too much enclined to sinnen; but onely, that they should not faint & be discouraged, which are tickled & pricked of their flesh. Let them rather thinke that they are yet in the way, and let them beleevé, that they have much profited, when they see that there is daily somewhat unminster'd of their lust, till they have attained that hither whether they travaile, namely to the last death of their flesh, which shalbe ended in the dying of this mortal life. In the meaner time let them not ceaze both to strive valiantly, and to encourage them to go forward, and to stirre them vp to full victorie. For this also ought more to whet on their endeavours, that they see after that they have long travailed, they have yet no small businesse remaining. This we ought to holde: we are baptised into the mortifying of our flesh, which is begun by baptism in vs, which we daily follow; but it shalbe made perfect when we shall remoue out of this life to the Lord.

12 Here we say no other thing, than the Apostle Paul in the seuenth Chapter to the Romanes most clearly setteeth out. For after that he had disputed of free righteouſnes, because some wicked men did therof gather, that we might live after our owne lust, because we should not be acceptable to God by the deseruings of worke: he addeth, that al they that are clothed with the righteouſnes of Christ, are therewith regenerate in Spripte, & that of this regeneration wee have an earnest in baptism. Hereupon he exhorteth the faithfull, that they suffer not sinne to have dominion in their members. Now because he knewe that there is alway some weakening in the faithfull: that they should not therefore be discouraged, he adiouneth a comfort, that they are not vnder the lawe. Because againe it might seeme, that Christians might growe infolent, because they are not vnder the yoke of the lawe, he entreateth what manner of abrogating that is, and therewith what is the vs of the lawe: which question he had nowe the seconde time differed. The summe is, that wee be deliver'd from the rigour of the lawe, that we shalbe cleane to Christ: but that the office of the lawe is, that we being convinced of our peruersenes, shalbe confess our owne weakness and miferie. Nowe forasmuch as that peruersenes of nature doth not so eaily appeare in a prophaneman, which followeth his owne lustes without feare of God: he setteeth an example in a man regenerate, namely in himselfe. Hee saith therefore that he hath a continuall wrestling with the remnants of his flesh, and that he is holden bounde with miserable bondage, that he cannot consecrate himselfe wholly to the obedience of the law of God. Therefore he is compelled with groning to crie out: Unhappy am I. Who shall deliver me out of this body subiect to death? If the children of God be holden captive in prison so long as they live, they must needs be much carefully grieved with thinking vpon their owne peril, ynomise this fear be met withall. Therefore he adiouneth to this vs a comfort, that there is no more damnation to them that are in Christ Iesu. Where he reacheth, that they whom the Lorde hath once receiued into favouer, engrafted into the communion of his Christ, hath by baptism admitted into a fellowship of his church, while they continue in the faith of Christ, although they bee besieged. offinne, yea and carie sinne about within them, yet are acquited from guiltines & condemnation. If this be the simple and natural exposition of Paul, there is no cause why we should seem to teach any new unwonted thing.

13 But Baptisme so serueth our confession before men. For it is a marke, whereby wee openly professeth that we would be accounted among the people of God: whereby we testifie that wee agree with all Christians into the worshipping of one God and into one religion: finally whereby we openly affirme our faith: that not onely our hearts should breath out the prais of God, but also our tongue, and all the members of our bodie shoude sounde it out with such utterances as they be able. For so, as we ought, all our thinges are employed to the seruice of the glorie of God, wherof nothing ought to be void, and other may by our example be stirrèd vp to the same indeitours. Hereunto Paul had respect, when hee asked the Corinthians whether they had not beene baptised into the name of Christ: meaning verily, that eu'n in this that they were baptised into his name, they avowed themselues vnto him, swore to his name, and bounde their faith to him before men, that they could no more confesse any other, but Christ alone, vnlesse they would forfake the confession which they had made in baptisme.

14 Now fith it is declared what our Lorde had regard vnto in the institution of baptisme: it is plaine to judge what is the way for vs to vse and receiue it. For so farre as it is giuen to the raising, nourishing and confirming of our faith, it is to be taken as from the hande of the author himselfe: wee ought to hold it certaine and fully persuaded, that it is he which speaketh to vs by the signe, that it is he which cleanseth vs, washeth vs, and putteth away the remembrance of our sinnes, that it is hee which maketh vs partakers of his death, which taketh away from Satan his kingdom, which fceebleth the forces of our lust, yea which growth into one with vs, that beeing cloathed with him we may be reckoned the children of God: that these thinges, I say, he doth inwardly so truly and certainly performe to our soule, as we certainly see our bodie outwardly so be washed, dipped, and clothed. For this either relation, or similitude, is the most sure rule of Sacraments: that in bodily things we should behold spiritual thinges, as if they were presently set before our eyes, forasmuch as it hath pleased the Lord to reprefent the by such figures: not for that such graces are bound and enclosed in the Sacrament, that they should be giuen vs by the force thereof: but onely because God doth by this token testifie his will vnto vs, that is, that hee will giue vs all these thinges. Neither doth he onely feede our eyes with a naked sight, but he bringeth vs to the thing present, and together fulfilleth that which it signifieth.

15 Hereof let Cornelius the capaine be an example, which was baptised, having before received forgiueneffe of sinnes and visible graces of the holy Ghost: seeking not by baptisme a larger forgiueneffe but a more certain exercising of faith, yea an encreas of confidence by a pledge, Peraduenture some man will object: why therefore did Ananias say to Paul, that he should wash away his sinnes by baptisme, if sinnes be not washed away by the power of baptisme? I aunswere: Wee are saide to receiue, to obtaine, to get that which is farte as concerned the feeling of our faith, is giuen vs of the Lord, whether he do then first testify it, or being testified doth more and certainier confirme it. This therefore only was the meaning of Ananias: that thou might be assured, Paul, that thy finnes are forgiven thee, be baptiised. For the Lorde doth in baptism promise forgienesse of finnes: receiue this, and be out of care. Howbeit I meane not to diminish the force of baptism, but that the thing and the truth is present with the signe, so farre as G O D worketh by outwärde meanes. But of this Sacrament, as of all other, we obtaine nothing but so much as we receive by Fath. If we want faith, it shall be for a witness of our vnthankefulnesthe, whereby we may be declared guity before God, because we have not beleeued the promise there giuen. But so far as it is a signe of our confession, we ought by it to testify that our affiance is in the mercie of God, and our cleaneffe is in the forgienesse of finnes, which is gotten vs by Iefus Christ: and that by it we enter into the Church of Chrift, that wee may with one confente by Fath and charitie live of oncide with al the faithfull. This last pointe didde Paule meane, when he sayeth that we are all baptizd in one Spirtite, that wee may be one body.

16 Nowe if this be true which we determine, that a Sacrament is not to be wedy according to his hande of whom it is ministred, but as of the very hande of God, from whom without doubt it proceeded: hereupon we may gather, that nothing is added to it nor taken from it by the worthynesse of him by whose hande it is delivered. And even as amongst men, if a letter be sent, so that the hand & the seal be well known, it maketh no matter who or what manner of man be the carrier: so it ought to suffice to acknowledge the hande and seal of the Lorde in his Sacramentes, by what carriersoever they be brought. Hereby the error of the Donatiftes is very well confuted, which measured the force and value of the Sacrament by the worthynesse of the ministre. Such at this day are our Carabaptiftes, which denie that wee be rightly baptizd, because we were baptizd by wicked men & idolaters in the popish kingdome: therefore they furiously call vp vs to be baptizd again.
Against whose sullies we shalbe armed with a reason strong enough, if wee thinke that wee were professed by baptism not into the name of any man, but into the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, and that therefore it is not the baptism of man, but of G O D, of whom focuer it be ministred. Although they were never so much ignorant or despisers of God and all godlineffe, which baptizd vs: yet they did not baptizd vs into the fellowship of their owne ignorance or sacrilege, but into the fayth of Iefus Chriſte: because they called not vpon their owne name, but the name of G O D, nor baptizd vs into any other name. Nowe if it were the bap-tizme of God, it hath very enclosed in it a promis of the forgienesse of finnes, the mortifying of the flesh, the spirittuall quickning, and the partaking of Chriſt. So it nothing hindered the Iews, to have beene circumscted of vnclane priests and apostates: neither was the signe therefore voyde, that it needed to bee done of newe: but it was sufficient to returne to the naturall beginning. Where they obiecte that baptism ought to bee celebrate in the assemblies of the godly, that pronoueth not, that that which is faulty in part, should destroy the whole force thereof. For when we teache what:

what ought to be done that baptism may be pure, and yoyde of all defling, we do not abolish the ordinance of God, although idolaters corrupt it. For when in old time Circumcision was corrupted with many superstitions, yet it ceased not to be taken for a signe of grace: neither did Iosias and Ezechias, when they gathered out of all Israel them that had departed from God, call them to a seconde Circumcision.

17 Nowe whereas they aske vs, what faith of ours hath yet followed baptism in certain yeares past, that they might thereby proue that the baptism is voyde, when it is not sanctified unto vs, but by the word of promise received by faith: to this question we aunswere that we indeede being blinde and vnbelieuing, did in a long time not holde fast the promise gien vs in baptism yet the promise it selfe, for as much as it was of God, continued alway stayed, stedfaft, and true. Although all men be liers and faithbreake- kers, yet God ceaseth not to be true: although all men be lost, yet Christ remaineth salvation. We confess therefore that Baptisme, for that time profited vs nothing at all; forasmuch as in it † promise offered vs, without which baptism is nothing, lay nothing regarded. Nowe fith by the grace of God, wee haue begonne to waxe wiser, we accuse our owne blindness and hardneffe of heart, which haue so long beene vnthankesfull to his so great goodnesse. But wee beleuee that the promise it selfe is not vanisshed away: but rather thus we consider, God by baptism promiseth the forguiensesse of sins, and fith hee hath promiseth it, will vn doubtingly performe it to all that beleeue it. That promise was offered vs in baptism: by faith therefore let vs embrace it. It hath indeede long beene buried from vs because of infidelitie: nowe therefore let vs receive it by faith. Wherefore where the Lorde calleth the Jewishe people to repentance, hee giueth them no commandement of a seconde Circumcision, which being (as we haue said) circumcised with a wicked and vngodly hande, lined a certaine time intangled with the same wickednesse. But hee earnestly calleth vpon the oneely turning of the heart. Because, howe foeuer the covenante was broken of them, yet the signe of the covenante, by the ordinance of the Lorde, remained alway stedfaft and inviolable. Therefore with the onely condition of repentance they were restored into the covenante which the Lorde had once made with them in circumcision: which yet being receiued by the hand of a leaguebreaker priest, so much as in them lay, they had defiled againe, and the effect whereof they had quenched.

18. But they thinke that they shake a siny dart at vs, when they alledge that Paul rebaptised them which were once baptised with the baptisme of Iohn. For if by our owne confession, the baptisme of Iohn was altogether the fame that ours is nowe: euens as they hauing beene before peruerely instructeth, when they were taught the true faith, they were againe baptised into it: so that baptisme, which was without true Doctrine, is to be taken for nothing, and we ought to be newly baptised againe into † true religion, where with we are nowe first instructed. Some thinke, that there was some wrongfully affectioned man to Iohn, which had entred them with their first baptism rather to a vaine supetition. Of which thing they seeme to gather a conjecture herveypon, because they confesse themselves to be utterly igno.
 ignorant of the Holy Ghost: whereas John verily would have taught away from himselfe scholers so vntaught. But neither is it likely that the lewes although they had not bee baptised at all, were destitute of all knowledge of the holy Ghost, which is famously spoken of by so many testimonies of the scripture. Whereas therefore they auncien were that they knewe not whether there be a Holy Ghost, it is to be understood as if they had said that they have not yet heard, whether the graces of the Spirit, of which Paul asked them, were given to the Disciples of Chrift. But I grant that that was the true baptisme of John, and all one and the selfe same with the baptisme of Christ: but I denye that they were baptised againe. What then meane these words, they were baptised in the name of Iesu? Some doe expounde it, that they were but instructed of Paul with true doctrine. But I had rather understande it more simple, to bee the baptisme of the holy ghost, that is to say, that the visible graces of the Spiritie were given them by the laying on of handes: which to bee expressed by the name of baptisme, is no newe thing. As on the day of Pentecost it is saide, that the Apostles remembered the wordes of the Lorde, concerning the baptisme of fire and of the spiritie, And Peter faith that the same came to his remembrance, when hee sawe those graces powred out vpon Corneliu, and his householde and kinred. Neither is that contrarie which is after adiowned, When he had laid his handes on them, the Holy Ghost came downe vpon them. For Luke doeth not tell of two diuerse thynge: but followeth the manner of telling commonly vfed among the Hebrewes, which do first propound the subme of the mater, and then doe set it out more at large. Which euer man may perceiue by the very framing together of the wordes. For hee faith, When they had hearde these thinges, they were baptised in the name of Iesu. And when Paul had laide his handes vpon them, the Holy Ghost came downe vpon them. In this latter sentence is describ'd, what manner of baptisme that was. If ignorance doe so corrupte a former Baptisme, that it mueth bee amended with a second baptisme: the Apostles should have bee ne rebaptised first of all, which in whole three yeares after their baptisme, had scarcly taint any small parcel of purer doctrine. And now amonge vs what rivers might suffice to renewe so many washinges, as there be ignorances by the merice of the Lord daily amended in vs?

19 The force, dignitie, profit, and end of the mysterie if I be not deceived, ought by this time to bee plaine enough. So much as concerneth the outward signe, I woulde to God the natural institution of Christ had prevailed so much as was meet, to restraine the boldnes of men. For, as though it were a contemptible thing to bee baptised with water according to the precept of Christe, there is invented blessing, or rather inchaunting, to defile the true salowing of water. Afterward was added a taper with chrisme: but the blowing semeth to open the gate to baptisme. But although I am not ignorant, howe auncient is the beginning of this added packet: yet it is lawful both for me and all the godly to refuse what soeuer thinges men have presumed to adde to the ordinance of Christ. When Satan fawe that by the foolish light credite of the worlde at the verie beginnings of the Gospel his deceits were easie receiued, he brake forth into greater mockeries, Hereupon spitle, ele, and like trifles, were openly brought in with unbridled libertie to the reproch of baptism. By which experiences let vs learne that nothing is either holier, or better, or safer, thar to be content with the authoritie of Christ alone. Howe much better therefore was it, leaving flagellike pome, which dasell the eyes of the simple, and dull their minde, so oft as any was to bee baptized, that he should be present to the assembly of the faithfull, and be offered to God, the whole Church looking on as a witnesse: & praying over him: that the confession of faith should be rehearsed, wherewith he that is to bee catechized shoule be instructed: that the promises shoule be declared which are contained in Baptisme: that the instructed shoule be baptized in the name of the Father, and the Sonne, and the holy Ghost: at length that he be sent away with prayers and thanksgiving. So is nothing omitted that might make to the matter, and that the onely Ceremonie which proceeded from God the author thereof, should most cleerely shine, being not overwhelmed with any forcie filthinesse. But whether he be wholly dipped which is baptized, & that thrice or once, or whether he be but sprinkled with water onely powred vpon him, it maketh very little matter: but that ought to be at libertie to Churches according to the diueritie of countries. Howebeit the very worde of baptizing signifieth to dip, and it is certaine that the maner of dipping was vfed of the old Church.

20. This also perteyneth to the purpose, to know that it is done amisse if private men take vpon themselfes the administration of baptism. For as well the distribution of this as of the Supper is a part of the ecclesiasticall minysterie. For Christ did not commaundde women, nor yet every sort of men, that they shoule baptize; but whom he had ordained his Apostles, to them he gave this commandement. And when he commanded his discipiles to do that in the ministiration of the Supper which they had seen him doe, when he executed the office of a right distributer: he woulde without doubt, that they shoulde therein follow his example. As for this that in many ages past, yea and in a maner at the verie beginning of the Church, it hath beene received in vs, that lay men might baptise in peril of death, if the minifter were not present in time. I fee not with howe strong a reaon it may be defended. The very old fathers themselfes, which either helde or suffered this maner, were not sure whether it were well done. For Augustine seemeth to haue this doubt, when he faith: Although a lay man compelled by necessitie do giue baptism, I can not tell whether a man may godlilly say that it ought to bee iterate. For if it be done when no necessitie compelleth, it is the vifuring of another mans office: but if necessitie enforceth, it is either none or a veniall sinne. More ouer of women it was decreed without any exception in the Counsell at Carthage, that they should not presume to baptize at all. But there is daunger, lest if shee which is sicke shoulde die without baptism, hee shoulde be deprived of the grace of regeneration. Not so, God pronounseth that hee adopteth our infantes to bee his owne, before they bee borne, when he promiseth that hee will be a God to vs and to our seed after vs. In this word is conteined their saluation. Neither that any man dare to bee so reprochfull against God, to denye that his promise is of it selfe sufficient to worke the effect thereof. Howe much harms that doctrine being.
being euill expounded, ye baptisme is of neceffitie to salvation, hath brought in, fewe doe marke: and therefore they take leffe heed to themselves. For where this opinion is grown in force, that all are loft to whom it hath not happened to be washed with water, our state is worse that the state of the old people, as though the grace of God were now more narrowly strengthened than it was under the lawe. For Christ shalbe thought to bee come, not to fulfill the promises, but to abolish them: forasmuch as the promise which then was of it selfe effectuall enough to give health before the eighth day, now shoulde not be of force without helpe of the signe.

21 But houe the custome was before that Augustine was borne, first is gathered of Tertullian, that it is not permitted to a woman to speake in the Church, nor to teach, nor to baptize, nor to offer, that she shoulde not claime to her selfe the execution of any mans office, much leffe of ¥ Priests. Of the same thing Epiphanius is a substantiall witnesse, where hee reprocheth Marcion, ¥ he gaue women libertie to baptize. Neither am I ignorant of their aunswere which thinke otherwise, that is, that common vs much differeth from extraordinarie remedy, when extreme necessitie inforceth: but when he pronouncing that it is a mockerie to give women libertie to baptize, excepteth nothing, it sufficiently appeareth that he commendeth this corruption, so that it is by no color excufable. Also in the third booke, where teaching that it was not permitted euen to the holy mother of Christ, he addeth no restraine.

22 The example of Sephora is unseasonable alleadge. For whereas ¥

Exod. 4. 25. Angel of God was appeased, after that the taking a stone, circumcised her fonne, the ruppon it is wrongfully gathered that her doing was allowed of God. Otherwise it ought to bee faide, that the worshipping which the nations that were brought out of Assyria raised vp, pleased God. But by other strong reasons it is proued, that that which a foolish woman did, is wrongfully drawn to an example of imitation. If I shoulde say that it is a certaine singular case, which ought not to be made an example, & especially ¥ fith it is no where red that in olde time there was gien to the Priests a speciall commandement to circumsife, the order of Circumcision and Baptisme is unlike: this shoulde bee strong enough to confute them. For the wordes of Christ are plaine: Goe ye, teach all nations, and baptize. When hee ordained the selfe same men publishers of the Gospel, and ministers of Baptisme; and none (as the Apostle witnesseth) doeth take honour vpon himselfe in the Church, but hee that is called as Aaron: who soever without lawfull calling baptizeth, hee rutheth into an other mans office. Even in the smallest things, as in meate and drinke, whatsoever we entereprise with a doubtfull conscience, Paul openly cryeth out to bee sinne. Therefore in womens baptizing is much more grievously sinne, where it is evident that they brake the rule appointed by Christ: forasmuch as we knowe that it is vnlawfull to plucke in sunder those things that God coniogneth, But all this I passe over. Onely I woulde have the reader to note, that Sephoraes purpose was nothing leffe, than to doe any feruice to God. Seeing her fonne to bee in danger, she grudged, and murmured, and not without stormaking threwe the foreskinne vpon the ground, she taunted her husband, ¥ she was also angrie gry with God. Finally it is plaine that all this came of a furiousnesse of mind, because she murmured against God and her husband, for that she was compell'd to shed the bloud of her sonne. Moreover if she had in all other things behaved her selfe well, yet herein is an vnexcusable rash presumption; she circumcised her sonne, her husband being present, not any privy man, but Moses the principal Prophet of God, than whom there never rofe any greater in Israel: which was no more lawfull for her to do, than at this day it is for women in the sight of the bishopc. But this controversie shall by and by be easily taken away by this principle, that infants are not debarred from the kindome of heauen, whom it happeneth to depart out of this present life before it be granted the to be dipped in water. But it is already proued that no small wrong is done to the covenante of God, if we do not rest in it, as though it were weake of it selfe; where as the effect thereof hangeth neither vpon baptism, nor vpon any additions. There is afterward added to it a Sacrament like a seale, not that it bringeth effectuallnes to the promise of God as to a thing weake of it selfe, but onely confirmeth it to vs. Whereupon foloweth, that the children of the faithfull are not therefore baptised, that they may then first be made the children of God, which before were strangers from the Church, but rather that they be therefore receiv'd by a solemn signe into the Church, because by the benefit of the promise they did already belong to the body of Christ. Therefore if in omitting the signe there be neither slouthefulnessse, nor contempt, nor negligence, we are free from all danger. It is therefore much more holy, to giue this reverence to the ordinance of God, that we seek among the Sacramentes from no where else, than where the Lord hath left them. When we may not have them of the Church, the grace of God is not so bound to them, but that we may obtain them by faith out of the worde of the Lord.

The xvi. Chapter.

That the Baptisme of infants doth very well agree with the institution of Christ and the nature of the signe.

But forasmuch as in this age, certaine phrentike Spirites have rais'd vp before troubles in the Church for the Baptisme of infants, and doe not yet cease to turmoyle: I can not chose but I must ioyne here an addition to restrain their furiousnesse. If paraduenture it shall seeme to some man to bee very much too long, let him (I beseech him) wey with himselfe, that we ought so much to esteeme the purenesse of doctrine in a most great matter, together with the peace of the Church, that nothing ought to be lothsome receiv'd, which may auail to procure them both. Beside that, I do study to frame this discours, that it shalbe of no small importance to the clearer declaration of the mystery of Baptisme. They affayle the baptism of infants with an argument in deede fauorable in shewe, saying that it is grounded uppon no institution of Christ, but that it was brought in only by the boldnes of men, and peruerse curioufnesse, & then afterwgrave with sondr eausinesse rashly receiv'd in vs. For a Sacrament vnlesse it rest uppon a certaine foundation of the word of God, hangeth but by a thredde. But what if, when the mater matter is well considered, it shall appeare that the Lorde's holy ordinance is falsely and vainly charged with such a slander: let vs therefore search out the first beginning of it. And if it shall appeare, that it was devised by the one ly rashness of men, then bidding it farewell, let vs measure the true observa tion of baptism by the onely will of God. But if it shalbee proued that it is not deffitute of his certaine authoritie, we must beware, least in pinching the holy ordinance of God, we be also flanderous against the author him selfe.

2. First it is a doctrine well enough knowne, and confessed among all the godly, that the right consideration of the signes, consisteth not onely in the outward Ceremonies: but principally hangeth upon the promise, and upon the spiritual mysteries, for figuring whereof the Lorde ordained the Ceremonies themselves. Therefore hee that will perfectly learne of what value baptism is, to what end it tendeth, finally what it is: let him not stay his thoughts upon the element and bodily sight: but rather let him raise it up to the promises of God, which are therein offered vs, and to the inward secrets which are therein representfed vnto vs. He that knoweth these things, hath attained the sound truth of baptism, and the whole substance thereof as I may so call it: and thereby also he shalbe taught, what is the reason, & what is the vfe of the outward sprinkling. Againe hee that contemprouously pass ing over these, shall haue his minde wholly fastened and bound to the visi gle Ceremonie, shall understand neither the force nor propric of bap		-tisme: nor yet so much as this, what the water meaneth, or what vfe it hath.
Whise sentence is proued with so many & so cleare testimonies of Scripture, that we neede not at this present to tarry long about it. Therefore it remain eath nowe, that we seek out of the promises giv'en in baptism, what is the force and nature of it. The Scripture sheweth, that the cleansing of sinnes, which we obtaine of the blood of Christ, is here first shewed: then the morti tifying of the flesh, which standeth upon the partaking of his death, by which the faithfull are regenerate into newnesse of life, yea and into the fellowshipt of Christ. To this same may be referred whatsoever is taught in the Scrip tures concerning baptism: sauing that beside this it is a signe to testifie reli gion before men.

3. But forasmuch as before the institution of baptism, the people of God had circumcision instead thereof, let vs see what these two signes differ the one from the other, and with what likeness they agree together. Whereupon may appeare what is the relation of the one to the other. Where the Lorde gave circumcision to Abraham to be kept, he teleth him before, that he would be God to him and to his seed: adding, that with him is the flow ing store and sufficience of all things, that Abraham shoulde account that his hand shoulde be to him a spring of all good things. In which words the prom isse of eternall life is conteined: as Christ expoundeth it, bringing an argu ment from hence to prove the immortallitie of the faithfull, and the resurrec	-tion. For God (faith he) is not 2 God of the dead, but of the living. Where tfore Paul also sheweth to the Ephesians from what destruction the Lord did deliver them, gathereth by this that they had not beene ad mitted into the covenaut of circumcision, that they were without Christ, with-without God, without hope, strangers from the testaments of the promise: all which things the covenante it selfe conteined. But the first accessse to God, the first entrée to immortal life, is the forgivingnesse of sinnes. Whereupon is gathered, that this forgivingnesse answereth to the promise of baptism conceruing our cleansing. Afterward the Lord taketh covenante of Abraham, he should walke before him in purenesse and innocencie of heart which belongeth to mortifying or regeneration. And that no man shoulde doue; that circumcision is a signe of mortifying; Moses in another place doth more plainly declare it, who he exhorrth the people of Israel, to circumcise the uncircumcised skinne of the hart, because they were severally chosen to be the people of God out of all the nations of the earth. As God, where he adopteth the posteritie of Abraham to his people, commandeth them to be circumcised: so Moses pronounceth that the hartes ought to be circumcised, declaring verily what is the truth of this circumcision. Then that no man should endeuour toward it by his owne strength, he teacheth that they neede the grace of God. All these things are so often repeeted of the prophets, that I neede not to heape into this place many testimonies which do each where offer themselves. We haue proued therefore, that in circumcision a spirituall promise was vterted to the fathers, such as in baptism is giuen: for as much as it figured to them the forgivingnesse of sinnes, and the mortifying of the flesh. Moreover as we haue taught that Christ is the foundation of baptism, in whom both these things remaine: so it is evident that he is also of circumcision. For he is promis'd to Abraham, and in him the blessing of all nations. To the sealing of which grace, the signe of circumcision is added.

4. Now we may easely see, what there is like in these two signes, or what there is differing. The promises, whereupon wee haue declared that the power of the signes consistieth, is all one in both, namely of the fatherly favor of God, of the forgivingnesse of sinnes, of life everlasting. Then, the thing figured also is all one and the same, namely regeneration. The foundation whereupon the fulfilling of these things standeth, is all one in both. Wherefore there is no difference in the inwarde mysterie, whereby the whole force and propertie of the Sacramentes is to be wied. The vnkennesse that remaineth, lyeth in the ouwarde Ceremonie, which is the smalllest portion: whereas the chiefest part hangeth upon the promise and the thing signified. Therefore we may determine, that whatsoever agreeeth with circumcision, doeth also belong to baptism, except the difference of the visible Ceremonie. To this relation and comparison, the Apostles rule leadeth vs by the hande, whereby wee are commanded to examine all exposition of scripture by the proportion of faith. And truely the truth doth in this behalfe almost offer it selfe to be felt. For a circumcision, because it was a certaine token to the Iewes, whereby they were certificed that they were chosen to bee the people and householde of GOD and they agayne on their behalues proffessed that they yielded themselves to GOD, was the first entrée into the Church: so nowe also wee by baptism enter into profession of God, that wee may bee reckoned among his people, and mutually sweare to his name. Whereby it appeareth out of controversy, that baptism is come into the place of circumcision, that it may have the same office with vs.

5 Nowe if we list to search out, whether baptism be lawfully commun icate to infants: Shall wee not say that he doth too much play the fool, yea dote, which will rest onely upon the element of water, and the out ward obseruation, but cannot abide to bend his minde to the spiritual mys terie? Whereas if there be any confideration had, it shall without doubt certainly appeare that Baptisme is rightfully gien to infants, as the thing that is due vnto them. For the Lorde in olde time did not vouchsafe to ad mit them to circumcision, but he made them partakers of all those things which were then signiied by circumcision. Otherwise hee should with mere deceites have mocked his people, if hee had fed them with deceitful signes, which is horrible euens to bee hearde of. For he prounceth expressly, that the circumcision of a little infant should be instead of a seale to seal the pro mise of the couenant. But if the couenant remaine vnbroken and stedfaft, it doth at this day no lesse belong to the children of Christians, than vnder the olde testamant it pertained to the infants of the lewes. But if they bee partakers of the thing signifiied, why shall they be debarred from the signe?
if they haue the truth, why shall they be put backe from the figure? Al though the outherd signe cleaue faft together with the worde in the Sa crament, so that they can not be plucked in sunder: yet if they be seueral ty considered, whether of them, I pray you, shall wee esteeme of more va lue? Truely seith we se that the signe serueth the worde, wee must say that it is vnder it, and must set it in the inferior place. Sith therefore the word of Baptisme is extended to infants; why shal the signe, that is to say, the addition hanging to the worde, be debarred from them? This one reason, if there were no moe, were abundantly enough to confute all them that wil speake to the contrarie. That which is objected, that there was a day cer tainly set for circumcision, is altogether but a shifte. We grant that wee bee not nowe bounde to certayne dayes, like the lewes: but when the Lorde howsoever hee certainly appointeth no day, yet declareth that hee is plea sed that infants shoulde with a solemne formal vifage be received into his co cuenant: what secke we more?

6 Howebeit the scripture openeth vnto vs yet a certainer knowledge of the truth. For it is most euident, that the couenant which the Lord once made with Abraham, is at this day no lesse in force to Christians, than it was in olde time to the Jewishe people: yea and that this word hath no lesse respect to Christians, than it then had respect to the lewes. Vnlesse perhaps we thinke, that Christ hath by his comming diminished, or cut short the grace of his father. Which faying is not without abominable blasphemie. There fore as euens the children of the lewes were called a holy seed, because be ing made heires of the same couenant they were made differing from the children of the vngodly: for the same reason euens yet also the children of Christians are accounted holy, yea although they bee the issue but of one parent faithfull: and (as the Apostile witnesseth) they differ fro the vneckle seede of Idolaters. Nowe when the Lorde immediately after the couenant made with Abraham, commaundde the same to bee sealde in infants with an outward Sacrament: what cause will Christians allage, why they should not at this day testify and seal the same in their children? Neither let any man object against me, that the Lord commanded his covenant to be confirmed with no other signe than of circumcision, which is long agoe taken away. For we haue in readinesse to answere, that for the time of the old testament he ordained circumcision to confirm his covenant; but circumcision being taken away, yet alway remaineth the same manner of confirming which we have common with the Iewes. Wherefore we must alway diligently consider what is common to both, and what they haue severall from vs. The covenant is common, the cause of confirming it is common. Only the manner of confirming is diverse, because circumcision was that to them, in place whereof baptism hath succeeded among vs. Otherwise if the testimonies, whereby the Iewes were assured of the salvation of their seed, be taken away from vs, it should be brought to passe by y command of Christ, that the grace of God should be darker and lese approved by testimonies to vs, than it was before to the Iewes. If that cannot be faide without extreme flander of Christ, by whome the infinite goodness of the Father hath more clearely and liberally than ever heretofore beene pou red forth vpon the earth, and declared to men: wee must needes grant, that it is at the least not more pinchingly to bee suppresed, nor to bee set forth with lese testimonie, than it was vnder the darke shadowes of the law.

7 Wherefore the Lorde Iesus, minding to shewe a token whereby the world might understand, that hee was come rather to enlarge than to limit the mercie of God, gently embraced children offscd vnto him, rebuing the disciples which went about to forbid them to come to him: for as much as they did leade those, to whom the kingdom of heauen belongeth, away from him by whom alone the entrie is open into heauen. But (will some man say) what like thing hath baptisme with this embracing of Christ? For neither is it reported that he baptised them, but that he received them, embraced them, and wifhed them well. Therefore if we lift to follow his example, let vs helpe infants with prayer, but not baptise them. But let vs wey the doings of Christ somewhat more heedfully, than such kinde of men doe. For neither is this to be lightly passe over, that Christ commanndeth infants to be brought vnto him, adding a reason why, because of such is the kingdom of heauen. And afterward he wittneseth his will with deede, when embracing them he commendeth them to his Father with his prayer and blessing. If it be meete that infants be brought to Christ, why is it not also meete that they be received to baptism, the signe of our communion and fellowship with Christ? If the kingdom of heauen be theirs, why shall the signe be denied them, whereby there is as it were an entrie opened into the Church, that being admitted into it they may be adnumbered among the heirs of the heauenly kingdom? How vnjust shall we be, if wee drue away them whom Christ calleth vnto him? if we spoile them, whom he gainieth with his giftes? if we shut out them whom he willingly receiveith? But if wee will examine howe much that which Christ there did, differeth from baptism, yet of howe much greater price shall wee haue baptism, (whereby wee teftifie that infants are contained in the covenant of God) than receiuing, embracing, laying on of hands, and prayer, whereby Christ himselfe being present: declareth that they both are his, and are sanctified of him? By the other caullations, whereby they labor to mocke out this place, they do nothing but bewray their owne ignorance. For they gather an argument of this which Christ faith. Let little ones come to me, that they were in age good bigge ones which were alreadie able to go. But they are called of the Evangeliftes, brephe, and paidia, by which words the Greekes doe signifie babes yet hanging on the breastes. Therefore this worde (to come) is simply set for (to haue access.) Lo what shares they are compelled to make, which are grown hard against the trueth. Nowe where they say, that the kingdom of heaven is not gien to them, but to such as be like them, because it is faide to be of such, not of them: that is no founder than y reft. For if that be graunted, what maner of reason shall the reason of Christ be, whereby he meaneth to shewe, that infantes in age are not strangers from him? When he commaundeth that infantes be suffered to haue access vnto him, nothing is plainer than that verie infancie in deed is there spoken of. And that this shoulde not seeme an abfurditie, he by and by addeth: of such is the kingdom of heaven. But if it must needs bee that infantes bee comprehended herein, it must be plaine that by this worde(such) are meant verie infantes themselves, and such as be like them.

8 Nowe there is no man that teareth not, that baptism of infants was not framed by man, which is vpholden by so great approving of Scripture. Neither doe they colourably enough play the foole, which object that it is no where founde, that any one infant was baptised by the handes of the Apostles. For although it be not expressely by name rehearsed of the Evangeliftes: yet because againe they are not excluded, so oft as mention happeneth to be made of the baptizing of any householde: who, unless he bee made, can reason therupon that they were not baptised? If such arguments were of any force, women shoulde be forbidden to partake of the Lordes supper, whome wee reade not to haue benee receiued vnto it in the time of the Apostles. But here wee be content with the rule of faith. For when wee consider, what the institution of the Supper requireth, thereby also wee may eaily judge to whom the vsethereof ought to be communicatet. Which we obserue alfo in baptism. For when wee marke, to what ende it was ordeined, wee euidently ephi, that it belongeth no lesse to infants, than to elder folks. Therefore they cannot bee deprised of it, but that the will of the author must bee manifestly defrauded. But where as they spread abroad among the simple people, that there passed a long row of ycares after the resurrection of Christ, in which the baptism of infants was vnknown: then in they most fowly doe lie. For there is no writer so old, y doth not certainly refere the beginning thereof to the time of y Apostles.

9 Nowe remaineeth that we briefly shewe, what fruite commeth of this obseruation, both to the faithfull which present their children to the Church to be baptised, and also to the infants themselves that bee baptised with the holy water: that no man shoulde despise it as vnprofitable or idle. But if it come in any mans minde, vpon this pretence to mocke at the baptism.
baptism of infants, he scorneth the commandment of Circumcision given by the Lord. For what will they bring forth to impugne the baptism of infants, which may not also be thrown back against Circumcision? So the Lord taketh vengeance of their arrogance, which doth by and by condemneth that which they comprehendeth not with the sense of their own flesh. But God furnisheth vs with other armures, whereby their foolishness may be beaten flat. For neither this his holy institution, by which wee feel our faith to be holpen with singular comforte, deserveth to be called superfuous. For Goddes signe communicated to a childe doeth as it were by an emprinted sealie confirmeth the promise given to the godly parente, and declareth that it is ratified that the Lord will be GOD not onely to him but also to his seede, and will continually shewe his good will and grace, not to him only, but also to his posteritie even to the thousandth generation. Where when the great kindenesse of GOD vtteth it selfe, first it yelded most large matter to aduaunce his glorie, and overspreadeth godly heartes with singular gladnesse, because they are therewithall more earnestly moved to loue againe so godly a Father, whose they see to have care of their posteritie for their sakes. Neither doe I regarde, if any man take exception, and saye that the promise ought to suffice to confirm the salvation of our children: forasmuch as it hath pleased God otherwise, who as hee knoweth our weaknesse, willed in this behalfe so muche to beare tenderly with it. Therefore lette them that embrace the promise of Gods mercie to be extended to their children, thinke that it is their dutie to offer them to the Church to be signed with the signe of mercie, and thereby to encourage themselves to a more assured confidence, because they do with present eye behold the covenant of the Lord grauen in the bodies of their children. Againe, the children receive some commoditie of their baptism, that being engrafted into the body of the Church, they be somewhat the more comended to the other members. Then when they are grown to riper age, they be thereby not feenderly stirred vp to earnest endeavour to worshippe God, of whom they have beene receiued into his children by a solemnne signe of adoption, before that they could by age acknowledge him for their Father. Finally that same condemnation ought greatly to make vs afraide, that GOD will take vengeance of it, if any man despite to marke his sonne with the signe of the covenant, because by such contempt the grace offered is refused and as it were foresworne.

Now let vs examine the argumentes, wherby certaine furious beasts doe not cease to affaile this holy institution of God. First because they see that they be exceedingly neere druen and harde strained with the likenesse of baptism and Circumcision, they labour to plucke in sunder these two signes with great difference, that the one should not seeme to have any thing common with the other. For they saye that both diverse things are signified, and that the covenant is altogether diverse, and that the naming of the children is not all one. But while they goe about to procure that first point, they allege that Circumcision was a figure of mortification and not of baptism. Which verily we do most willingly graunte them. For it maketh very well for our fide, Neithe do we vs any other prose of our sentence, that that Baptisme and Circumcision are signes of mortification. Herupon we determine Baptisme is set in the place of Circumcision, that it should represent unto vs the same thing which in old time is signified to the Lewes. In affirming the difference of the covenants, with how barbarous boldnesse doe they turmoille & corrupt the Scripture and that not in one place alone, but so as they leave nothing safe or whole? For they depaint unto vs the Lewes so to be carnall they be liker beastes than men: with whom forsooth the covenants made procedeth not beyond the temporall life, to whom the promises given do rest in present & bodily good things, If this doctrine take place, what remaineth but that the nation of the Lewes were for a time filled with the benefits of GOD, none otherwise than as they late a hearde of Swine in a pit, that at length they should perish with eternal damnation. For so soone as we allege Circumcision and the promises annexed unto it, they anon swore that Circumcision was a literall signe, and the promises thereof were carnall.

ii Truely if Circumcision was a literall signe, there is no otherwise to be thought of baptisme. For the Apostle in the second Chapter to the Colossians maketh the one no more spirituall than the other. For hee sayeth that we are circumcised in Christ, with a circumcision not made with hande, putting away the body of sinne that dwelled in our flesh: which hee calleth the circumcision of Christ. Afterwarde for declaration of that saying, hee adiouneth, that we be buried with Christ by baptism, What meaneth he by these words, but that the fulfilling and truth of baptism, is also the truth & fulfilling of circumcision, because they figure both one thing: For hee traualleth to shew, that baptism is the same to Christians, which Circumcision had beene before to the Lewes. But forasmuch as we have nowe evidently declared, that the promises of both the signes, and the mysteries that are represented in them, doe agree together, we will for this present tarry no longer vpon them. Onely I will put the faithful in minde, that though I hold my peace, they shoulde weye with themselves whether it be taken for an earthly and literall signe, vnder which nothing is contein'd but spirituall and heavenly. But, that they shoulde not fell their smokes to the simple, we will by the way confute one objection wherewith they colour this most shamleffe lie. It is most certaine that the principal promisses, wherein was contain'd the covenent which in the Olde testament GOD stablished with the Israelites, were spirituall, and tended to eternall life: and then againe, that they were receiued of the fathers spirituallly, as it was meete, that they might thereof receive affiance of the life to come, whereunto they longed with the whole affection of their heart. But in the meanes time wee denie not, but that hee witnessed his good will towards them with earthly and carnall benefites: by which also we say that the same promisse of spirituall things was confirmed. As when hee promiseth everlasting blessednesse to his seruant Abrauem, that he might sette before his eyes a manifest token of his favour, hee addeth another promisse concerning the possession of the lande of Chanaan. After this manner we ought to understand all the earthly promises that are given to the Lewes nation, that the spirituall promisse, as the sea, wherunto they are directed, should alway haue the chiefe place.
In the naming of the children they find this diuersitie, that in the old testament they were called the children of Abraham, which influed of his seede: but that now they are called by that name, which follow his faith: and that therefore that carnall infantie, which was by circumcision grafted into the fellowship of the covenante, figured the infants of the new testament, which are regenerate by the word of God to immortal life. In which words we behold in deed a small sparkle of truthe; but herein these light spirits grievously offend, that when they catch hold of that which first cometh to their hand, when they should go further and compare many things together, they stand still upon one word. Whereby it cannot otherwise be but that they must sometime be deceived which rest upon the sound knowledge of nothing. We graunt in deed that the carnall seede of Abraham did for a time hold the place of the spiritual seede which is by faith grafted into him. For we be called his children howsoever there is no natural kinred betwene him and vs. But if they meane, as they plainly shewe that they doe, there was nouer spiritual blessing promised to the carnall seede of Abraham, herein they are much deceived. Wherefore we must leuel to a better marke, whereunto we are directed by the most certaine guiding of the Scripture. The Lord therefore promised to Abraha, that he should haue a seede, where in all nations of the earth shalbe blessed: and therewithall assureth him, that he would be a God to him & his seed. Whosoever do by Faith receive Christ the author of blessing, are heires of this promise, and therefore are called the children of Abraham.

But although since the resurrection of Christ the bounds of the kingdom of God haue begun to be far and wide enlarged into all nations without difference, that according to the saying of Christ, faithfull ones should bee gathered from every part to sit downe in the heavenly glory with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: yet hee had many ages before extended that same to great mercie to the Jewes. And because passing over all other, hee had chosen out that onely nation, in which hee woulde restaine his grace for a time, called them his peculiar possession, and his purchased people. For testifying of such liberaltie, Circumcision was given by the signe whereof the Jewes might be taught, God is to them the author of saluation: by which knowledge their minde were raised into hope of eternall life. For what shall he want, whom God hath once received into his charge? Wherefore the Apostle meaning to prove that the Gentiles were the children of Abraham as well as the Jewes, speaketh in this maner: Abraham (faith he) was justified by faith in uncircumcision. Afterward he received the signe of circumcision, the seale of the righteousnesse of faith, that he should be the father of all the faithfull, both of uncircumcision and of circumcision, not of them that glorie of onely circumcision, but of them that followe the faith which our father Abraham had in uncircumcision. Do not wee see that both fortes are made egall in dignitie? For during the time appointed by the decree of God, he was the father of circumcision. When the wall being plucked downe (as the

the Apostle writeth in another place) by which the Jewes were severed from the Gentiles, the entrance was made open to them also into the kingdom of God, he was made their father, and that without the signe of circumcision, because they have baptism instead of circumcision. But where he expressly by name denieth, that Abraham is father to them which are of circumcision only, that same is spoken to abate the pride of certain, which omitting the care of godliness, did boast themselves of onely ceremonies. After which manner at this day also their vanitie may bee confuted which seeke in baptism nothing but water.

14 But another place of the Apostle out of the 9. Chapter of the Epistle to the Romanes shalbe allcegend to the contrary, where he teacheth they which are of the flesh, are not the children of Abraham: but they onely are counted his seede, which are the children of promise. For he seemeth to signifie, that the carnall kinred of Abraham is nothing, which yet we do set in some degree. But it is more diligently to be marked, what matter the Apostle there entreateth of. For, meaning to shewe to the Jewes how much the goodness of God was not bounde to the seede of Abraham, yea howe it nothing availeth of itselfe, he bringeth forth Ismael and Esau for example to proue it: whome being refused, as if they were strangers, although they were according to the flesh the natural offpring of Abraham, the blessing rested in Isaac and Iacob. Whereupon is gathered that which he afterward affirmeth, that salvation hangeth of the mercie of God, which he extendeth to whome it pleaseth him: and that there is no cause why the Jewes shoulde stande in their own conceit, or boast upon the name of the covenant, vnlesse they keepe the lawe of the covenant, that is to say, do obey the worde. Againse when he hath throwen them downe from vaine confidence of their kinred, yet because on the other side he faile, that the covenant which was once made of God with the posteritie of Abraham, could in no wise be made void, in the 11. chapter, he argueth that the carnall kinred is not to be spoiled of his due dignitie; by the beneficial meanes whereof he teacheth that the Jewes are the first and natural heires of the Gospel, but in respect that by their unthankfulness, they were forfaken as vnworthie: yet so that the heavenly blessing is not utterly removed from their nation. For which reason, howe much soever they were stubborne and covenant breakers, neuertheless he calleth them holy (so much honor he gieeth to the holy generation, with whom God had vouchsaue to make his holy covenant) but calleth vs, if we be compared with them, as it were after born, yea or the vntimely borne children of Abraham, & that by adoption, not by nature; as if a twig broken off from his natural tree, should begrafted into a strange stock. Therefore that they should not be defrauded of their prerogative, it behooved that the Gospel should be first preached to them: for they be in the household of God as it were the first begotten children. Wherefore this honour was to be given them, vntil they refused it being offered them; and by their owne unthankfulness brought to passe that it was carried away to the Gentiles. Neither yet, with howe great obstinacie soucer they continue to make warre against the Gospel, ought they to bee despised of vs: if we consider that for the promises sake, the blessing of God doth yet still remaine. remaine among them: as verily the Apostle testifieth that it shal neuer verily depart from thence: because the gifts and calling of God are without repentance.

15 Beholde of what force is the promise giveth to the posteritie of Abraham, and with what balance it is to be weyed. Wherefore although in discon-ning the heires of the kingdom from bastardes & strangers, we nothing dout that the onely election of God ruleth with free right of governmen; yet we also therewithal perceiue, that it pleased him peculiarily to embrace the seede of Abraham with his mercy, and that the same mercie might bee the more surely witnessed, to seale it with circumcision. Nowe altogether like state is there of the Christian Church. For as Paul there reasoneth that the Iewes are sanctified of their parents: so in an other place he teacheth, that the children of Christians receive the same sanctification of their parentes. Whereupon is gathered, that they are worthyly feuered from the rest, which on the other side are condemned of uncleannesse. Now who can dout, but that it is most false which they do therupon conclude, that the infantes which in old time were circumcised, did onely figure spirituall infancie, which aris-eth of the regeneration of the worde of God. For Paul doeth not so suttletly play the Philosopher, where he writeth that Christ is his minister of Circumcision, to fulfill the promises which had bin made to the Fathers, as if he said thus: Forasmuch as the couenant made with Abraham hath respect to his seede, Christ, to performe and discharge the promise once made by his Father, came to salvation to the nation of the Iewes. See you not how also after the resurrection of Christ, he judgeth that the promise of the couenant is to be fulfilled, not only by way of allegory, but as the very words do found to the carnall seede of Abraham. To the same entent ferueth that which Peter in the second Chapter of the Actes, declareth to the Iewes, that the benefit of the Gospel is due to them and their seede by right of the couenant, and in the Chapter next following he calleth them the children of the Testament, that is to say heires. From which also not much disaccordeth the other place of the Apostle above alleaged, where he accounteth and setteth Circumcision emprinted in infantes, for a testimonie of communion which they haue with Christ. But if we harken to their trifles, what shalbe wrought by that promise, whereby the Lord in the second article of his law vnderitaketh to his seruantes, he will be favorable to their seede eu en to the thousandth generation? Shall we here flee to allegories? But were too trilling a shift. Or shall we say this is abolished? But the lawe should be destroyed, which Christ came rather to stablishe, so farre as it turneth vsto good vnto life.

Let it therefore be out of controuerse, God is so good and liberal to his, that for their sakes, he will haue also their children, whom they shall beget, to be adnumbered among his people.

16 Moreouer ye differences which they go about to put between baptism and circumcision, are not only worthy to be laughed at, & voide of all colour of reason, but also disagreeing with themselves. For when they haue affirmed that baptism hath relation to the first day of the spirituall battel, but circumcision to the eighth when mortification is already ended, by and by forgetting the same, they turne their song, & call circumcision a figure of the
to be mortified, but baptism, they call burial, into which none are to be put till they be already dead. What dotages of phrentike men, can with so great lightnesse leap into sundry diversities? For in the first sentence, baptism must go before circumcision: by the other, it is thrust backe into another place. Yet is it no newe example, that the wits of men be so tossed vp and downe, when in stead of the most certaine worde of God they worship what focuer they have dreamed. We therefore say that that former difference is a meer dreame. If they lifted to expounde by way of allegory vp to the eight day, yet it agreed not in that maner. It were much fitter, according to the opinion of the old writers, to referre the number of eight to the resurrection which was done on the eighth day, whereupon we knowe that the newnes of life hangerth: or to the whole course of this present life, wherein mortification ought alway to go forward, till when life is ended, mortification it selfe may also be ended. Howbeit God may seeme to have minded to provide for the tenderneffe of age, in differing circumcision to the eighth day, because the wound shold haue bin more dangerous to the children new borne and yet red from their mother. How much stronger is that, that we being dead before, are buried by baptism: when the Scripture expressly cryeth to the contrary that we are buried into death to this entent, that we should die, and from thenceforth should endeoure to this mortification? Nowe, a likewise handling it is, that they caull that women ought not to be baptized, if baptism must bee framed like to circumcision. For if it be most certaine the sanctifying of the seed of Israel was testified by the signe of circumcision: therby also it is undoubted, that it was given to sanctifie both males and females. But the only bodies of male children were marked with it, which might by nature be marked: yet so that the women were by them after a certaine manner companions and partners of circumcision. Therefore sending far away such follyes of theirs, let vs sticke fast in the likenes of baptism and circumcision, which we most largely see to agree in the inwarde mystery in the promises, in vs, in effectualneffe.

17 They thinke alfo that they bring forth a most strong reason, why children are to be debarred from baptism, when they allenge that they are not yet for age able to understande the mysterie there signified. That is spiritual regeneration, which can not be in the first infancie. Therefore they gather, that they are to be taken for none other than the children of Adam, till they be grown to age meete for a second birth. But the truth of God eche where speaketh against all these things. For if they be to be left among the children of Adam, then they are left in death: forasmuch as in Adam we can doe nothing but die. But contrariwise Christ commandeth them to be brought into him. Why so? because he is life: Therefore that he may give life to them, he maketh them partakers of himselfe: when in the meanes time these fellows driving them far away do adjudge them to death. For if they say for a shift, that infants do not therefore perish if they be accounted the children of Adam, their error is abundantly confuted by wittenss of the Scripture. For whereas it pronounceth that all do die in Adam, it followeth that there remayneth no hope of life but in Christ. Therefore that we may be made heirs of life, we must communicate with him. Again when it is written in another place, that by nature we are all subject to the wrath of God, and conceived in sin, whereinunto damnation perpetually cleaueth: we must depart out of our own nature, before that the enemy bee open to vs into the kingdom of God. And what can be more plainly spoken than that flesh & blood can not possesse the kingdom of God? Therefore let all be done away whatsoever is ours (which shall not be done without regeneration) then we shall see this possession of the kingdom. Finally if Christ saie truly, when he reporteth that he is life, it is necessarie that we be grafted into him, that we may be delivered out of the bondage of death. But (say they) howe are infantes regenerate, which are not endued with knowledge neither of good nor of euill?
But we answer, that the worke of God is not yet no worke at all, although it be not subject to our capacitie. Moreover it is nothing doubtful, that the infantes which are to be sauid (as verily of that age some are saued) are before regenerat of the Lorde. For if they bring with them from their mothers wombe the corruption naturally planted in them; they must be purged ther of, before that they be admitted into the kingdom of God, whereinto nothing entreth that is defiled or spotted. If they be borne sinners, as both Da-uid and Paul affirme: either they remaine out of sauour and hatefull to God, or they must needs be justifiad. And what seeke we more, when the judge himselfe openly affirmeth that the entrie into heauenly life is open to none but to them that be borne again? And to put such carpers to silence, he shewed an example in Iohn the baptist, whom he sanctified in his mothers wombe, what he was able to doe in the rest. Neither doe they any thing preuail by the shift wherewith they here mocke, that that was but once done: whereupon it doth not by and by followe that the Lorde is wont commonly to do so with infantes. For neither doe we reason after that maner: only our purpose is to shew, that the power of God is by them vnuitly & eniouisely limited within those narrow bounds within which it suffreth not it selfe to bee bounde. Their other by shift is euens of so great weight. They allege that by the usuall maner of the Scripture, this word (from the wombe,) is as much in effect, as if it were said, from childhood. But wee may clearely see, that the Angel when he declared the same to Zachary, meant another thing: that is, that it which was not yet borne, should be filled with the holy Ghost. Let vs not therefore attempt to appoint a lawe to God, but that he may sanctifie whom it pleased him, as he sanctified this child, for as much as his power is nothing minished.

And truly Christ was therefore sanctified from his first infancy, that he might sanctifie in himselfe his elect out of every age without difference. For as, to doe away the fault of disobedience which had bin committad in our flesh, he hath put on the same flesh UPON himselfe, that he might in it for vs and in our stead performe perfect obedience: so he was conceiued of the holy Ghost having the holiness thereof fully poured into him, in the flesh which he had taken uppon him, he might powre forth for the same into vs. If we haue in Christ a most perfect patterne of all the graces which God continually sheweth to his children, verily in this behalfe also he shalbe a profe unto vs, that the age of infancy is not so farre vniuit for sanctification. But howsoever it be, yet this we holde out of controversie, that none of the elect is called out of this present
present life, which is not first made holy and regenerate by the Spirit of God. Whereas they obiect to the contrary, that in the Scriptures Spirit acknowledgeth no other regeneration but of incorruptible seed, that is, of the word of God: they dowrongfully expounde that saying of Peter, wherein he comprehended only the faithfull which had bin taught by preaching of the Gospel. To such in deede we grant that the word of the Lord is the only seed of spiritual regeneration: but we deny it ought thereupon to be gathered, that infants can noth be regenerate by the power of God, which is to him as easie and ready as to vs it is incomprehensible and wonderfull. Moreover it should not be safe enough for vs to take this away from the Lorde, that he may not be able to shewe himselfe to be known to them by whatsoever way he will.

19 But Faith, say they, is by hearing, whereof they have not yet gotten the vs, neither can they be able to knowe God, whom Moses teacheth to be desitute of the knowledge both of good and euil. But they consider not that the Apostle, when he maketh hearing the beginning of faith, describeth only the ordinary distribution of the Lord & disposition which he vseth to keep in calling them that be his: but appointeth not to him a perpetuall rule, that he may not vs any other way. Which way verily he hath vseth in the calling of many, to whom he hath giuen the true knowledge of himselfe by an inward manner, by the enlightening of the Spirit, without any preaching vsed for meane thereof. But whereas they thinke it shalbe a great absurdity, if any knowledge of God be giuen to infants, from whom Moses taketh away the understanding of good & euil: I beseech them to answere me, what danger is there if they be layde to receive some part of that grace, whereof a little after they shall enjoye the full plenteuousnesse. For if the fulnesse of life standeth in the perfect knowledge of God, when many of them, who in their very first infancy death by and by taketh away, do passe into eternal life, truly they are receiued to behold the most present face of God. Whom therefore the Lord will enlighten with the full brightnesse of his light, why may he not presently also, if it so please him, send out to shione upon them som small particular thereof: specialy if he do not first vncloth them of ignorance, before that he take them out of the prison of the flesh? Not that I mean rashly to affirme that they are endued with the same Faith which we feel in our selves, or that they haue altogether like knowledge of faith: (which I had rather leave in suspence) but somwhat to restraine their foolish arrogance, which according as their mouth is puffed vp with fulnesse, doe boldly deny or affirm they care not what.

20 But that they may yet stonde more strongly in this point, they adde that baptism is a Sacrament of repentance and of Faith, wherefore ifth neither of these can befall in tender infancy, we ought to beware lest if they be admitted to the communion of baptism, the signification of it be made void and vaine. But these dartes are thrown rather against GOD than against vs. For it is most eviident by many testimonies of Scripture, that circumcision also was a signe of repentance. Moreover it is called of Paul the scale of the righteoulinesse of Faith. Lette therefore a reason be required of God himselfe why he commanded it to be marked in the bodies of infants. For
For fifth baptism and circumcision are both in one case, they can give nothing to the one but that they must also therewithall grant the same to the other. If they looke backe to their wonted starting hole, that then by the age of infancy were figured spirituall infants, the way is alreadie stopped vp against them. We say therefore, fifth God hath communicated to infants circumcision a sacrament of repentance and faith, it seemeth no absurditie if they be made partakers of baptism: vnlesse they lift openly to rage against the ordinance of God. But both in all the doings of God, and in this selfe same doing also thineth wisdomome and righteousnes enough, to beat downe the backebitinges of the wicked. For though infants, at the same instant that they were circumcised, did not comprehende in understanding what that signe meant: yet they were truly circumcised into the mortification of their corrupt and defiled nature, in which mortification they shoulde afterwaarde exercifie themselves when they were grown to riper age. Finally it is verie cæse to assoile this objection, with laying that they bee baptized into repentance and Faith to come: which although they be not formed in them, yet by secrete working of the Spirit the seede of both lyeth hidden in them. With this aunswer we at once is ouerthrown whatfoever they writ against vs which they haue fetched out of the signification of baptism. Of which sort is that title wherewith it is commended of Paul, where he calleth it the washing of regeneration & of renewing. Wherupon they gather yt it is to be givne to none but to such a one as is able to conceiue those things. But we on the contrary side may aunswer, that neither was circumcision which betokened regeneration, to be givne to any other than to them that were regenerate. And so shal wee condemn the ordinance of God. Wherefore (as we have alreadie touched in dierse places) whatsoever arguments do tend to the taking of circumcision, they haue no force in the affayling of baptism. Neither doe they so escape away, if they say that wee ought to take yt for determined and certaine, which standeth vpon the authority of God, although there appeare no reason of it: which reuerence is not due to the baptism of infants, nor to such other things which be not commended vnto vs by ye express word of God: fifth they are still fast holden with this double argument. For the commandement of God concerning infants to be circumcised, was either lawfull and subiect to no cauillations, or worthie to bee found fault withall. If there were no inconuenience nor absurditie in the commandement of circumcision, neither can there any absurditie be noted in observing the baptism of infants.

21 As for the spot of absurditie which in this place they goe about to lay vpon it, we thus wipe it away. Whome the Lorde hath vouchsaied to elect, if haueing received the signe of regeneration, they depart out of this present life before that they become to riper age, he reneweth them with the power of his spirite incomprehensible to vs, in such manner as bee alone foreseeeth to bee expedient. If they chance to grow vp to age, whereby they may be taught the truth of baptism, they shall hereby bee the more indistilled to the endour of renewing, the token whereof they shall learn to haue beene givne them from their first infancy, that they shoulde exercifie themselves in it throughout ye whole course of their life. To the same entet ought that that to bee applied which Paul teacheth in two places, that by baptism is are buried together with Christe. For he doeth not meane thereby, that hee which is to be baptized, must be alreadie first buried together with Christ: but simplicie declareth what doctrine is conteined under baptism, yea and that to them that be alreadie baptized: so that very mad men would not affirme by this place that it goeth before baptism. After this manner Moses and the Prophets did put the people in minde what circumcision meant, wherewith yet they had beene marked while they were infants. Of the same effect also is that which hee writeth to the Galatians, that they when they were baptized, did put on Christ. To what ende? verily that they shoulde thence forth live to Christ, because they had not liued before. And although in the older sort the receiuing of the signe ought to follow this understanding of the mysterie: yet it shall be by and by declared that infants ought to bee otherwise esteemed and accounted of. And no otherwise ought we to judge of the place of Peter, in which they thinke that they have a strong hold: wher he faith that it is not a washing to wipe away the filthinesse of the body, but the witnessse of a good conscience before God, by the resurrection of Christ.

Theyindeed doe gather thereby, that nothing is left to the baptism of in-fantes, but that it shoulde be a vaine smoke, namely from which this truth is far distant. But they often offend in this errour, that they will have the thing in order of time to goe alway before the signe. For the truth of circumcision also consisted of the same witnessse of good conscience. If it ought of necessary to have gone before, infants shoulde never have beene circumcised by the commandement of God. But hee shewing that the witnessse of a good conscience was conteined under the truth of circumcision, and yet therewith all also commanding infants to be circumcised, doth in point sufficiently declare that circumcision is applied to the time to come. Wherefore there is no more present effectual witnessse to be required in baptism of in-fantes, than that it should confirm and stablize the covenant made by the Lorde with them. The rest of the signification of that Sacrament shal afterward follow at such time as God himselfe foreseeth,

22. Nowe I thinke there is no man, that doeth not clearely see that all such reasons of theirs are mere misconstruings of scripture. As for the rest that bee of a nere kinde to these, we will lightly runne through them by the way. They object that baptism is given unto the forgiuenees of sinnes: which when it is granted, will largely make for defence of our sentence. For sith we be born sinners, we doe even from our mothers wombe need forgiuenees and pardon. Nowe seeing the Lorde doth not cut off, but rather assure to thy age the hope of mercie: why should we take from them the signe which is much inferior than the thing it selfe?Wherefore that which they goe about to throwe against vs, we thus throw backe against them selves: infants have remission of sinnes given them, therefore they ought not to haue the signe taken from them. They alledge also this out of the Epistle to the Ephelians: that the Church is cleansed of the Lorde, with the washing of water in the worde of life. Than which there could nothing bee alledged more fit to ouerthrowe their errour: for thereupon groweth an easie proofe of our side. If the Lord will haue thy washing wherewith he cleanseth his church To be testified by baptism: it seemeth not rightfull that it shoulde want the testimont of it in infants, which are rightfullly accompt part of the Church, forasmuch as they be called heires of the heauenly kingdome. For Paul speaketh of the whole Church, where hee faith that it was cleansed with the baptism of water. Likewise of this that in an other place he faith that we be by baptism graffed into the body of Christ, wee gather that infants, whom hee reckoneth among his members, ought to be baptised, leaft they be plucked away from his body. Beholde with what violence with so many engines they assault the fortrasses of our faith.

23. Then they come downe to the practife and custome of the time of the Apostles, wherein none is founde to haue beene admitted to baptism, but he which hath before professed Faith and repentance. For where Peter was asked of them that were minded to repent, what was nedful to be done, he counselled them first to repent, and then to be baptised, into the forgiveness of sinnes. Likewise Philip, when the Eunuch required to bee baptised, apunfwered that he might bee baptizd if he beleued with all his hart. Hicke by they thinke that they may winne, that it is not lawfull that baptizm be graunted to any, but where faith and repentance goe before. Truely if wee yeelde to this reason, the first of these two places where is no mention made of Faith, will proue that repentance alone sufficeth: & the other place, wher-in repentance is not required, will proue that faith onely is enough. I thinke they will aunfwer that the one place is holpen with the other, & therefore must be ioyned together. I say also likewise, that other places must be laid together which make somewhat to the vndoing of this knot: forasmuch as there be many sentences in scripture, the understanding whereof hangeth upon the circumstance of the place. As this presently is an example. Forthey to whome Peter and Philip spake these things were of age sufficient to haue practife of repentance and to conceive faith. We earnestly deie that such ought to be baptizd, untill after perceiving of their conversion and faith, at least so farre as it may be searched out by the judgement of men. But, that in-fantes ought to be accompted in an other number, it is more than euident enough. For in olde time if any man did ioyne himselfe into communion of religion with Israel, it behooved that hee shoulde first be taught the counant of the Lord, & instructed in the law, before that he were marked with circumcision, because in birth he was a stranger from the people of Israel, with whome the covenant had bene made with circumcision established.

24. As also the Lorde, when hee adopteth Abraham to himselfe, doth not begin at circumcision; hiding in the meane time what hee meaneth by that signe: but first he declareth what covenant he intendeth to make with him, and then after faith giuen to the promise, he maketh him partaker of the Sacrament. Why doth in Abraham the sacrament follow faith, & in Isaac his sonne it goeth before all understanding? Because it is meet that he, which being in full growen age is received into fellowship of the covenants, from which he had bene hither to a stranger, should first learne the conditions thereof: but an infant begotten of him needed not so, which by right of inheritance according to the forme of the promise is even from his mothers wombe cotyned in the covenants. Or (that the matter may bee more clearly and briefly
breefly shewed) if the children of the faithfull, without the helpe of understanding, are partakers of the couenant, there is no cause why they should be debarred from the signe for this that they cannot svere to the forme of the couenant. This verily is the reason, why in some places God affirmeth that the infants which are iudged of the israelites, are begotten and borne to him. For without doubt hee esteemeth as his children the children of the to whose seed hee promiseth that hee will be a father. But he which is unfaithfull, iudged of vngodly parents, till he bee by faith visited to God, is judged a straunger from the communion of the couenant. Therefore it is no maruell if he be not partaker of the signe, the signification whereof should be deceitfull and voyde in him. To this effect Paul also writeth, that the gentiles so long as they were drowned in their idolatrie, were out of the Testament. With this shor summe, (as I thinke) the whole matter may be clearly opened: that they which in growen age, embrace the faith of Christ, forasmuch as they were hitherto straungers from the couenant, are not to bee marked with baptisme, but whereas faith and repentance come betweene, which onely can open them the entrie into fellowship of the couenant: but the infants that are iudged of Christians, as they are receiued of God into the inheritance of the couenant so soone as they be borne, so ought to be receiued to baptisme. Hereunto must that bee applied which the Evangelist speakeoth of, that they were baptised of Iohn which confessed their sinnes. Which example at this day also we thinke meete to bee kept. For if a Turke offer himselfe to baptisme, he should not be rashly baptised of vs, namely not till after confession whereby he may satisfy the Church.

25 Moreouer they bring forth the words of Christ, which are rehearsed in the thirde Chapter of Iohn, whereby they thinke that a present regeneration is required in baptisme. Vnlesse a man be borne againe of water & the spirite, he cannot enter into the kingdome of God. Lo (say they) howe baptisme is by the Lordes owne mouth called regeneration. Them therafter whom it is more than enough known to be vnable to receive regeneration by what colour we do admit to baptisme which cannot be without regeneration? First they are deceived in this that they thinke that in this place mention is made of baptisme, because they heare the name of water. For after Christ had declared to Nicodemos the corruption of nature, and taught him, that men must be borne of new, because Nicodemos dreamed of a bodily newe birth, he there shewed the manner how God doeth regenerate vs, namely by water and the spirite: as though he should say by the spirite which in cleansing and watering faithfull soules, doeth the office of water. Therefore I take water and the spirite simile for the spirite, which is water. Neither is this a newe forme of speech, for it altogether agreeth with the same which is in the thirde Chapter of Mathew: Hee that followeth me, it is hee that bat-

Matt. 3.111.

Christ
Christ is none other, but to teach that all they must put on their own nature which aspire to the heavenly kingdom. Howebeit if wee lift to causen volatile as they doe, it were easie for vs (when we haue granted as they would haue it) to inferre vpon them that baptism is before faith and repentance: for as much as in the wordes of Christ it goeth before the spirit. It is certaine that this is vnderstanded of spirituall gites: which if they come after baptism, I haue obtained what I require. But leaueing cauillations, we must holde saft the plaine expostion, which I haue brought, that no man till hee haue beene renewed with liuing water, that is, with the spirite, can enter into the kingdom of God.

26 Nowe hereby also it is evident that their said inuention is to bee hisled out, which adiudge all the unbapptised to eternall death. Therefore let vs according to their request imagine baptism to bee ministred to none but to them that be grown in age: What will they say, shall become of a Child, which is rightly and well instructed with the introductions of godlines, if when the day of Baptisme is at hande, he happen to bee taken away with sudden death beside all mens hope? The Lords promise is cleare, that whatsoever hath beleued in the sonne, shall not see death, nor shall come into judgement, but is already passed from death into life: and it is no where founde that he euer damned him that was not yet baptised. Which I would not haue so taken of mee as though I meant that baptism might freely bee despised (by which despising I affirme that the Lords covenant is defiled: so much lesse can I abide to excuse it) onely it is enough for mee to prooue, that it is not so necessary, that he should be immediately thought to be lost, from whom power is taken away to obteyne it. But if wee agree to their fancie desuie, wee shall damne all them without exception, whom any chance withholdeth from baptism, with howe great faith soever (by which Christ himselfe is possesseed) otherwise they are endued. Moreover they make all infantes guiltie of eternall death, to whom they denye baptism, which by their owne confession is necessary to salvation. Nowe let them looke howe trimly they agree with the wordes of Christ, by which the kingdom of heaven is adjudged to that age. But, to graunt them anything so much as pertaineth to the understanding of this place, yet they shall gather nothing thereof, ynes they overthrow the former doctrine which we haue stablished concerning the regeneration of infants.

27 But they glory that they haue the strongest holde of all in the verie institution of Baptisme, which they fetch out of the last Chapter of Mathew: where Christ sending forth his Apostles to al nations, giueth them the first commandement to teach them, and the second to Baptise them. Then also out of the last of Mark they adioine this, He that beleueth and is baptised, shall be saued. What seek we further (say they) when the Lords owne wordes doe openlye found, that we must first teach ere we baptize, and doe assigne to baptism the second estate after Faith? Of which order the Lords also shelued an example in himselfe, which would be baptised not till thirtieth yeare. But here, O good God, howe many wayes doe they both entangle themselues, and bewray their owne ignorance? For herein they now more than childishly erre, that they fetch the first institution of Baptisme from thence thence, which Christ had from \( \overline{\text{t}} \) beginning of his preaching given in charge to his Apostles to minister. Therefore there is no cause why they should affirm that the lawe and rule of Baptisme is to be fetched out of these places, as though they contained the first institution thereof. But to beare with the for this fault, yet howe strong is this manner of reasoning? Truely if I lifted to dally with them, there is not a little lurking hole, but a most wide fielde offereth it selfe open for vs to escape them. For when they sticke so fast to the order of words, that they gather that because it is saide, Go, preach and baptifie, Againe, he that beleueth and is baptised, therefore they must preach before that they baptifie, & beleue before \( \overline{\text{t}} \) they require baptisme: why may not wee againe aunfwere them with saying that we must baptifie before that we must teach the keeping of those things that Christ hath commanded: namely sith it is saied, baptifie ye, teaching them to keepe whatsoever things I have commanded you? which same things we have noted in that saying of Christ which hath bin even now alleadged concerning the regeneration of water and the Spirit. For if it be so vnderstoode as they would haue it, verily in that place baptisme must be before spirituall regeneration, because it is named in \( \overline{\text{t}} \) first place. For Christ doth teach that wee must be regenerate, not of the Spirit & water, but of water and the spirite.

28 Nowe this invincible reason where vpon they beare themselves so bolde, seemeth to be somewhat shaken: but because truth hath defence enough in simplicitie, I will not escape away with such light arguments. Therefore let them take with them a full aunfwere. Christ in this place giueth the cheefe commandement concerning Preaching of the Gospell, wherenunto he adjoineth the ministrie of baptisme as an addition hanging vpon it. Againe he speaketh none other wise of baptisme, but so farre as the ministration of it is vnder the office of teaching. For Christ sendeth the Apostles to publish the Gospell to all the nations of the worlde, that they should from eache where with the doctrine of salvation gather together into his kingdom men that before were lost. But whom or what manner of men? It is certaine that there is no mention but of them that are able to receive teaching. Afterwarde he addeth that such, when they are instructed, ought to be baptised, adioyning a promise, that they which beleue and are baptised shall be saved. Is there in all that saying so much as one syllable of infantes? What forme therefore of reasoning shall this be wherewith they affaile vs: they which are of grewen age, must first be instructed, that they may beleue, etc? they be baptised: therefore it is unlawfull to make baptisme common to infantes? Although they would burst themselves, they shall prooue nothing else by this place but that the gospell must be preached to them that are of capacitie able to heare it, before that they be baptised, forasmuch as he there speakest of such only. Let them hercelf, if they can, make a stoppe to debarre infantes from baptisme.

29 But that even blinde men also may with grappling finde out their deceites, I will point them out with a very cleare similitude. If any man cauill that infantes ought to haue meate taken from them, vpon this presence that the Apostle sufferrith none to eate but them that labor, shall hee not bee woorthise that all men should spit at him? Why so? Because he with difference drawdraweth that to all men, which was spoken of one kinde & one certaine age of men. No whit handsomer is their handling in this present cause. For, that which every man seeth to belong to one age alone, they draw to infants, that this age also may be subiect to the rule which was made for none but the that were more grown in yeares. As for the example of Chrift, it nothing vpholdeth their side. He was not baptised before that hee was thirtie yeares old. That is in deede true: but there is a reason thereof ready to be shewed: because he then purposed by his preaching to lay a sound foundatió of bap- tisme, or rather to flabill the foundation which had beene before layde of John. Therefore when he minded with his doctrine to institute baptism, to procure y greater authoritie to his institution, hee sanctified it with his owne bodie, and that in such fittenesse of time as was most convenient, namely whe he began his preaching. Finally, they shal gather nothing else hereof, but that baptisme take his original & beginning at the preaching of the Gospel. If they lift to appoint the thirteenthe yeare, why do they not keepe it, but do receiue every one to baptism as hee hath in their judgement sufficiently profited? yea & Seruettus one of their masters, when he suffey required this time, yet began at the 21 yeare of his age to boast himselfe to be a Prophet. As though he were to be suffred that taketh upon himselfe the place of a teacher in the church, before that he be a member of the church.

At the last they objeect, that there is no greater cause why baptism should be giuen to infants, than the Lordes supper, which yet is not granted them. As though the scripture did not euery way expresse a large difference. The same was in deede vfluallly done in the olde Church, as it appeareth by Cyprian and Augustine: but that manner is worthily grown out of vfe. For if wee consider the nature and properte of baptism, it is truely an entrie into the Church, and as it were a forme of admission, whereby we are adnum- bred into the people of God, a signe of our spirituall regeneration by which we are borne againe into the children of God: whereas on the other side the Supper is giuen to them that be more grown in age, which having passed tender infancy, are nowe able to beare strong meate. Which difference is verie evidently shewed in the Scripture. For there the Lord so much as per- taineth to baptism, maketh no choise of ages. But hee doeth not likewise giue the supper to all to take part of it, but onely to them which are fit to dif- cerne the bodie & bloud of the Lord, to examine their owne conscience, to declare the Lords death, to wey the power thereof. Woulde wee haue any thing plainer, than that which the Apostle teacheth whé he exhorteth that euery man should proue & examine himselfe, and then eate of this bread & drink of this cup? Therfore examination must go before, which should in vaine be looked for of infants. Againe, he that eateh unworthy, eateh & drinketh damnation to himselfe, not discerning the Lords bodie. If none can partake worthy but they that can well discern the holiness of the Lords bodie, why should we giue to our tender children, poufion in freede of liue- ly foode? What is that commandement of the Lorde, ye shal do it in re- membrance of mee? what is that other which the Apostle declareth from the same. So oft as ye shal eate of this bread, ye shall declare the Lords death till he come? What remembrance (I befeech you) shal we require.
although it grieueth me to lode the readers with a heape of trifles: yet it is abe worth the travaile briefly to wipe away such gay reasons as Seruettus not the least of the Anabaptistes, yea the great glorie of that company, thought himselfe to bring when he prepared himself to conuict. He alleageth, that Christes signes as they be perfect, so doe require them that be perfect or able to conceuue perfection. But the solution is easie: that the perfection of baptisme, which extendeth euен to death, is wrongfully restrained to one point of time. I say yet further, that perfection is foolishly required in man at the first day, wherunto baptisme alluere vs at our life long by continual degrees. He obiecteth that Christes signes were ordeined for remembrance, that every man should remember that hee was buried together with Christ. I answere that which hee hath fained of his owne head, needeth no confusion: yea y which he draweth to baptisme, Pauls wordes shewe to be proper to the holy Supper, that every man should examine himselfe; but of baptisme there is no where any such thing. Whereupon wee gather that they be rightly baptised which for their smallnesse of age, are not yet able to receive examination. Whereas he thirdly alleageth, that all they abide in death which beleue not the Sonne of God, and that the wrath of God abideth upon them: and therefore that infantes which cannot beleue lie in their damnation: I answere that Christ there speake not of the generall gilinesse wherewith all the potterie of Adam are enwrapped, but onely threateneth the desippers of the Gospel, which doe proudly and stubbornly refuse the grace offered them. But this nothing pertaineth to infants. Also I set a contrarie reason against them: that whomsoever Christ blesteth, he is dischargd from the curse of Adam and the wrath of God: Sith therefore it is known that infantes are blest of him, it followeth that they are dischargd from death. Then hee falsely citeth that which is nowhere red, that whoseoeuer is borne of the spirite, heareth the voice of the spirite. Which although we gaunt to be written, yet shall prooue nothing else but that the faithfull are framed to obedience, according as the spirite worketh in them. But that which is spoken of a certaine number, it is faulcic to drawe indifferently to all. Fourthly, he obiecteth: because that goth before which is natural, we must tarry ripe time for baptisme which is spirittual. But although I gaunt that all the potterie of Adam begotten of the flesh do from the verie wombe beare their owne damnation, yet I denye that that wistandeth but that God may presently bring remedie. For...
For neither shall Seruettus prove that there were many yeres appointed by God that the spirituall newnesse of life may beginne. As Paule testifieth, although they which are borne of the faith full are by nature damned; yet by supernatural grace they are saved. Then he bringeth foorth an allegorie, that Dauid going vp into the towre of Sion, did leade neither blind men nor lame men with him but strong souldiours. But what if I set a parable against it, wherein God calleth to the heavenly bankete blinde men and lame men: howe will Seruettus vvinde himselfe out of this knot? I ask also whether lame and maimed men hadde not first beene souldiours with Dauid. But it is superfluous to tary longer upon this reason, which the readers shall find by the holy historie to bee made of meere fallchoode. There followeth an other allegorie, that the Apostles were fishers of men, not of little children. But I ask, what that saying of Christ meaneth, that into the net of the Gop pel are gathered all kindes of fishes. But because I like not to play with allegories, I answer that when the office of teaching was enioyned to the Apostles, yet they were not forbidden from baptizing of infants. Howebeit I wold yet know, when the Euangelift nameth the Anthropous, men, (in which worde is comprehended all man kinde without exception) why they should deny infants to be men. Scenethly he allegeth, that fith spirituall things agree with spirituall, infants which are not spirituall, are also not meeke for baptism. But first it is plainely cuident, howe wrongfully they wreft the place of Paul. There is entreated of doctrine: when the Corinthians did too much stande in their owne conceite for vaine sharpenesse of witte, Paul rebuketh their sluggishnesse, for that they were yet to bee instructed in the first introductions of heavenly wisdome. Who can thereof gather that baptism is to be denied to infants, whom being begotten of the flesh God doth by free adoption make holy to himselfe? Whereas he sayth, that they must be fedde with spirituall meate, if they bee newe men, the solutio is eae, by baptism they are admitted into the flocke of Christe, and that the signe of adoption suffifeth them, till being grown to age they bee able to bare strong meate: that therefore the time of examination which GOD expressly requireth in the holy Supper, must be tarryd for. Afterwarde he obiecteth that Christ calleth all his to the holy Supper. But it is certayne enough that he admitte none, but them that bee already prepared to celebrate the remembrance of his death. Whereupon followeth that infants whom he vouchsafed to embrace, do stay in a fuerall and proper degree by themselves till they growe to age, and yet are not strangers. Whereas he sayth, that it is monfrous that a man after that he is borne, should not eate: I answer were that soules are otherwife fed than by the outwarde eating of the Supper: and that therefore Christe is neverthelesse meate to infants, al though they abftaine from the signe. But of baptism the cale is otherwise, by which onely the gate into the Church is opened to them. Against he obiecteth that a good Stewarde distributeth meate to the householde in due time. Which although I willingly grant: yet by what right will he appoint unto vs the certaine time of Baptisme, that he may proue that it is not giuen to infants out of time. Moreover he bringeth in that commandement of Christ to the Apostles, that they should make haft into the harvest, while While the fieldes waxe white, Verily Christ meaneth this onely, that the Apostles seeing the fruit of their labour present, should the more cheerfully prepare themselves to teach. Who shall therefore gather that the only time of harvest is the ripe time for baptism? His eleventh reason is, that in the first Church Christians and disciples were all one: but we see nowe that hee fondely reasoneth from the part to the whole. Disciples are called men of full age, which had beene already throughly taught, & had professed Christ: as itbehoued that the Lewes vnder the lawe should be the disciples of Moses: yet no man shall there of rightly gather, that infantes were strangers, whom the Lord hath testified to be of his householde. Beside these hee alleageth, that all Christians are brethren, in which number infantes are not vnto vs, so long as we debarre them from the Supper. But I returne to that principle, that none are heirs of the kingdom of heaven, but they that are the members of Christ: then, that the embracing of Christ was a true token of the adoption, whereby infantes are ioyned in common with full grown men, and that the abstaining for a time from the Supper withstanding not but that they pertain to the body of the Church. Neither did the thefe that was conuersted on the Croffe, ceaue to be brother of the godly, although hee never came to the Supper. Afterwarde hee addeth, that none is made our brother but by the Spirite of adoption, which is gien onely by the hearing of faith. I answerere, that hee still falleth back into the fame deceitsfull argument, because he overthwartly draweth that to infantes which was spoken onely of grown men. Paule teacheth there that this is Gods ordinarie manner of calling to bring his elect to the faith, when hee stirreth vp to them faithfull teachers, by whose ministrie & travaile hee reaches his hand to them. Who dare thereby appoint a lawe to him, but that he may by some other secret way graffe infantes into Christ? Where he obiegeth that Cornelius was baptised after that he had receiued the holy Ghost: howe wrongfully hee dooth out of one example gather a generall rule, appeareth by the Eunuch and the Samaritans, in whome the Lord kepe a contrarie order, that baptism went before the gifts of the Holy Ghost. The fiftenth reason is more than foolish. He sayeth that we are by regeneration made goddes: and that they be gods to whom the worde of God is spoken, which accordeth not to children that be infantes. Whereas hee faineth a Godheade to the faithfull, that is one of his dotages, which it perteineth not to this presente place to examine. But to wrest the place of the Psalm to so contrary a fense, is a point of desperate shamelesnesse. Christ sayeth, that Kings & Magistrates are called of the Prophet gods', because they beare an office appointed them of God. But, that which concerning the speciall commandement of governaunce is directed to certaine men, this handsonme expostour draweth to the doctrine of the Gospell, that hee may banishe infantes out of the Church. Againe he obiegeth, that infantes can not be accounted newe men, because they are not begotten by the worde. But I doe nowe agayne repeate that which I haue often sayde, that to regenerate vs doctrine is the uncorruptible seede, if wee be fitt to receive it: but when by reason of age there is not yet in vs aptnesse to learne, God keepeth his degrees of regenerating. Afterwarde he commeth backe to his allegories, that in the lawe a
As this goodnes, his name may be sanctifyed? Furthermoe he affirmeth that none can come to Christ, but they that have been prepared of John. As though John's office were not enduring but for a time. But, to omit this, truly that same preparation was not in the children whom Christ embraced & blest. Wherefore let him go with his false principle. At length he calleth for patrones Trismegistus and the Sibylles, to prove that holy washings pertaine not but to them that are of grown age. Lo how honorably he thinketh of the baptism of Christ, which he reduceth to the Ceremonies of the Gentiles, that it may be no otherwise ministred than pleaseth Trismegistus. But wee more esteeme the authoritie of God, whom it hath pleased to make infants holy to himselfe, and to admitte them with the holy signe, the force whereof they did not yet by age understand. Neither doe wee count it lawfull to borrowe out of the cleansings of the Gentiles any thing that may change in our baptism the everlafting and inviolable lawe of God, which he hath established concerning circumcision. Last of all, he maketh this argument: that if it be lawfull to baptise infants without understanding, then baptism may enterlude-like and in sport be ministred of boys when they play. But of this matter let him quarel with God by whose commandement circumcision was common to infants before that they had attained understanding. Was it therefore a playing matter, or subject to the follies of children, that they might overthrowe the holy ordinance of God? But it is no marueile that these reprobate Spirites, as though they were vexed with a phrensie, dothrue in all the grossest absurdities for defence of their errors: because God doth with such giddinesse lustly take vengeance of their pride and stubbornnesse. Verily I trust I haue made plain with how feeble succors Serucetius hath holpen his silly brethren the Anabaptists.

32. Nowe I thinke it will be doubtfull to no sober man, howe rashly they trouble the church of Christ, that moue brawles and contentions for baptism of infants. But it is profitable to consider, what Satan goeth about with this so great tumulte; even to take away from vs the singular fruit of affiance and spiritual joy which is to be gathered hereof, and to diminiath as much also of the glorie of the goodnesse of God. For howe sweete is it to godly minde, to be certified not onely by worde, but also by sight to be seene with eyes, that they obtaine so muche favoure with the heauenly father, that hee hath also care of their postcritie? For here it is to be seene, howe hee taketh upon him the person of a most prouident Father of householde towarde vs, which euen after our death doeth not lay away his carefulnesse of vs, but prouideth and foreseyth for our children. Ought we not here after the example of Dauid with al our heart to lice vp vnto thanksgiving, that by such swhe of his goodnes, his name may be sanctified? This, verily Satan intendeth, in affailing with so great armes the baptism of infants; namely, that this testifying of the grace of God being taken away, the promise which by it is present before our eyes, may at length by like & little vanish away. Whereupon we should growe not only a wicked vnthankfulness toward the mercie of God, but also a certaine slothfulness in instructing our children to godlineffe. For by this spurre we are not a little pricked forward to bring them vp in the earnest feare of God and in the keeping of his lawe, when we consider that euery immediately from their birth, he taketh and acknowledgeth them for his children. Wherefore vnlesse we lift enuiously to darken the bountifulnesse of God, let vs offer to him our children, to whome he giueth a place among them that be of his familie and housholde, that is to say, the members of the Church.

The xvii. Chapter.
Of the holy Supper of Christ: and vvhatis availeth vs.

After that God hath once received vs into his familie, and not onely to take vs as his servants, but as his children: that he may fulfill the office of a most good father, and carefull for his issue, he taketh also vppon him to nourish vs throughout the whole course of our life. And not contented therewith, it pleased him by a pledge giuen to assure vs of this continuall liberaitie. To this ende therefore he hath giuen his Church an other Sacrament by the hande of his onely begotten Sonne, namely a spiritual banke, wherein Christ testifieth himselfe to be the quickning bread, wherewith our soules are fed to true and blessed immortallitie. But forasmuch as the knowledge of so great a mysticke is verie necessarie, and according to the greatnesse thereof, requirith a diligent declaration: and Satan, that he might bereave the Church of this inestimable treasure, hath long ago spread mistes, and since that time darknesse, to obscure the light of it, and then hath stirred strifes and battales that might estrange the minde of the simple from tating of this holy foode, and hath also in our time attempted the same craft: therefore when I shall haue briefly knit vp the summe for the capacitie of the vnlearned, I will vndo those knottes, wherewith Satan hath endeavoured to snare the world. First, bread and wine are signes, which represent unto vs the invisibl foode, which wee receiue of the flesh and bloud of Christ. For as in baptisme God againe begynning vs doeth graffe vs into the fellowship of his Church, and by adoption doeth make vs his owne: so wee haue saide that he perfourmeth the office of a prouident Father of household, in this that he continually ministreth vs meate, that he sustaine and preferueath vs in that life whereinto he hath by his worde begotten vs. Nowe the onely meate of our soule is Christ, and therefore the heavenly Father calleth vs to him, that being refreshed with common partaking of him, wee may from time to time gather liuely force, vntil wee attaine to heauenly im-ortalitie. But forasmuch as this mysticke of the secrete vniiting of Christ with the godly is by nature impossible to be comprehended, he giueth the figure and image thereof in visible signes most fit for our small capacitie: yea, as it were by carnetnes and tokens giuen, hee maketh it so assured unto vs as if it were seene with our eyes, because this so familiar a similitude entret even into the grossest minde, that soules are so fed with Christ, as bread and wine do sustaining the bodily life. Nowe therefore wee have it declared, so what end this mystical blessing tendeth, namely to assure vs, that the bodie of the Lorde was so once offered for vs, that we nowe eate it, and in eating it do seale in vs the effectual working of that onely sacrifice: that his bloud was so once shed for vs, that it is vs to continual drinke. And so found the words of the promise there adioyned. Take, this is my bodie, which is delivered for you. The body therefore which was once offered vp for our saluation, we are commancked to take and eate; that when we see our soules to be made partakers of this, wee may certainly determine that the power of his death which bringeth life shalbe effectual in vs. Whereupon also he calleth the cup, the covenant in his bloud. For after a certaine manner it reneweth, or rather continueth the covenant which he hath once established with his bloud, so much as pertaineth to the confirming of our faith, so oft as he reacheth vs, that holy bloud to be tasted of.

2 A great fruit verily of affiance and sweetenesse may godly soules gather of this Sacrament, because they have a witnesse, that we are growe together into one bodie with Christ, so that whatsoever is his we may call ours. Hereupon followeth that we may boldly promise vs to our soules, that everlafting life is ours, whereof he is heire: and that the kingdom of heauen, whereinto he is now entred, can no more fall away from vs than from him; againe that we cannot now be condemned by our soules, from the giltines whereof he hath acquired vs, when he willed them to be imputed to himself as if they were his owne. This is the maruellous exchange, which of his inmeasurabyl bountifullnes he hath made with vs; that he being made with vs the sonne of man, hath made vs with him the soules of God: that by his comming downe into earth, he hath made vs a way to go vp into heauen: that putting vpon him our mortalitie, he hath giuen vs his immortalitie: y taking on him our weakenesse, he hath strengthened vs with his power: that taking our povertie to himselfe, he hath conueyed his riches to vs: that taking to him the weight of our vnrighteousnes, wherewith we were oppressed, he hath clothed vs with his righteousnesse.

3 Of all these things we have so full a witnesing in this Sacrament, that wee must certainly determine, that Christ is truly giuen vs, as if Christ himselfe were set present before our eyes, and handled with our hands. For this worde can neither lie to vs, nor mocke vs: Take, eate, drinke: this is my bodie which is delivered for you; this is the bloud, which is shed into the forgiuenesse of soules. Whereas he commandeth to take, he signifieth that it is ours. Whereas he commandeth to eate, he signifieth that that is made one substance with vs. Whereas he faith of the bodie, that it is delivered for vs: of the bloud, that it is shed for vs: therein he teacheth that both are not so much his as ours; because hee tooke and laide away both, not for his commoditie, but to our saluation. And truely it is to bee diligently marked, that the chiefe and in a maner whole pith of the Sacrament standeth in these worde, Which is delivered for you, Which is shed for you, For otherwise it should not much profit vs, that the bodie and bloud of our Lord are nowe distributed, unless they had beene once giuen forth for our redemption. and salvation. Therefore they are represented under bread and wine, that we should learn that they are not only ours, but also ordained for the nourishment of spiritual life. This is it that wee before sayde, that from the corporall things which are shewed foorth in the Sacraments, we are by a certaine proportionall relation guided to spirituall things. So when bread is giuen vs for a signe of the bodie of Christ, we ought by & by to conceive this similitude: As bread nouriseth, suiteth, and maintaineth the life of our bodie: so the bodie of Christ is the onely meane to quicken and giue life to our soule. When wee see wine set foorth for a signe of his bloud: wee must call to minde what vses wine bringeth to the body, that wee may consider that the same are brought to vs spiritually by the bloud of Christ: those vses be, to cherish, to refresh, to strengthen, to make mery. For if wee sufficiently wexe, what the delivering of this holy bodie, what the shedding of this holy bloud, hath profited vs: we shall plainly perceive that these things which are spoken of bread and wine, according to such proportionall relation doe verie well accord with them towaarde vs when they are communicated vnto vs.

4 Therefore the chiefe partes of the Sacrament are not simply and without hier consideration to reach to vs the bodie of Christ: but rather that same promise, whereby he testifieth, that his flesh is verily meat, & his bloud is drinke, with which we are fed into eternall life: whereby he affirmeth himselfe to be the面包 of life; of which who so eateth, he shall live for ever: to scale (I say) and confirm that promise: and for bringing the same to passe, to send vs to the cross of Christ, where that promise hath beene truly performed, and in all points fulfilled. For we do not well and healthfully eate Christ but crucified, when we do with lively conceit perceive the effectualnes of his death. For whereas he called himselfe the bread of life, he did not borrow that name of the sacrament, as some do wrongfully expound it: but because he was giuen vs such of the Father, and performed himselfe such, when being made partaker of our humane mortality, he made vs partners of his divin immortalitie: when offering himselfe for sacrifice, he tooke our accurs'd clefsse upon himselfe, that he might fill vs with blessing, when with his death he drowned and swallowed vp death; when in his resurrection he raifed vp this our corruptible flesh which he had put on, to glorie and vn-corruption.

5 It remaineth that by appliance all the same may come to vs. That is done, both by the Gospell, and more clearly by the holy Supper, where both he offereth himselfe to vs with all his good things, and wee receive him by faith. Wherefore the sacrament maketh not that Christ first beginneth to be the bread of life: but when it bringeth into remembrance, that he was made the bread of life, which we continually eate, and when it giueth vnto vs the taste and favoure of that bread, then it maketh vs to feel the strength of that bread. For it promiseth vs, that whatsoever Christ did or suffred, the same was done to giue life to vs. Then, that this giuing of life is everlasting, by which wee may without ende be nourished, sustaine, and preferred in life. For as Christ should not have beene to vs the bread of life, vnlesse hee had beene borne and had died for vs, vnlesse hee had risen againe for vs:
so noe he should not be the same vnlesse the effectualnesse and fruitie of his birth, death and resurrection, were an everlasting and immortall thing. All which Christ hath very well expressed in these wordes: The bread which I will giue, is my flesh, which I wil giue for $ life of the world. By which words without doubt he signifieth, that his body should therefore be to vs for bread, to the spiritual life of the soule, because it should be giuen forth to death for our salvation: and that it is deliuered to vs to eate of it, when by faith he maketh vs partakers of it. Once therefore he gave it, that he might be made bread, when he gave forth himselfe to be crucified for the redemption of the world: daily he giueth it, when by the wordes of the Gospel he offereth it vs to vs to be receiued, so farre as it was crucified: where he sealeth that deliuerance with the holy mysterie of the Supper: where he inwardly fulfilleth that which he outwardly betokeneth. Nowe herein we must beware of two faultes, that neither doing too much in abasing the signes, we seeme to pluck them from their mysteries: to which they are in a maner knitte fast: nor that being immeasurable in aduaning the same, we seeme in the mean time somewhat to darken the mysteries themselves. That Christ is the breade of life, wherewith the faithfull are nourished into eternall salvation, there is no man but he granteth, vnlesse he be altogether without religio. But this point is not likewise agreed upon among all men, what is the maner of partaking of him. For there be that in one worde define that to eate the flesh of Christ, and to drinke his bloud, is nothing els but to beleue in Christ himselfe. But I thinke that Christ meant some certainer and hier thing, in that notable ser -mon where he commendeth to vs the eateing of his flesh: namely, that wee are quickned by the true partaking of him: which also he therefore expresse d by the wordes of eating and drinking, least any man shoulde thinke, that the life which we receiue of him is conceiued by bare knowledge onely. For as not the sight, but the eating of bread suffiseth the body for nourishment: so it behoueth that the soule be truely & throughly made partaker of Christ, that by the power of him it may be quickened into a spiritual life. But in the mean time we confesse ye there is no other eating, but of faith: as there can no other be imagined. But this is the difference betweene my words and theirs, that with them to eate is only to beleue: but I say ye the flesh of Christ is eaten with beleuing, because by faith he is made ours, and I say that eateing is the fruitie and effect of faith. Or, if you will haue it plaine, with them eareing is faith: and I thinke it rather to folowe of faith. In wordes verily the difference is but small: but in the thing itselfe, not small. For though the Apostle teacheth that Christ dwelleth in our heartes by Fayth: yet no man will expounde this dwelling to be faith: but all men doe perceiue that there is expressed a singular effect of faith, for that by it the faithfull doe obtaine to haue Christ dwelling in them. After this maner, the Lorde meant, in calling himselfe the bread of life, not only to teach that in the faith of his death and resurrection, salvation is reposed for vs; but also that by true partaking of himselfe it is brought to paffe, that his life passeth into vs, and becommeth ours, like as bread, when it is taken for foode, miniftereth liueliness to the body.

6 Neither did Augustine, whom they bring in for their patrone, in any Other meaning write that we eate by beleauing, than to shewe that this eateing is of faith, not of the mouth. Which I alfo denie not: but yet therewithall I addde, that we doe by faith embrace Christ, not appearing a farre of, but making him selue one with vs, that he may be our head, and we his members. Yet doe not I vterly dilawle that manner of speaking: but onely I denie it to be a full declaration, if they mean to define what it is to eate the fleche of Christ. Otherwife I fee that Augustine hath offyled this forme of speeche: as when he sayeth in the thirde booke Of Christian doctrine, Vnleffe ye eate the fleche of the sonne of man: this is a figure teaching that wee must communiate with the passion of the Lorde, and must sweetely and profitably lay yppe in remembrance that for vs his fleche was cruicified and wounded. Againe when he sayeth, that the three thousande men whiche were converted at Peters sermon, did drinke the bloud of Christ by beleauing, which they hadde shedde by cruell dealing. But in many other places he honorably setteth out that benefite of faith, that by it our soules are no leffe refreshed with the communicating of the fleche of Christ, then our bodies are with the breade which they eate. And the same is it: which in a certaine place Chryfoftome wryteth, that Christ doeth not onely by sayth, but also in deede make vs his body. For he meaneth not that we doe from any other where than from faith, obtaine such a benefite: but this onely he meaneth to exclude, that none when hee heareth faith to bee named, should conceiue a naked imagination. As for them that wil haue the Supper to be only a marke of outward profession, I do now passe them ouer: because I thinke I haue sufficiently confuted their error, when I entreated of Sacramentes generally. Onely this thing let the readers marke, that when the cup is called the covenant in the bloude, there is a promife expresst that may be of force to conforme faith. Whereupon followeth, that vnleffe wee haue respect to God, and embrace that which he offereth, wee doe not rightly vse the holy Supper.

Moreover they alfo do not satisifie me, which acknowledging that we haue some communie with Christ, when they mean to express it, do make vs partakers onely of the Spiritie, without making any mention of fleche and bloude. As though all those things were spoked of nothing, that his fleche is verily eate, that his bloude is verily drinke: that none hath life, but hee that eate that fleche, and drinketh that bloude: and such other sayninges that belong to the same ende. Wherefore if it bee certaine that the full communicating of Christ proceedeth beyond their descrip: ito, as it is too narowly straine: I will nowe goe aboute to knit vp in fewe wordes, howe large it is and howe farre it extendeth it selfe, before that I paie of the contrarie fault of excessse. For I shall haue a longer disputation with the excessfull teacheers, which, when according to their owne grossnesse they frame a maner of eating and drinking full of absurditie, doe also tranfigure Christ stripped out of his fleche into a fantasie: if yet a man may with any wordes comprehende so greate a mysterie, which I see that I can not sufficiently comprehend with minde: and therefore I doe willingly confess, that no man shoulde measure the hinesse thereof by the small proportion of my childishnesse. But rather I exhorte the readers, that they do not restraine the sente of their minds within these too narrow bounds: but endeavour to rise vp much higher, than they can by my guiding. For I my selfe, so oft as I speake of this thing, when I have trauelled to say all, thinke that I haue yet faide but little in respect of the wonderful thereof. And although the minde can doe more in thinking than the tongue in expressing: yet with greatneffe of the thing, the minde also is surmounted and ouerwhelmed. Finally therefore nothing remaineth, but I must breake forth into admiration of that mysterie, which neither the minde can suffice to thinke of, nor the tongue to declare. Yet after such manner as I can, I will set forth the summe of my sentence; which as I nothing doubt to be true, so I trust that it will not be disallowed of godly heartes.

8 First of all, wee are taught out of the scripture, that Christ was from the beginning that life bringing worde of the Father, the fountaine and original of life, from whence all things euery receiued their hauing of life. Wherefore John sometime calleth him the worde of life, and sometime writeth that life was in him: meaning that hee euery then flowing into all creatures, pouered into them the power of breathing & luing. Yet the fame John addeth afterward, that the life was then and not till then openly theewed, whē the Sonne of God taking vpou him our fleefe, gauε him felfe to be seene with eyes and felt with handes. For though he did before also spread abroad his power into the creatures: yet because man, being by sinne estranged from God, hauing loft the communion of life, lawe on euery fide death hanging ouer him: that he might recouer hope of immortality, it behooved that he shoule be recouered into the communion of that worde. For howe small a confidence maieft thou conceive thereof, if thou heare the word of God in deed, from which thou art most farre remoued, conteine in it felfe the fulneffe of life, but in thy felfe and rounde about thee nothing offereth it felfe and is present before thine eyes but death? But since that fountaine of life beganne to dwell in our fleshe, nowe it be not a farre off hidden from vs, but presently deliuereth it felfe to be partaken of vs. Yea and it maketh the very fleshe, wherein it resteth, to bee of power to bring life to vs, that by partaking thereof we may bee ledde to immortality. I am (faie hee) the bread of life, y am come downe from heauen. And the bread which I will giue is my fleshe, which I will giue for the life of the worlde. In which wordes he teacheth, not onely that he is life, in respect that hee is the eternall worde of G O D which came downe to vs from heauen, but that in comming downe he pouered the fame power into the fleshe which he did put on, that from thence the communicatig of life might flowe soure vnto vs. Hereupon also these things nowe follow, that his fleshe is verily meat, and his blood is verily drinke, with which sustenances the faithfull are fostered into eternall life. Herein therefore consisteth singular comfort to the godly, y noe they finde life in their owne fleshe. For so they doe not onely with eafe pasfage atteince vnto it, but haue it of it felfe laid abroad for them and offering it felfe vnto them. Onely let them hold open the boforme of their heart y: they may embrace it being present, and they shall obtaine it.

9 But although the fleshe of Christ haue not so great power of it felfe, that it can giue life to vs, which both in the owne first estate of it was sub-left to mortality, and now being endued with immortality, liueth not by it selfe: yet it is rightfully called life bringing, which is filled with fulnesse of life to pour it into vs. In which meaning I doe with Cyril expounde that saying of Chrift: as the father hath life in himselfe, so hee hath also given to the fonne to have life in himselfe. For there he properly speaketh of his gifts, nor which hee from the beginning possessed with the father, but with which he was garnished in the fame fleshe in which he appeared. Therefore hee sheweth that in his manhood also dwelleth the fulnesse of life, that whosoever partakest of his fleshe and bloode, may therewithall also enjoy the partaking of life. Of what fort that is, we may declare by a familiar example. For as out of a fountaine water is sometime dronke, sometime is drawn, sometime by forrowes is condueted to the watering of groundes, which yet of it selfe doeth not ouerflow into so manie vses, but from the verie spring itselfe which with euerlasting flowing yeeldeth and miniftreth vnto it from time to time newe abundance: so the fleshe of Chrift is like a rich and unwafted fountaine which poureth into vs the life springing from the Godhead into it selfe. Nowe who seeth not, that the communion of the fleshe and bloode of Chrift is necessearie to all that aspire to heauenly life? Hereunto tendeth that saying of the Apostle, that the Church is the body of Chrift and the fulfilling of it: and that he is the head out of which the whole body coupled and knit together by ioynites maketh encrease of the body: that our bodies are the members of Chrift. All which things we understand to be impossible to be brought to passe, but that hee must wholly cleave to vs in Spirit and body. But that most neere fellowship whereby we are coupled with his fleshe, hee hath yet let us with a more glorious title, when he saide that we are members of his bodie, and are of his bones and of his fleshe. At the last to declare it to be a matter greater than all wordes, he concludeth his saying with an exclamacion, This is (faith hee) a great secret. Therefore it should be a point of extreme fulnesse to acknowledge no communion of the faithfull when the fleshe and bloode of the Lorde, which the Apostle declareth to bee so great, that hee had rather wonder at it than express it.

10 Let the summe bee, that our soules are so fedde with the fleshe and bloode of Chrift, as breade and wine doe maintaine and sustaine the bodily life. For otherwise the proportionall relation of the signe shoulde not agree, vnlesse soules did finde their foode in Chrift. Which can not be done, vnlesse Chrift doe truely growe into one with vs, and refuseth vs with the eating of his fleshe and drinking of his bloode. But although it seeme incredible, that in so great distance of places the fleshe of Chrift reacheth to vs that it may bee meete to vs: let vs remember howe much the secrete power of the spiritue fummounteth above all our senses, and howe soothe it is to goe about to measure his vnmeasurablenesse by our measure. That therefore which our minde comprehendeth not, let our faith concieve, that the spiritue truely kniteth in one those things that are scattered in places. Nowe that same holy communicating of his bodie and bloode, whereby Chrift powreth his life into vs, even as it bee pearced it into our bones and marowes, hee in the upper Supper also testifieth and sealeth: and that not with setting before vs a vaine or voyde signe, but bringing forth there the effectuall working of his spirit whereby he fulfilleth that which he promiseth. And verily he there offreth & deluereth the thing signified to all them that sit at that spirituall banke: although it be receiued with fruit of the faithfull only, which receive fo great bountifulnesse with true faith and thankfulnessesse of minde. After which manner the Apostles sayde, that the bread which we breake is the communion of the bodie of Christ: and that the cuppe which wee hallowe with the worde and prayers to that purpose, is the communion of his bloud. Neither is there any cause why any man should obie, that it is a figuratiue speeche, by which the name of the thing signified is giuen to the signe. I graunt verily that the breaking of the bread is a signe, not the thing it selfe. But this being admitted, yet we find rightly gather of the deliuereance of the signe, that the thing it selfe is deliuere. For vnlesse a man will call God a deceiuer, he can never be fo bolde to saue that hee seteth before vs an emptie signe. Therefore if by the breaking of bread the Lorde doth truely represent the partaking of his body, it ought to be out of doubt that he truely performeth and deluereth it. And this rule is alway to be holden of the godly, that fo oft as they see the signes ordained of the Lord, they certainly think and perswade themselves that the trueth of the thing signified is here present. For to whatsoever should the Lorde deliuere to thee into thy hande the signe of his body, but to assure thee of the true partaking of it? If it be true, that a visible signe is giuen vs, to seale the gift of an insuible thing: when wee receiue the signe of the bodie, let vs no lesse certainly beleue that the body it selfe also is giuen vs.

I say therefore (which both hath bin alway receiued in the Churche, and all they teach at this day that think right) that the holy mysterie of the Supper consisteth of two thinges: that is to say, of the bodily signes, whiche beeing set before our eyes doe repreuent unto vs insuible thinges according to the capacitie of our weakenesse: and of spirituall trueth, which is by those signes both figured and deliuere. Of what sort that is, when I meane to shewe it familiarie, I vfe to set three thinges: the signification, the matter which hangeth of signification, the vertue or effect which foloweth of both. The signification consisteth in the promises, which are after a certaine manner wrapped together with the signe. The matter of substance I call Christ with his death and resurrection. By effect I understand the redemption, righteousnesse, sanctification, and eternall life, and whatsoever other benefites Christ bringeth vs. Now although all these thinges haue respect to faith: yet I leaue no place to this caullation: as though when I say that Christ is receiued by faith, I would haue him conceiued with understanding only and imagination. For the promises offer him, not that wee should sticke fast in the fight alone and in bare knowledge: but that we shoule enjoy the true communicating of him. And truely I see not how any man may haue confidence that he hath redemption and righteousnesse in the crosse of Christ, and life in his death, but principally standing vpon the true communion of Christes himselfe. For those good thinges shoule not come to vs, vnlesse Christ first made himselfe ours. I say therefore, that in the mysterie of the Supper, by the signes signes of bread and wine Christ is truly delivered to vs, yea and his body and bloud, in which he hath fulfilled al obedience for purchasing of righteounes to vs: namly first we shou'd grow together into one body with him: & then being made partakers of his substance, we may also seele his power in the communicating of all his good things.

12 Now I come down to the excellece mixtures, which superstition hath brought in. For herein Satan hath played with maruelous futtetie, that withdrawing the minde of men from heauen, he might fill them with peruerfe errour, as though Christ were fastened to the element of brede. And first we must not dreame such a presence of Christ in the Sacrament, as the craftsmen of the court of Rome have fained: as though the body of Christ were made present with presence of place, to be handled with hands, to bee brooed with teeth, and swallowed with mouth. For this forme of recantation Pope Nicolas endited to Berengarius, to bee a witnffe of his repentance: namely with words fo farre monstruous, that the author of the glofe crieth out, there is danger, if the readers do not wisely take heed to them-selves, leaft they should fuckle out of them an herefie worse than was that of Berengarius. In the seconde distinction, in the Chapter beginning thus, Ego Berengarius. But Peter Lombarde, although he trauaile much in excuting the absurditie, yet more inclineth to the contrary sentence. For as wee nothing doubt that it hath limites according to the perpetuall nature of the bodie of men, and is holden in heauen, into which it was once receiued, vntil hee returne to judgement: so to drawe it bacze vnder these corruptible elements or to imagine it present euer where, we account it to be vitrallly vn-lawfull. Neither verily is it fo necedful to this that we may enjoy the partaking of it: forasmuch as the Lorde giueth vs this benefit by his Spirit, that we be made one with him in body, Spirit, and soule. The bonde therefore of this conioyning is the spirit of Christ, by the knitting whereof we are coupled together, and as it were a certaine conduit, by which whatsoever Christ himselfe both is & hath, is conueyed to vs. For if we beholde the same shining forth with his beames vpon the earth after a certaine manner to caft forth his substance vnto it to engender, nourifhe, and quicken the fruites thereof: why should the extending of beames of the Spirite of Christ bee inferior to conuey the communion of his fleth and bloud into vs? Wherefore the Scripture, when it speaketh of our partaking with Christ, referreth the whole force thereof to the Spirite. Yet in neede of many, one place shall be sufficient. For Paul in the eight Chapter to the Romanes, sayth that Christ dwelleth in vs none otherwised than by his Spirite: whereby yet hee taketh not away that communion of his flethe and bloud of which we nowe speake, but teacheth that the Spirite alone worketh that we possesse whole Christ and haue him dwelling in vs.

13 The schoolemen thought more flamefally which were witholden with horror of so barbarous vngodlinesse. Yet they also themselves do nothing but mocke with futtler deceites. They graunt that Christ is not contained there by way of circumfcription nor after a bodily manner: but afterward they invent a way, which neither themselves doe understand, nor they can declare to other: yet it is such as falleth to this pointe that Christe must be sought in the forme of breade as they call it. For what is it? When they say that the substance of bread is turn'd into Chrift, doe they not fatten him to the whitenes which they there leaue? But (say they) he is so contained in the Sacrament, that he abideth in heaven: and we determine no other presence but of habitude. But whatfoever wordes they bring in to clooke it with a deceitfull colour, this is the ende of all, that that is by confecration made Chrift, which before was bread: that from thence forth Chrift lieth hid under that couer of bread. Which alfo they are not ashamed in plaine wordes to expresse. For these be the wordes of Lombarde: that the body of Chrift, which in it selfe is visible, when the confection is ended, lieth hidden and is couered under the forme of bread. So the forme of that bread is nothing else but a visiour, that taketh away the sight of the flesh from the eies. Neither neede we many conjectures, to finde what shares they minded to lay with these wordes, with the thing it selfe plainely speake it. For it is to be scene with howe great superstition in certaine ages past, not onely the common fort of men, but alfo the verie cheefe of them haue bene holden, and at this day be holden in popishe Churches. For hauing little care of true faith (by which alone we both come into the fellowship of Chrift, and doe cleave together with him) to that they haue a carnal presence of him, which they haue framed beside the wordes, they thinke that they haue him present enough. Therefore in a summe, we se, that this hath ben gotten by this wittie furtlety, that bread was taken for God.

14 From hence proceeded ye same fained tranfubftantiation, for which at this day they figh more earnestly than for all the other articles of their faith. For the firft builders of that local presence could not vnwinde themselves from this doubt howe the bodie of Chrift shoulde be mingled with ye substance of breade, but that by and by many abfurdtities did thrift the felues in place. Therefore they were driven of necessitie to fece to this invention, that there is made a turning of breade into the body: not that the body is properly made to God, but because Chrift ye he might hide himselfe under the forme, bringeth the substance to nothing. But it is meruellous, ye they fell to so great ignorance, yea feneleffe dunelle, that not only ye scripture but alfo the content of ye olde Church fighting againft it, they brought abroad that monfter. I grant indeed that some of the olde writers sometime vfed the name of turning: not for that they would destroy the substance in ye outwarde signes, but that they might teach that the bread dedicate to ye mystere differeth farre from common bread and is now other. But eche where they alplainely declare, that the holy supper consisteth of two partes, an earthlie part, and a heauenlie: and the earthlie part they do without controversie expound to be bread and wine. Truely whatsoeuer they babble, it is plain that in confirming of this doctrine they want the defence of antiquitie, which they oftentimes presume to set against the evident wordes of God. For it is not fo long agoe since it was inuented: it was verily unknowne not only to those better ages, in which ye purer doctrine of religion yet flourished, but also even when that fame pureneffe was much defiled. There is none of the olde writers ye doth not in expresse wordes confesse ye holy signes in the Supper are bread and wine: although, as we haue faide, they sometime set it

it out with diverse titles, to aduance the dignitie of y mysterie. For whereas they say y in the consecration is made a secrete turning, that now it is an other thing than bread and wine: I haue euene nowe giuen warning y they do not thereby meane the things them selves are brought to nought, but that they are now to be otherwise esteemed than common meates, which are appointed onely to feede the belly: forasmuch as in them is deliuered to vs the spiritual meat and drinke of the soule. This wee alfo deny not. If (lay these men) there bee a turning, it must needs be that there is of one thing, made an other thing. If they meane that there is some thing made which before was not, I agree with them. If they will drawe it to that their owne imagina tion, let them answere me what change they thinke to be made in baptisme.
For herein the fathers alfo do determin in a maruellous turning, when they say that of a corruptible element is made a spiritual washing of y soule, yet none of them demierh that water remaineth. But (say they) there is no such thing in baptisme, as is y in the supper. This is my body. As though the question were of those wordes, which haue a meaning plaine enough: and not rather of that worde of turning, which ought to signifie no more in the Supper than in baptisme. Therfore farewell they with these fnares of syllables, whereby they doe nothing else but bewray their owne hungrineffe. For otherwise the signification would not agree together vnlesse the trueth which is there figured, had a liuely image in outward signe. Christes will was by the outward signe to testifye that his fleth is meate. If hee did set before vs onely an emptie imaginatiue forme of bread not true bread, where were the correlatiō or similitude which should lead vs from the visible thing to the invisible? For, that all things may agree together, the signification shall extende no further, but that we be fedde with the forme of the fleth of Christ. As, if in baptisme the forme of water shoulde deceiue our eyes, it shoulde not bee to vs. a certaine pledge of our wafting: yea by that deceitful fhe woulde shoulde bee giuen vs an occasion of wauering. Therfore the nature of the Sacrament is ouerthrown, vnlesse in the maner of signifying the earthly signe aunswer to y heavenly thing. And therefore we loose the trueth of this mysterie, vnlesse true bread represent to vs the true body of Christ. I repeat it againe: Sith y Supper is nothing else, than a visible testifying of that promife which is in the first Chapter of Iohn, namely that Christ is the breade of life, which came downe from heauen: there must be visible bread vsed for a meane, whereby y came spiritual bread may be figured: vnlesse we will that wee loose all the fruit which in this behalfe God tenderly grancteth to sustaine our weaknesses. Now by what reason shoulde Paul gather, that al we are one body and one bread, which doe together partake of one bread, if there remained onely an imaginatiue forme and not rather a natural trueth of bread?

15 But they could neuer haue beene so fowly beguiled with y deceites of Satan, but becaufe they were already bewitched with this errour, that the body of Christ contained vnder bread was by the bodily mouth sent downe into the belly. The cause of so brutish imagination was, that consecration signified as much among them as a magickall enchauntment. But this principle was drawn to them, that bread is a sacrament to none but to men, to whom the worde it directed: like as y water of baptisme is not changed in it if selfe, but so soone as the promise is adioun'd, it beginneth to be that to vs which it before was not. This shall better appeare by example of a like Sacrament. The water springing out of the rocke in the desert was to the fathers a token and signe of the same thing, which the wine doeth figure to vs in the Supper. For Paul teacheth that they drunke the same spiritual drink. But it was a common watering for the beasts and carkel of the people. Wherupon it is easilie gathered, that in earthly elements, when they are applied to a spirituall vs, there is made no other turning but in respect of men, in so much as they are to them feales of the promises. Moreover sith Gods purpose is (as I often reapeate) as it were by handsome chariots to lift vs vp to himselfe, they do by their waywardnesse wickedly dispoint the same, which do in deede call vs to Christ, but lurking invisibly under bread. For it is not possible that the minde of men, vncombring it selfe from the immeasurableblenes of places, should attaine to Christ even above the heavens. That which nature denied them, they attempted to amende with a more hurtfull remedie: that abiding in earth, we should neede no heavenly neereenesse of Christ. Loe, this is the neccessitie, that compelled them to transfigure the bodye of Christ. In Bernardes time, although a harder maner of speaking was grown in vs, yet transubstantiation was not then known. And in all ages before that, this similitude did flye about in euery mans mouth, that there is with bread and wine a spiritual thing joyned in this mysterie. Of the words they aunfwere, as they thinke, wittily: but bringing nothing fit for this present caufe. The rod of Moses (say they) being turned into a Serpent, although it did get the name of a Serpent, yet keepeth still the old name, & is called a rod. So in their opinion it is as probable, that although the bread passe into a newe substance, it may be abusively and yet not vnaply called that which it appeareth to the eyes. But what likelihood or neereenesse finde they betwene a cleare miracle, and their fained illusion, of whiche no eye in earth is witnesse? The Magicians had mocked with deceits, so that the Egyptians were perswaded, that they excelled in divine power to change creatures about the order of nature. Moses came forth, and driving away all their deceites, shewed that the inuincible power of God was on his side, because his own rod confumed at the rest. But forasmuch as that was a turning discernable with eyes, therefore as we haue said, it pertaineth nothing to this present caufe: and in a little time after, the rod visibly returned into his own forme. Beside that it is not known, whether that sudden turning was of substance or no. Also the alluding to the rods of the Magicians is to be considered, which the Prophet therefore would not call Serpents, but he should seeme to signifie a turning where none was: because those deceivers had done nothing but cast a myst before the eyes of the beholders. What likeenesse herewith haue these forms of speeche, The bread which we brake, So oft as ye shall eate this bread, They communicated in breaking of bread, & such other? It is certaine that their eyes were onely deceipted with the enchauntment of the Magicians. As concerning Moses, the matter is more doutfull, by whose hand it was no more hard for God to make of a rod a Serpent, & againe of a Serpent to make a rod, than to cloth Angels with fleshly bodies, and by and by after to vnclotth them. If the nature of this mysterie were were the same or like, there were some colour for their solution. Let this therefore remaine certaine, that it is not truely nor fitly promisst that in the Supper the flesh of Christ is truely to vs for meate, vnlesse the true substance of the outward signe agree with it. And (as one errour growth of another) the place of Jeremie is so foolishly wrested to procure transubstantiation, that it ticketh me to rehearse it. The Prophet complaineth that wood is put in his bread: meaning that by the cruelty of his enemies, his bread was infected with bitterness. As David with a like figure bewaileth that his meate was corrupted with gall, and his drinke with vinegar. These men wil have it that the body of Christ was by way of allegorie fastened to the crosse. But some of the old fathers thought so. As though wee ought not rather to pardon their ignorance, and to burie their shame, than to addc shamelesnes to compell them yet still to fight like enemies with the natural meaning of the Prophet.

16 Other, which see that the proportionall relation of the signe & the thing signified, can not be overthrown, but that the truth of the mystery must fall, do confess that the bread of the Supper is verily a substance of an earthly and corruptible element, and sufficeth no change in itselfe, but hath under it selfe the body of Christ enclosed. If they did so declare their meaning, that when the bread is delitered in the mysterie, there is adioyed the delitering of the bodie, because the truth is vnfayurable from the signe: I woulde not much strive with them. But because they placing the body in the bread, do faine to it a being euery where contrary to the nature thereof, and in adding under the bread, they will have it lie there hidden: it is necessarie a little while to drawe such suttlesies out of their dennes. For my mind is not yet as of set purpose to go through with all this point; but only that I may lay the foundations of the disputation which shall by and by followe in place fit for it. They will therefore have the body of Christ to bee invisible & immeasurable, that it may be hid under the bread: because they thinke, they do not otherwise communicate with him than if he descend into the bread: but they comprehend not the maner of descending, whereby he lifteth vs vpward to himselfe. They lay vppon it all the colours that they can: but when they haue said all, it sufficiently appeareth, that they lay vp the local presence of Christ. Whence commeth that? even because they can abide to conceive no other partaking of the flesh & blood, but which consisteth either of ioyninge & touching of place, or of some grosse enclosing.

17 And, that they may obstinatly defende the errour once rashly conceiued, some of them flique not to say, that the flesh of Christ had neuer any other measurings, but so farre & wide as heauen & earth is broad. Whereas he was borne a child out of the wombe, whereas he grew, whereas he was spread abroad on the crosse, whereas he was enclosed in the sepulchre, the same was done by a certaine dispensation, that he might be borne & die, and performe the other dutieis of man. Whereas after his resurrection he was seene in his wonted forme of body, whereas he was taken vp to heauen, whereas last of all also after his ascension he was seene of Stephen and Pauli it was done by the same dispensation, that it might appeare to the sight of men, y he was made a king in heauen. What is this else, but to raise vp Martion out of hell: For no man can doubt that the body of Christ was a fantastic or a fantastical thing, if he was of such state. Some slip away somewhat more fortuitously, with saying that this body which is given in the Sacrament is glorious and immortal; and that therefore it is no absurdity, if it be contained in many places, if in no place, if with no form, under the Sacrament. But I ask what manner of body Christ gave to the disciples, the day before that he suffered: do not the words found that he gave the same mortal body, which was within a little after to be delivered? Hee had already before (say they) showed his glory to be seen to three of the disciples. That is true in deed, but his will was by that brightness to give them a taste of immortalitie for an hour. In the mean time they shall not there finde a double body, but that one body which Christ did bear, garnished with newe glorie. But when he distributed his body at his first supper, the time was nowe at hand, when he being striken of God, and humbled shouldlie without glorie as a leprous man: so farre is it off that he then would shewe forth the glorie of his resurrection. And howe great a window is here opened to Marcion, if the bodie of Christ was seene in one place mortal & base, and in an other place was holden immortal & glorious: Howbeit if their opinion take place, the same happeneth daily: because they are compelled to confesse that the bodie of Christ being visible in it selfe, lieth hid invisibly under the signe of bread. And yet they that vomit out such monstrousities, are so not ashamed of their own shame, that they do vprouoked hainously raile at vs, because we do not subscribe to them.

18 - Now if they list to fasten the bodie & bloud of the Lorde to bread & wine: the one shall of necessitie be plucked in sinder from the other. For as the bread is deliucred severally from the cup, so the bodie vnited to ye bread must needs be deuided from the bloud enclosed in the cup. For when they affirme that the bodie is in the bread & the bloud in the cup: and the bread & wine are by spaces of place diffant the one from the other: they can by no shift escape, but that the bodie must be seuered from the bloud. But whereas they are wont to alleage, that by accompanying (as they faine) in the body is the bloud, & likewise in the bloud is the bodie, ye verily is too trifling: forasmuch as the signes in which they are enclosed, are so seuered. But if wee bee lifted vp w our eyes & minde to heauen, ye we secke Christ there in the glory of his kingdom:as the signes do allure vs to him whole, so vtnder the signe of bread, we shalbe fed with his bodie, vnder the signe of wine we shall severally drinke his bloud, ye at length we may enjoy him whole. For although he hath taken away his fleth from vs, & in his bodie is ascended vp into heauen, yet he sitteth at the right hand of the Father, that is to say hee reigneth in the power, & maisters, & glorie of the Father. This kingdom is neither bounded with any spacies of place, nor compassed about with any measuring, but ye Christ may shew forth his might wheresoeuer it pleseth him both in heauen & in earth: but that he may shewe himselfe present with power & strength:but that he may alway be at hand with them, he be his, breathing his life into them, may live in them, strengthen them, quicken them, preserve them safe, even as if he were present in body; finally, but that he may feede them with his owne body, the communion whereof hee doeth by the power. power of his Spirit into them. After this manner the body and blood of Christ is delivered to us in the Sacrament.

19 But we must appoint such a presence of Christ in the supper, as may neither fasten him to the element of bread, nor shut him up in the bread, nor by any means compass him in, (for it is plain that all these things abate his heauenlie glorie) finally such as may neither take from him his owne measure, nor diuersly draw him in many places at once, nor fain to him such an unmeasurable greatness as is spread abroad throughout heauen and earth, for these things are plainly against the trueth of the nature of manhoode. Let vs (I say) never suffer these two exceptions to be taken away from vs. The one, that nothing be abated from the glorie of Christ, which is done, when he is brought vnder the corruptible elements of this world, or is bound to any earthly creatures. The other, that nothing be by faining, applied to his bodie, that agree not with the nature of man which is done, when it is either said to be infinite, or is set in many places at once. But these absurdities being taken away, I willingly receive whatsoeuer may auaile to expresse the true and substantial communicating of the body and blood of the Lorde, which communicating is delivered to the faithful vnder the holy signes of the supper; and so that they may be thought not to receive it by imagination onely or vnderstanding of minde, but to enjoy it in deed to the foode of eternall life. Why this sentence is so hateful to the worlde; and all defence taken away from it by the vniust judgements of many, there is no cause at all, but for that the diuell hath with horrible bewitching madded their mindes, Truely that which we teach, doth in all points very well agree with the Scriptures: it containeth neither any absurditie, nor darknesse, nor doutfulness: it is not against true godlinesse and sound edification: finally, it hath nothing in it, that may offend, sauing that in certaine ages past, when that ignorance and barbaroufnesse of Sophisters reigned in the Church, so cleare light and open trueth hath beene vnworthy oppressed. Yet because Satan at this day alfo travaileth by troublesome spirits to spot it with al the flauinders and reproches that hee can, and bendeth himself to no other thing with greater endevour; it is profitable the more diligently to defende and refuse it.

20 Now before that wee go any further, wee must entreate of the selfe institution of Christ: specially because this is the most glorious objection that our aduersaries haue, that we depart from the worde of Christ. Therefore, that we may be discharged of the false cause of malice wherewith they burden vs, our fittest beginning shall be at the expostition of the worde. Three Evangelistes and Paul rehearse, that Christ tooke bread, when he had given thanks he brake it, gave it to his disciples and said, Take, eat: this is my bodie which is delivered, or broken for you. Of the cuppe Matthew and Marke say thus: This cuppe is the blood of the Newe testament, which shall be shedde for many unto forgiveness of sinnes. But Paul and Luke say thus: This cuppe is the Newe testament in my blood. The patrones of transsubstantiation will have by the pronoun (this) the sounifie of bread to bee signified, because the consecration is made in the whole content of the sentence, and there is no substance that can bee shewed. But if they bee holde... with religious care of the wordes, because Christ testified, that that which he reached into the disciples hands, was his body: truely this their deuise, that that which was bread is nowe the bodie, is most farre from the proper meaning of them. That which Christ tooke into his handes and gave the Apostles, he affirmeth: to be his bodie: but he tooke bread: who therefore can not understand that bread is yet shewed? and therefore there is no greater absurditie, than to remove that to the forme, which is spoken of the bread. Other, when they expounde this wordes (for to be transubstantiate) doo flee to a more enforced and violently wrested glofe. Therefore there is no caufe why they should pretend that they bee moued with reverence of words. For this was vnheard of among all nations and languages, that the word (is) should be taken in this sence, namely for to be turned into another thing. As for them that leaue bread in the Supper, and affirm that there is the bodie of Christ, they much differ among themselues. They which speak more modestly, although they precifely exact the letter, This is my bodie, yet afterward sware from their precifenesse, and say that it is as much in effect as that the bodie of Christ is with bread, in bread, and vnnder bread. Of the matter it selfe which they affirm, wee haue alreadye touched somwhat, and wee shall by and by haue occasion yet to speake more. Nowe I dispute onely of the wordes, by which they say they are restrained that they cannot admit bread to be called the bodie, because it is a signe of the body. But if they shunne all figures, why do they leaue away from the plaine shewing of Christ, to their owne maners of speaking farre differing from it? For there is a great difference betweene this that bread is the bodie, and this that the bodie is with bread. But because they sawe it to be impossible, that this simple proposition might stande, that bread is the bodie: they have attempted to scape away by those formes of speache, as it were by crooked turninges. Some more bolde sticke not to affirme that even in proper speaking, bread is the bodie, and by this mean they truely prove themselves to bee literal men. If it be objected, that therefore the bread is Christ, and is God: this verily they will deny, because it is not expressed in the wordes of Christ. But they shall nothing preuaile by denying it: forasmuch as all do agree that whole Christ is offered vs in the Supper. But it is an intolerable blaspheemie, that it be without figure spoken of a fraile and corruptible element, that it is Christ. Nowe I aske of them, whether these two propositions bee both of one effect, Christ is the Sonne of God, and bread is the body of Christ. If they graunt that they are diuerfe, (which we will enforce them to graunt whether they will or no) then let them aunswere whence commeth the difference. I thinke they will bring none other but that the bread is after the sacramentall manner called the bodie. Whereupon followeth, that Christ's wordes are not subject to the common rule, nor ought to be tried by Grammar. Alfo I aske of all the precise and stiffe requirers of the letter, where Luke and Paul do call the cuppe the testament in the bloud, whether they Luk.22.10. do not expresse the same thing which they did in the first parte, where they call bread the bodie. Truely the same religion was in the one parte of the mysterie that was in the other: and because shortenesse is darke, longer speach doth better open the meaning. So oft therefore as they shal affirm by one word, that the bread is the body; I will out of more words bring a fit exposition, that it is the Testament in the body. For why? Shall we need to seek a more faithfull or surer expositor than Paul and Luke? Neither yet do I tend hereunto, to diminish any thing of that communicating of the bodie of Christ which I have confessed: only my purpose is to confute that foolish waifardnesse, whereby they doe so hatelyfull brawle about words. I understand, by the authoritie of Paul and Luke, that the bread is the bodie of Christ, because it is the covenante in the bodie. If they fight against this, they haue not warre with me, but with the spirite of God. Howsoever they cry out that they be touched with reverence of the wordes of Christ, whereby they do not figuratiuely understand those things that are plainly spoken: yet this is not a pretence rightfull enough, why they should refuse all the reasons which we obiect to the contrarie. In the mean time, as I haue alreadie given warning, it is convenient to learne, what manner of thing this is; The testament in the bodie and blood of Christ: because the covenante stablished with the sacrifice of death, should otherwise not profit vs, unleasse there were adioyned that secret communicating whereby we growe into one with Christ.

21 It remaineth therefore that for the affinitie which the things signified haue with their signes, we confesse that the false name of the thing was gien to the signe: figuratiuely in deed, but not without a most fit proportionall agreement. I haue allegories and parables, left any man should quarrell that I seek strangeholes, and wander out of the present purpose. I say that this is a speach by figure of transnominacion which is commonly vied in the Scripture, when mysteries are entreate of. For neither can you other wise understand that which is said: that circumcision is a couenant: that the lambe is the Passeouer: that the Sacrifices of the lawe are expiations: finally that the rocke, out of which water flowed in the desert, was Christ: vnsleasse you take it to be spoken by way of transferring of names. Neither are names transferred onely from the hier name to the lower: but contrariwyse the name of the visible signe is also gien to the thing signified: as when it is said that God appeared to Moses in the bush: when the arke of couenant is called God, and the face of God: and the dove is called the holy Ghost. For though the signe differ in substance from the thing signified: because this is spiritual and heavenly, and that is corporall and visible: yet because it doth not onely signifie the thing which it is holily appointed to reprent, as a naked and empiric token, but doth also truly deform it in deed: why may not the name of the thing rightly accord with it? If signes deuided by men, which are rather images of things absent, than markes of things present, which falsely abstencthings, they doe often times deceitfully shadowe, are yet sometime garnished with the titles of the things: then those things that are ordaind of God, do by much greater reason borrowe the name of those things, of which they alway both were a sure and not deceitfull signification, and bave the truth adioyned with them. There is therefore so great likeene and necenene of the one to the other, that it is easie to draw their names to & fro. Therefore let our aduersaries cease to heap vnfaouorie scoffings against vs, in calling vs Tropists, because we expound ye sacrametals.
maner of speaking after the common use of the Scripture. For whereas the Sacraments agree together in many things: in this transferring of names, they have all a certaine community together. As therefore the Apostle teacheth, the stone out of which spiritual drinke did spring to Israelites, was Christ, because it was a visible signe, under which that spiritual drinke was truly in deed but not discernably to the eye perceived: so bread is at this day called the body of Christ, forasmuch as it is a signe whereby the Lord offereth to vs the true eating of his body. Neither did Augustin otherwise thinke or speak least any man should despise this as a newe invention. If (sayth he) the Sacraments had not a certaine likenes of those thinges whereof they are Sacramentes, they should not be Sacramentes at all. And of this likenes oftentimes they take the names of the things themselues. As therefore after a certayne manner the Sacrament of the body of Christ, is the bodie of Christ: the Sacrament of the blood of Christ, is the blood of Christ: so the Sacrament of faith is faith. There be in him many like places, which it were superfluous to heap together, Sith that same one sufficeth: sauing the readers must be warned that the holy man teacheth the same thing in the Epistle to Enodius. But it is a trifling thing to say, that where Augustine teacheth, that when transferring is often and commonly vfed in mysteries, hee maketh no mention of the Supper: because if this thrust were receiued, we might not reason from the generallie to the specialtie, neither were this a good argument: Every feeling creature hath power of musing, therefore an oxe and a horse have power of mouing. Howbeit long disputation hereof is in another place ended by the words of the same holy man, where he sayth, that Christ blicked not to call it his body, when he gave the signe of his body. Against Adimantus, the Manichean, in the twelfth Chapter. And in another place, upon the thirde Psalme. Marcellons (sayth he) is the patience of Christ, that he receiued Judas to the banker, wherein he committed and deluiered to his disciples the figure of his body and bloud.

22. But if some precise man, being blinde at all the rest, do stand only vpon this wordes (this is) as though it seuered this mysterie from all other, the solution is easie. They say that the vehement of the substantius verbe (is) so great that it admittereth no figure. Which if wee grant to them: euen in the wordes of Paul is reade the substantius verbe, where he calleth bread the communicating of the bodie of Christ. But the communicating is an other thing than the bodie it selfe. Yea commonly where Sacramentes are entreate of, we finde the same wordes vfed. As: This shall be to you a couenant with me. This lambe shall be to you a pacificer. To rehearse no more: when Paul sayeth that the rokke was Chirist, why doe they take the substantius verbe in that place to be of lesse vehement then in the speche of Christ? Let them also aunswere, where John sayth, the holy Ghoste was not yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified, of what force the substantius verbe is in that place. For if they abide fastened to their rule, the eternal effence of the holy Ghoste shall be destoyed, as though it tooke beginning at the ascension of Christ. Finally lette them aunswere, what meanteth that sayings of Paul, that baptism is the washing of regeneration and renewing, which it is evident to bee unprofitable to many. But nothing is stronger
to confute them, than that saying of Paul, that Church is Christ. For, bringing a similitude of the body of man, he addeth, So is Christ: in which place he understandeth the only begotten son of God, not in him selfe, but in his members. Hereby I thinke I have obtained that to soundwitted and uncorrupted men the calumni of our enemies, are loathsome, when they spread abroad, that we withdrawe credite from the wordes of Christ: which we do no lefse obdiently embrace than they, and doe wry them with more godly reverence. Yea their negligent carelesnesse sheweth that they do not greatly care what Christ meant, so yt it giue them a buckler to defende their obstinacie: like as our earnest searching ought to be a witness, how much we esteem the authoritie of Christ. They odiously spread abroad, yt naturall sense of man witholdeth vs from beleeuing that which Christ hath uttered with his owne holy mouth: but how maliciously they burden vs with this calumny, I have a great part already made plaine, and hereafter it shall more clearly appeare. Therefore nothing witholdeth vs from beleeuing Christ when he speaketh, nor from obeying so soone as hee doeth but with becke will this or that. Only this is the question, whether it be vnlawfull to enquire of the natural meaning.

23 These good masters, that they may seeme wel lettered, doe forbid men to deppart be it nuer so little from the letter. But I on the other side, when the Scripture nameth God a warlike man, because I see that without figurative translation it is too rough a maner of speaking, doe not doubt that it is a comparison taketh from men. And truely upon none other pretence in the olde time the Anthropomorphits troubled the true teaching Fathers, but that catching fast hold of these sayenges, The eyes of God doe see, It went vp to his cares, His hande stretched out, The earth his footesfole, they cryed out that God had his body taken from him, which the Scripture assigneth vnto him. If this lawe be receiued, outrageous barbarousnesse shal overwheme the whole light of faith. For, what monsters of absurdities may not phrenetike men picke out, if it be graunted them to allcage euery small title to stablish their opinions? That which they obiect, that it is not likely, that when Christ prepared for his Apostles a singular comfort in aduersitie, he did then speake in a riddle or darkely, maketh of our side. For if it had not come in by mindes of the Apostles, that bread was figuratively called the body, because it was the signe of the body, they had without dout bin troubled with so monstruous a thing. Almost at the fame moment John reporteth that they did sticke in perplexitie at euery of the least difficultnes. They which strive among themselues, howe Christ will goe to the Father: and do more question, how he will goe out of the world: they which understande nothing of those things that are spoken concerning the heavenely Father, till they see him: how would they beare so easie to beleeue that which al reason refuseth, that Christ sitteth at the boorde in their sight, and is enclosed inuisible vnder bread? Whereas therefore they in eating the bready without doubting, testified their consent, hereby appeareth that they tooke Christs worde in the same sense that wee doe, because they remembred that which ought not to seeme strange in mysteries, that the name of the thing signified is transferred to the signe. Therefore it was to the disciples, as it is to vs, a certaine and cleare comfort, intangled with no riddle. Neither is there any other cause why some should depart from our exposition, but because the enchantment of the devil hath blinded them, namely, that they should faine darke-ness to themselues, where the exposition of an apte figure offereth it selue. Moreover if wee precipitously stand vpon the wordes, Christ shoule wrong-fully have spoken in one place severally an other thing concerning y bread than he spakeoth of the cup. He calleth the bread his body, hee calleth the wine his blood: either it shal be a confused vaine repetition, or it shal bee such a partition as shall diuide the body from the blood. Yea it shal as truly be faide of the cup, This is my body, as of the bread it selue, and it may like-ly wife interchangeably be faide, that the bread is the blood. If they answere that we must consider to what ende or use the signes were ordained: I grant it indeed: but in the meane time they shal not vnuinde themselfes, but that their error musst drawe this absurditie with it, that the bread is the blood, and the wine is the body. Nowe I wote not what this meaneth, when they grant the breade and the body to be diverse things, yet to affirme that the one is spoken of the other properly and without any figure: as if a man shoulde say that a garment is indeed a thing differing from a man, & yet that it is properly called a man. In the meane while as though their victorie consisted in obstinacy and railing, they say that Christ is accused of lying, if an exposition be fought of the wordes. Nowe it shalbe easie for vs to shewe to the read-ers how vnjust wrong these catchers of syllables do to vs, when they fill ſimple with this opinion, y we withdraw credite from the wordes of Christ, which we haue proued to be furiousely pervertted and confounded by them, but to be faithfully and rightly expounded by vs.

24 But the flander of this lie cannot be vttet purged, till an other crime be wiped away. For they spread abroad, y we be so adddicted to natural reason, that we giue no more to the power of God, than the order of nature suffereath and common sense teacheth. From so malicious slanders I appeale to the verie doctrine it selfe which I haue declared: which doeth clearely enough shew, y I do not measure this mysterie by the proportion of mans reason, nor do make it subject to the lawes of nature. I beseech you, have we learned out of naturall philosophie, Y Christ doth so from heauen seed our soules & bod-ies with his flesh, as our bodies are nourished with bread & wine? Whence commeth this power to flesh, y it may giue life? All men will say that it is not done naturally. It wil no more pleaze mans reason, y the flesh of Christ reacheth to vs, y it may be food vnto vs. Finally whosoever hath tasted of our doctrine, shalbe rauiished into admiration of the secreet power of God. But these good men that be so zealous of it, forge to themselfes a miracle, which being taken away, God himselue vanisheit with his power. I desire to haue y readers once againe warned, y they diligently wey what our doctrine bringeth, whether it hang vpon common sense, or with the wings of faith, surmounting the world, climbeth vp beyond it into the heauens. We say that Christ as well with the outward signe as with his spirit, descended to vs, that he may truly quicken our soules with the substance of his flesh and of his blood. In these fewe wordes he that perceiued not to bee contained many miracles, is more than senseles, forasmuch as there is nothing more beside nature.
Of the outward means

nature, than that soules should borowe spirituall and heavenly life, of the flesh which toke her beginning of the earth, & which was subject to death. Nothing is more incredible, than that things distant and a funder by the whole space of heaven and earth, should in so great distance of places not onely be coniuned, but also united, that soules may receive foode of the flesh of Christ. Therefore let wayward men cease to procure hatred to vs, by a filthy slandering, as though we did enviously retraigne any thing of the immeasurable power of God. For they do either too foolishly err or too maliciously lie. For it is not here in question what God could, but what he wold. We affirme that to be done which pleased him. But it pleased him, y Christ should be made like to his brethren in all things, except sinne. What manner of thing is our flesh? Is it not such as constitheth of the certaine measure of it, as is contained in place, as is touched, as is scene? And why (say they) may not God make, that one selfe same flesh may occupie many and divers places, may be contained in one place, may be without measure and forme? Thou mad man, why requirest thou of the power of God, to make flesh at one selfe time to be and not to be flesh? Like as if thou shouldest instantly require him to make at one selfe time the light to be both light and darkenes. But he will eth light to be light, darkenesse to be darkenesse, flesh to be flesh. He shall in deedeth when it pleaseth him, turne darkenes into light, and light into darkenesse: but when thou requirëst that light and darkenesse may not differ, what doest thou else but pervert the order of the wisdome of God? Therefore flesh must be flesh: and Spirit, Spiriteth: euery thing in such lawe and condition as God hath created it. But such is the condition of flesh, that it must be in one yea and that a certaine place, and consist of her measure & of her forme. With this condition Christ tooke flesh vpon him, to which (as Augustine witnessteth) he hath givien indeed vncorruption and glory, but he hath not taken from it nature and truth.

25 They aunfwere, that they have the word, whereby the will of God is made plaine: namely it if be granted them to banish out of the Church y gift of expofition, which may bring light to the word. I grant y they have the word; but such as in old time the Anthropomorphites had, when they made God hauing a body: such as Marcion and the Manichees had, when they fained y body of Christ to be either heavenly or fantastical. For they alledged for testimonies, The first Adam was of the earth earthly: the second Adam is of heaven, heavenly. Againe, Christ abaced himselfe, taking vpon him the forme of a servant, and was found in likenes as a man. But the grosse eaters thinke y there is no power of God, vnles with the monster forged in their braines the whole order of nature be overthrown: which is rather to limite God, when we couert with our fained inuenions to proue what hee can doe. For out of what word have they taken, y the body of Christ is visible in heaven, but lurketh inuilible in earth under innumerable little pieces of bread? They will say y neccesstie requireth this, y the body of Christ should be givien in the supper. Verily because it pleased them to gather a fleshly eating out of the words of Christ: they being caried away by their owne forejudgement, were driven to neccessitie to coin this suttlerie, which the whole scripture crieth out against. But y any thing is by vs diminisht of the power of God, is

To falsely by our doctrine the praise of it is very honorable set out. But forasmuch as they always accuse us, that we defraud God of his honour, when we refuse that which according to common sense is hard to be believed, although it have bin promised by the mouth of Christ: I make againe the same answer that I made even now, that in the mysteries of faith we do not ask counsel of common sense, but with quiet willingneffe to learne, and with the spirit of mekenesse which James commendeth, we receive the doctrine come from heaven. But in that when they perniciously erre, I deny not that we follow a profitable moderation. They hearing the wordes of Christ, This is my body, imagine a miracle most farre from his mind. But when out of this fained invention arise fowle absurdities, because they have already with hedges ofthief put snares vpon themselves, they plunge themselves into the bottomless depth of the almightyneffe of God, that by this meanes they may quench the light of truth. Hereupon commeth that proude precifions: We will not knowe howe Christ lyeth hid vnder the bread, holding our selves contented with this saying of his, This is my body. But we, as we doe in the whole Scripture, doe with no leffe obedience than care, studie to obtaine a sounde understanding of this place: neither do we with preposterous heate rashly and without choice catch holde of that which first thrusteth it selfe into our minde: but vsing diligent musing vpon it, we embracing the meaning which the spirit of God ministrith: and standing thereupon we do so aloft despite whatsoever earthly wisedom he set against it. Yea we holde our minds captive, that they may not be bold so much as with one little word to carpe against it: and do humble them, that they may not dare to rise vp against it. Hereupon sprung vp the exposition of the wordes of Christ, which to be by the continuall vgage of the scripture common to all Sacramentes, al they that have ben thought but meanely exercised therein, doe knowe. Neither doe we, after the example of the holy Virgin, thinke it lawfull for vs, Luke 1. 34.

26 But because nothing shall more auaine to confirme the faith of the godly, than when they have learned that the doctrine which we haue taught is taken out of the worde of God, and standeth vpon the authoritie thereof: I will make this also evident with as great briefenesse as I can. The body of Christ, since the time that it rofe againe, not Aristotele but the Holy Ghost teacheth to be limited, and that it is comprehended in heaven vntill the last day. Neither am I ignorant that they boldly mocke out those places that are allledged for this purpose, So oft as Christ faith that he will depart, leaving the worlde, they answere that that departing is nothing else but a changing of mortall state. But after this manner, Christ shoulde not set the Holy Ghost in this place to supplie (as they call it) the want of his absence: forasmuch as hee doeth not succeede into this place, nor Christ himselfe doth descend againe out of the heavenly glory to take vpon him the state of mortall life. Truely the comming of the Holy Ghost, and the ascending of Christ are things set as contrary: threfore it can not be that Christ should according to the flesh dwell with vs after the same manner that hee sendeth his spirit: Moreover hee in plaine wordes expresseth, that hee will not be alway with his discipiles in the worlde. This saying also they thinke that.
that they doe daily wipe away, as though Christ faide that hee will not alwaies be poore and miserable or subject to the necessities of his fraile life. But the circumstance of the place crieth plainly to the contrary, because there is not intreated of poueritie and neede, or of the miserable state of earthly life, but of worship and honour. The anointing pleased not the discipes, because they thought it to be a superfluous & vnprofitable cost, and necere vnto riotous excesses, therefore they had rather that the price thereof of which they thought to be ill wafted, had beene bestowed upon the poore. Christ answereth that he shall not alwaies be present, that he may be worshipped with such honour. And none otherwise did Augustine expounde it, whose wordes bee these which are nothing doubtful. When Christ said, Ye shall not alwaies haue me, he spake of the presence of his body. For according to his majestie, according to his prouidence, according to his vnspakeable and invisible grace, this was fulfilled which he faide, behold e, I am with you even to the ending of the word. But according to the flesh which the worde tooke vnto him, according to this that he was borne of the Virgin, according to this he was taken of the Jewes, that he was fastened to the tree, that he was taken downe from the crosse, that he was wrapped in linnen clothes, he was laid in the grave, that he was manifestly shewed in the resurrection, this was fulfilled. Yee shall not alwaies haue mee with you. Why so? Because he was conuersant according to the presence of his bodie fortie daies with his discipes, and while they accompanied him in seeing not in following, he ascended. Hee is not here: for he sitteth there at the right hand of the Father. And yet hee is here: because he is not gone away in presence of Maiestie. Otherwise according to the presence of maiestie we haue Christ alwaies: and according to the presence of the flesh it is rightly faide, But me ye shall not alwaies haue. For according to the presence of the flesh, the Church had him a fewe daies; nowe hee holdeth him by faith, but seeth him not with eyes. Where (that I may note this also briefly) he maketh him present to vs three waies, by maiestie, prouidence, and vnspakeable grace, vnder which I comprehend this marvellous communion of his bodie and bloode: it so that wee vnderstand it to be done by the power of the holy Ghost, not by that vaine enclosing of his bodie vnder the element. For our Lorde hath testifie, that he hath flesh and bones which may be felt and scene. And to Go and away and Ascende do not signifie to make a shewe of one ascending and going away, but to doe in deed that which the worde signifieth. Shall we then (will some man say) alsigne to Christ some certaine coast of heauen? But I answere with Augustine that this is a most curious and superfluous question, if so that yet we beleue that he is in heauen.

27. But what doeth the name of ascending so oft repeated? doeth it not signifie a remouing from one place to another? They denie it: because after their opinion, by height is onely signified maiestie of Empire. But what meaneth the verie manner of ascending? was hee not in sight of his discipes looking on, lifted vp on him? Doe not the Evangelistes plainly declare that he was taken vp into the heauens? These wittie Sophistes do answere that with a cloud set betwene him and them, hee was conuerted out of their sight, that the faithfull might learne that from thence foorth he should not bee be visible in the world. As though, to make credit of his invisible presence, he ought not rather to vanish away in a moment, or as though the cloud ought not rather to compass him before he stirred his foot. But when he is carried vp on his into the aire, & with a cloud cast vnderneath him, teacheth he is no more to be fought in earth: we safely gather, that now he hath his dwelling place in the heavens: as Paul also affirmeth, and from thence biddeth vs toiske for him. After this maner the Angels warned the disciples, they in vain gazed vp into heaven: because is taken vp which is taken vp into heaven, shall so come as they have seene him goe vp. Here also the aduersaries of sound doctrine stare away with a pleasant shift as they think, saying that he will  then come visible, which never went out of the earth but that he abideth invisible with them that be his. As though the Angels did there signifie a double presence, & do not simply make the disciples witnesses of his going vp seeing it with their eyes, no doughting might remaine: even as if they had said: he in your sightes beholding it, being taken vp into heaven, hath claimed to himselfe the heavenly Empire: it remaineth that ye patiently abide in expectation, till he come againe the judge of the world: because he is now entred into heaven, not that he may alone possesse it, but that hee may gather together with him you and all the godly.

28 But forasmuch as the defenders of this baftard doctrine are not ashamed to garnishe it with the confenting voyces of the olde writers and specially of Augustine: I will in few wordes declare how perturly they go about it. For whereas their testimonies haue beene gathered together of learned and godly men, I will not doe a thing already done: lette him that will seke them out of their works. I will not heape together, neither out of Augustine himselfe, all that might make to the purpose: but will bee content to shewe by a fewe that he is without controversie whole on our side. As for this that our aduersaries, to warie him from vs, doe allege that it is commonly read in his bookes, that the flesh and bloude of Christ is distributed in the Supper, namely the Sacrifice once offered in the croffe: it is but trypling: but he also calleth it either Thankgiving, or the Sacrament of his body. But in what sense he vseth the words of flesh and bloude, wee neede not to seke with long compassing about: forasmuch as he declareth himself, saying that Sacramentes take their names of the likenesse of the things which they signifie: and that therefore after a certaine maner the Sacrament of the body is his body. Where with accordeth an other place which is w.lenough known: The Lorde sticked not to say, This is my body, when he gave the signe of it. Againe they obiect, that Augustine writeth expressly, that the bodie of Christ felleth to the groundes, and entree into th mouth: even in the same sense, that he affirmeth it to be consumed, because he ioyneth them both together. Neither doth that make to the contrary, which he sayeth, that when the mysticall brede to the discipiles.

ciples. For by entwisting this aduerbe of likeeness (after a certaine maner) he sufficiently declareth, that he was not truly, nor really enclosed vnder the bread. And no maruell, sith in an other place he plainly affirmeth that bodies, if spaces of places bee taken from them, shalbe no where: and because they shall be no where, they shall not be at all. It is a hungry caullation, to say that in that place is not entreated of the Supper, in which God vtereth speciall power: because the question was noised concerning the flese of Christ, and the holy man of fet purpose answering layeth: Christ gave im mortalitie to his flese, but tooke not nature from it. After this forme it is not to be thought that he is ech where spread abroad: for we must beware that we doe not to affirme the Godhead of the man, that we take away the truth of the body. And it followeth not, that that which is in God must eche where as GOD is. There is a reason by and by added: for one person is God and man, and both are one Christ: ech where, by this that he is God: in heauen, by this that he is man. What a negligence hadde it beeene, not to except the mysterie of the Supper beeing a thing so earnest and weightie, if there had bee in it any thing against the doctrine which he entreated of. And yet if a man doe heedfully reade that which followeth within a little after, he shall finde that vnder that generall doctrine, the Supper is also comprehended, that Christ the onely begotten Sonne of GOD, and the same the fonne of man, is ech where whole present as God: that he is in the temple of God (thatis in the Church) GOD as it were there dwelling, and in some certaine place of heauen by feason of the meaure of his true body. We see howe, to the vnitng of Christ with the Church, he dooth not drawe his bodie out of heauen: which surely hee would he have done, if the body of Christ were not truly meete to vs vnlesse it were enclosed vnder bread. In an other place defining howe the faithfull doe nowe possesse Christ. Thou haft him (sayth he) by the signe of the crosse, by the Sacrament of Baptisme, by the meete and drinke of the altar. Howe rightly hee recketh a superstitious vsage among the signes of the presence of Christ, I doe not nowe dispute: but hee that comparseth the presence of the flese to the signe of the crosse, sufficiently sheweth that he faimeth not a two bodied Christ, that the same he may lurke hidden vnder the bread, which sitteth visible in heauen. If this neede plainer declaration, it is by and by after added in the same place, that according to the presence of maiestie, wee alway haue Christe: that according to the presence of the flese, it is rightly sayde, Mee ye shall not alway haue. They aunfwered, that this is also added, that according to an vnspakable and invisible grace, it is fulfilled which is saide of him, I am with you, even vnto the ending of the worlde, But that is nothing for their advantage: because this is at length restrained to his maiestie, which is euery in comparison set against the body, & his flese by expresse name is made different from his grace & power. As in an other place the same comparison of contraries is red in him, that Christ by bodily presence left the disciplines, that by spiritual presence he may be still with the: where it is plaine the substance of the flese is distinguished from the power of the Spirit, which coniouneth vs with Christ, though we be otherwise farre seuered by distance of places. The same manner of speaking he oftentimes vseth, as when he saith: He is to
to come again to the quick and the dead with bodily presence, according to the rule of Faith & sound doctrine. For with spiritual presence he was also to come to them, and to abide with the whole Church in the world until the ending of the world, Therefore this speech is directed to the believers whom he had already begun to save with bodily presence, & whom he was to leave with bodily absence; that he might with his Father save them with spiritual presence. To take bodily for visible is but trifling: with he seteth also the body in comparison against the divine power: and adding (to save with the Father) he clearly expresseth that he doth powre abroad his grace from heaven to vs by his spirit.

29 And sith they put so much confidence in this lurking hole of invisibl: presence, goe too, let vs see howe well they hide themselves in it. First they shall not bring forth one syllable out of the scriptures, whereby they may prove that Christ is invisibl: but they take that for confessed which no man that hath his founde wit will graunt them, that the body of Christ can not otherwisse bee given in the Supper but being covered with the vifor of bread. And this is the verie point about which they strive with vs, so farre is it of from hauing the place of a principle. And when they so babble, they are compelled to make a double bodie of Christ: because after their opinion it is in it selfe visible in heaven, but invisibl: in the supper after a special manner of dispencation. But howe trimly this agreeeth, it is easie to judge both by other places of scripture, and by the witneff of Peter. Peter faith that Christ must be holden or conteined in heaven, til he come again. These men teach that hee is every where, but without forme. They take exception and fay that it is vnuit dealinge, to make the nature of a glorified bodie subject to the lawes of common nature. But this answer were draweth with it that doing error of Seruettus, (which is worthily to bee abhorred of all the godlie) that the bodie was swallowed vp of the Godhead. I doe not fay that they thinke so. But if this bee reckened among the qualities of a glorified bodie, to fill all things after a visible manner, it is evident, that the bodilie substance is destroyed, and that there is lefte no difference of the godhead and the nature of man. Againe if the bodie of Christ be of so manie fashions and diuerfe, that it is scene in one place, and is invisibl: in another; where is the verie nature of a bodie which consisteth of his measured proportions? and where is vnitie? Much more rightlie dooth Tertulian fay, which affirmeth that the bodie of Christ was a true and natural bodie, because in the mysterie of the Supper the figure of it is set before vs for a pledge and assurance of the spirittuall life. And verifie Christ saide of his glorified body, fee and feele, for a Spirtite hath not fleshe and bones. Loc by Christes owne mouth the trueth of the fleshe is prooued, because it can bee feltte and scene, Take away these things, then it shall cease to bee fleshe. They still flee to their denne of dispencation which they haue framed to themselves. But it is our parte so to embrace that which Christ absolutely pronounceveth, that that which hee meaneth to affirm may bee of force with vs without exception. Hee proueath himselfe to bee no Ghost, because hee is visible in his fleshe. Let that be taken away which hee claimeth as proper to the nature of his bodie: must they not then... then be faine to coine a newe definition of a body? Nowe whither soever they turne themselues about, their faine dispension hath no place in that place of Paul where he faith, that wee look for a Saviour from heauen, which shall fashion our base bodie like to his glorious bodie. For we may not hope for a like fashioning in those qualities which they sayne to Christ, that euer one should have an invisible and vnmeasurable body. Neither shall there be found any man so dul wasst whom they may make to beleue so great an absurditie. Let them no: therefore ascribe this gift to Christes glorified bodie, to be at once in many places, and to be conteyned in no space. Finally let them either openly deny the resurrection of the flesh, or let them grant that Christ being clothed with heauenly glorie, did not put off his flesh, who shall make vs in our flesh fellows and partners of the same glorie, when we shall have the resurrection common with him. For, what doeth the scripture teach more plainely, than that as Christ did put on our true fleshe when he was borne of the Virgin, and suffered in our true fleshe when hee satisfied for vs: so hee receivd againe also the same true fleshe in rising againe, and caried it vp to heauen? For this is to vs the hope of our resurrection and ascending into heauen, that Christ is risen againe and ascended: and (as T tertullian faith) he caried the earnest of our resurrection into the heauens with him. Now how weake and fraile should that hope be, vnlesse this our selfe flesh had beene raised vp with Christ and entred into the kingdom of heauen? But this is the proper truthe of a bodie, to bee conteyned in space, to consist of his measured proportions, to have his forme. Therefore away with this foolish deceit, which dooth fasten both the minds of men & Christ to the bread. For to what purpose serueth the secret presence vnnder bread, but that they which couet to have Christ ioyned with them, may reft in that signe? But the Lorde himselfe wilde vs to withdrawe not onely our eyes but all our senses from the earth, forbidding himselfe to bee touched of the women vntill hee had gone vp to his Father. Whene hee seeth Marie with godlie zeale of reuerence to make haft to kisse his feet, there is no cause why he should disallowe and forbid this touching till hee have beene taken vp into heauen, but because he will bee fought no where els. Whereas they obiect that hee was afterwarde seene of Stephen, the solution is easie. For neither was it therefore necessarie that Christ should change place, which could give to the eyes of his fervant such sharpenesse of sight as might pearce through the heauens. The same alfo is to bee faide of Paul. Whereas they object that Christ came out of the Sepulchre being shut: and entred in among the disciples, the doers being shut: that maketh neuer a whitte more for maintenance of their error. For as the water like a falt pavement made a way to Christ walking upon the lake: so it is no maruell, if at his comming the hardnes of the stone yielded it selfe. Howbeit it is more proueable, that by his commandement the stone was removed, and by and by after pallage given him returned into his place. And to enter, the doers being shut, is not as much in effect as to pearce through the whole substance, but by divine power to open an entrie for himselfe, that hee sodenly stoode among the disciples, verlie after a maruellous manner, when the doers were fast loc-ked. That which they allecharge out of Luke, that Christ sodenly vanished away away from the eyes of the disciples with whom he went to Emaus, professeth them nothing, and maketh for vs. For, that he might take away the sight of himselfe from them, he was not made invisible, but openly went out of sight. As when he went in journey together with them (as the same Luke witnesseth) he did not put on a new face, that he might not be knowne, but holde their eyes. But these fellows do not only transforme Christ, that he may be conversant in earth, but in divers place they make him diverse and vnlike himselfe. Finally, in so trifling they doe not by one word in deed, but by a circumstance, make of the flesh of Christ a spirit: and not contented there with, they put upon it altogether contrarie qualities. Whereupon of necessitie followeth that it is double.

30 Now although we grant them that which they prate of the invisible presence, the unmeasurablenes shall not be yet proved, without which they shall in vaine attempt to enclose Christ vnnder bread. Vnlesse the bodie of Christ may be euery where at once, without any compass of place, it shall not be likely that he lieth hidden vnnder bread in the Supper. By which necessitie they brought in the monstrous being euery where. But it is shewed by strong and plaine witnesses of Scripture, that it was limited about by the measure of the body of a man; and then that by his ascending he hath made it plaine that he is not in all places, but that when he passeth into one place, he leaueth the other that he was in before. Neither is the promise which they allege, to be drawn to the bodie, I am with you cuen to the ending of the world. First the continuall conioyning can not stand, vnlesse Christ dwel in vs corporally without the vse of the Supper. Therefore there is no just cause why they should so sharply brawle about the worde of Christ, that they may in the Supper enclose Christ vnnder bread. Againe the text itselfe proueth, that Christ speaketh nothing lesse than of his Flesh, but promiseth to his disciples inuincible helpe, whereby he may defend and sustaine them against all the assaults of Satan and the world. For when he inioyned them a hard charge: lest they should dout to take it in hand, or should fearfully execute it, he strengtheneth them with assurance of his presence: as if he had said, that his succour shall not faile them, which shalbe impossible to be overcome. Vnlesse they lifted to confounde all things, ought they not to have made distinction of the manner of presence. And verily some had rather with great flame to vter their ignorance, then to yeeld neuer so little of their error. I speake not of the Papistes: whose doctrine is more tolerable, or at the leaft more shamefaft. But contentiousnes so carrieth some away, that they say that by reason of the natures unied in Christ, where euery Godhead of Christ is, there is also his flesh, which cannot be seuered from his Godhead. As though that same uniting haue compounded of those two natures I wote not what meane thing which was neither God nor man. So in deed did Eutiches, and after him Seruettus. But it is plainly gathered out of the Scripture, that the only one person of Christ doth so consist of two natures, that eithe of them hath still her owne propretie remaining safe. And that Eutiches was rightfully condemned, they will bee ashamed to deny: it is manuile that they marke not the cause of his condemning, that taking away the difference betweene the natures, enforcing the P p p. vniuie of person, he made of God man, and of man God. What madneffe therefore is it, rather to mingle heauen and earth together, than not to draw the bodie of Christ out of the heauenly sanctuarie? For whereas they bring for themselues these testimonies, None is gone vp to heauen but he that is come downe the Sonne of man which is in heauen. Againe, The Sonne which is in the bosome of the Father, he shall declare them: It is a poine of life, fentlefe dulneffe, to despife the communicating of properties which was in olde time not without caufe inuented of the holy Fathers. Truely, when the Lorde of glorie is said to be crucified, Paul doth not meane that he suffed any thing in his Godhead; but because the fame Christ which being an anfieft and despiefd in the flesh did suffer, was both God and Lord of glorie. After this maner also the Sonne of man was in heauen: because the felfe fame Christ, which according to the flesh did dwell the Sonne of man in earth, was God in heauen. In which fort he is fonde to haue deffcended from the faid place according to his Godhead: not that the Godhead did forfake heauen, to hide it felfe in the prison of the body: but because, although it filled all things, yet in the verie manhoode of Christ it dwelled corporally, it is to fay naturally and after a certaine vnfpeakable maner. It is a commo diuifion in Scholes, which I am not afhamed to rehearfe: that although whole Christ be euery where, yet not whole that is in him is euery where. And I would to God the Scholemen themfelves had well wyed the pith of this faying: for so should the vnfaueourie inuention of the felfly presence of Christ have beene met withall. Therefore our mediatour, fith he is whole euery where, is alway at hand with his, & in the Supper after a speciall maner giueth himfelfe present: but yet fo, that whole he is present, not the whole that he is: because, as it is faid, in his felfe he is contained in heauen till hee appeare to judgement.

31. But they are farre deccuied, which conceiue no presence of the flesh of Christ in the Supper, vnlesse it be made present in bread. For fo they leave nothing to the secret working of the Spirit, which vniteth Christ himfelfe vnito vs. They thinke not Christ present, vnlesse he come downe to vs. As though if he did lift vs vp to him, we should not alfeal enjoy his presence. Therefore the queftion is onely of the maner: because they place Christ in the bread, but we thinke it not lawful for vs to pluck him out of heauen. Let the readers judge whether is the righter. Only let this cauillation be druen away, that Christ is taken away from his supper, vnlesse he be hidden vnnder the couer of bread. For fith this mifterie is heauenly, it is no neede to draw Christ into the earth, that he may be ioyned to vs.

32. Nowe if any man doe ask me of the maner, I will not be afhamed to confefs, that it is a hiter secret than that it can be either comprehended with my witte, or uttered with my wordes: and, to speake it more plainly, I rather feel it, than I can vnderftande it. Therfore I doe herein without controversy embrace the truth of God, in which I may safely reft. He pronounces that his flesh is the meate of my foule, and his bloud is the drinke. With such foode I offer my foule to him to be fedde. In his holy Supper hee commandeth me vnnder the signes of breade and wine to take, eate, and drinke his body and bloud. I nothing doubt that both he doeth truly deliver them, and I doe receive them. Onely I refuse the absurdities, which appeare to be either vnworthy of the heauenly majestie of Chrift, or disagreeing from the trueth of his nature of manhood: forasmuch as they must also fight with the wordes of God, which also reacheth that Chrift was so taken vp into the glo- ric of the heauenly kingdome that it lifteth him vppe above all estate of the worlde, and no leffe diligently setteth forth in his nature of man, those things that are properly belonging to his true manhood. Neither ought this to seeme incredible, or not consonant to reaon: becaufe as the whole kingdom of Chrift is spiritual, so whatsoeuer he doth with his Church, ought not to be reduced to the reaon of this worlde. Or, that I may yfe the words of Augustine, this myftrie, as other are, is done by men, but from God: in earth, but from heauen. Such(I say) is the presence of the body, as the nature of the Sacrament requireth: which we yfe here to Excel with so great force, and great effectualnesse, that it not onely bringeth to our minde vn- doubted truft of eternal life, but also assureth vs of the immortality of our fleth. For it is nowe quicke and of his immortal flethe, and after a certaine manner communicateth of his immortalitie. They which are caried about this with their excessive speches, do nothing but with such entanglements darken the simple and plaine truth. If any be not yet satisfied, I would have him here a while to consider with me, that we nowe speake of a Sacrament, all the parts whereof ought to be referred to faith. But we do no leffe deintily and plentifully feede faith with this pertaking of the body which wee haue declared, than they that plucke Chrift himselfe out of heauen. In the meane time I plainly confess, that I refuse a mixture of the fleth of Chrift with our foules, or the powring out of it, such as they teach: because it sufficeth vs, that Chrift doth out of the substance of his flese breath life into our soules, yea doth powre into vs his owne life, although the very flese of Chrift doeth not enter into vs. Moreover it is no doubt that the proportion of faith, whereby Paule willeth vs to examine all exposition of Scripture, doeth in this be- halfe very well agree with me. As for them that speake against so evident a trueth, lette them looke after what rule of faith they fashion theirseules. He that dooth not confess that Leius Chrift is come in the flese, is not of God. These men, although they cloke it, or marke it not, doe spoile him of his flese.

33 Of communicating is to be likewise thought, which they acknowledge none, vnlesse they deuoure the flese of Chrift vnder breade. But there is no small wrong done to the Holy Ghost, vnlesse we beleue that it is brought to passe by his incomprehensible power, that wee communicate with the flese and bloud of Chrift. Yea if the force of the myftrie, such as it is taught of, and as it was known to the olde Church from fower hundred yeres a go, were weyed according to the worthinesse of it, there was enough and more whereupon we might be satisfied: the gate had beene shut against manie foule errors, out of which haue beene kindled many horrible dif- sensions wherewith both in old time and in our age the Church hath beene miserably vxed, while curious men doe enforce an excessive manner of pre- fence, which the Scripture neuer sheweth. And they turmoile about a thing fondly and rashly conceiued, as if the enclosing of Chrift vnder bread were...
(as the proverbe is) the prove and poupe of godlinesse. It principally beho-ved to knowe, howe the bodie of Christ, as it was once deluered for vs, is made ours: howe we are made partakers of his bloude that was shedde: be-cause this is to possesse whole Christ crucified, that we may enjoy all his good things. Now these things, in which was so great importance, being omitted yea neglected & in a maner buried, this only crabbed questio pleath them, how the body of Christ lyeth hidde vnder bread or vnder the forme of bred. They falsely spread abroadeth that whatsoever we teach concerning spirituall eating, is contrarie to the true and reall eating, as they call it: because we haue respecte to nothing but to the manner, which among them is carnall, while they enclose Christ in brede: but to vs it is spirituall, because the se-cret power of the Spirite is the bonde of our conioyning with Christ. No tru-er is that other objection, that we touch onely the fruite or effect which the faithfull take of the eating of the flesh of Christ. For we haue sayde before, that Christ himselfe is the substance of the Supper: and that therupon fol-loweth the effect, that by the sacrifice of his death we are cleansed from sinnes, by his bloud we are washed, by his resurrection we are raised vp into hope of the heavennely life. But the foolish imagination, whereof Lombarde was the author, hath perverted their mindees, while they thinke that the eat-ing of the flesh of Christ is the Sacrament. For thus sayeth he: The Sacra-ment and not the thing are the formes of brede and wine: the Sacrament and the thing, are the flesh and bloud of Christ: the thing and not the Sa-crament, is his mysticall slefe. Againe within a little after. The thing sig-nified and contained, is the proper flesh of Christ: the thing signified and not contained, is his mysticall body. Whereas he maketh difference be-tweene the flesh of Christ, and the effectual power of nourishing, wherewith it is endued, I agree: but whereas hee saitheth it to be a Sacrament, yea and contained vnnder brede, it is an error not to be suffred. Hereupon hath grow-en the false exposition of sacramentall eating, because they haue thought that wicked men also and euill doers doe eate the flesh of Christ, how much so euuer they be strangers from him. But the flesh of Christ it self: in the mysterie of the Supper is no lesse a spirituall thing than eternall saluation. Whereupon we gather, that whosoeuer be voyde of the Spirit of Christ, can no more eate the flesh of Christ then they can drinke wine wherewith is joyned no taffe. Truely Christ is too hainously torne in linder, when that dead body and which hath no lively strength, is given forth in common to vnbelieuere: and his express words are directly against it. Whosoeuer eateth my flesh and drinketh my bloud, abideth in me, and I in him. They aunswere that in that place is not entreated of the sacramentall eating: which I graunte, so that they will not nowe and then stumble against the same stone, in sayinge that the flesh it selfe is eaten without fruite. But I would knowe of them, howe long they holde it when they haue eaten it. Here, in my judgement, they shall have no waye to get our. But they object, that no-thing can bee withdrawn of faile of the promisses of God by the vntthank-fulnesse of men. I graunte in deed, and I say that the force of the myste-ric remayneth whole, whosoeuer wicked men doe, as much as in them ly-gth, endeuour to make it voyde. Yet it is one thing to be offred, and an other. thing to be receiued, Christ reacheth, this spiritual meate, and offreth this spiritual drinke to all men: some do greedily eate of it, some do lothingly refuse it: that these men refusing make the meate and the drinke to lose their nature? They will say that their opinion is holpen by this similitude, namely, that the flesh of Christ, though it be vnfauorie, is nevertheless his flesh. But I deny that it can be eaten without the taste of faith: or {if wee lift rather to speake as Augustine doeth} I say that men beare away no more of this Sacrament, than they gather with the vessell of faith. So nothing is abated from the Sacrament, yea the truth and effectualnesse thereof remaineth vnminished, although the wicked depart emptie from the outwarde partaking of it. If they againe obiect that this wordes, this is my bodie, is diminiished, if the wicked receive corruptible bread and nothing else: we have a solution reade, that God will not bee acknowledwen true in the receiuing it selfe, but in the fedfastnesse of his owne goodnesse, when he is reade to give, yet liberally offreth to the vnworthie that which they refuse. And this is the fulnesse of the Sacrament, which the whole world cannot breake, yet the flesh and bloud of Christ is no lesse given to the vnworthie than to the choen faithful ones of God: but therewithall it is true, that as water lighting vpon a harde stone, falleth away, because there is no entrice open into the stone: so the wicked do with their hardnesse drive backe the grace of God that it cannot pearce into them. Moreover, that Christ should bee receiued without faith, is no more agreeing with reaon, than feeede to budde in the fire. Whereas they aske, how Christ is come to damnation to some, vnlesse they receive him vnworthily, it is a verie colde question: for as much as wee no where reade, that men do procure death to themselves by vnworthily receiuing Christ, but rather by refusing him. Neither doth Christ's parable helpe them, where he faith that feeede groweth vp among thones, and afterwarde being chocked is marred: because he there entreateth, of what value the faith is which endureth but for a time, which they doe not thinke to bee necessarie to the eating of Christes flesh and drinking of his bloud, that in this behalfe do make Iudas equally fellowe with Peter, But rather by the same parable their errour is confuted, where Christ faith that some feeede falleth in the hie way, other some vpon stones, and neither of them taketh roote. Whereupon followeth that to the vnbelieuere their owne hardnesse is a let that Christ attaineth not to them. Whoseuer defirith to have our salvation holpen by this mysterie, shal finde nothing fitter, than that the faithfull being led to the verie fountaine, should drawe life out of the Sonne of God. But the dignitie of it is honorably enough set out, when wee kepee in minde that it is a helpe whereby wee be grafted into the body of Christ, or beeing grafted do more & more growe together, till hee doe fully make himselfe one with vs in the heauenly life. They obiect that Paul ought not to have made them gillie of the bodie & bloud of Christ, vnlesse they were partakers of them. But I answer that they are not therefore condemned because they have eaten them, but onely because they haue prophane the mysterie, in reading ynder seete the pledge of the holy conioyning with God, which they ought reverently to receiue. that article of doctrine, that nothing is abated from the Sacraments, nor the grace which they figure is made void by the insidelity or noughtiness of men; it shall be profitable to proceed clearly by his owne words, howe vnisatisfly and percutiously they do drawe that to this present cause, which causeth the bodie of Christ to dogges to eate. The sacramentall eating, after their opinion, is whereby the wicked receiuit the bodie and blood of Christ without the power of the Spirit, or any effect of grace. Augustine contrariwise wey-ing wisely those words, He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my bloud, shall not die for ever, sayeth: Namely the power of the Sacrament, not onely the visible Sacrament: and verily within, not without; he that eateth it in heart, not he that prefetcheth it with tooth. Whereupon at length he concluded that the sacrament of this thing, that is to say, of the vnie of the body & blood of Christ, is set before men in the Supper of the Lord, to some vnto life, to some vnto destruction: but the thing it selfe whereof it is a sacrament, to all men vnto life, to none vnto destruction, whosoever bee partaker of it. That none shoud here cauile, that the thing is called not the bodie, but the grace of the Spirit whereof they bee seuered from the bodie, the contrarie comparison betweene these two words of addition Visible and Invisible driueth away all these myfts: for vnder the first of them cannot be comprehended the bodie of Christ. Whereupon followeth that the vnbelieuers doe communicall onely of the visible signe. And that all dousing myght be better taken away, after that he had faied that this bread requireth the hunger of the inward man, he addeth: Moses and Aaron and Phinces, and many other that did eate Manna, pleased God. Why so? because the spirituall meete they spiritually vnderstood, spiritually hungered, spiritually tasted, that they might be spiritually filled. For wee also at this day haue receiued spirituall meat: but the Sacrament is one thing, and the power of the Sacrament is on other. A little after: and by this he that abideth not in Christ, and in whom Christ abideth not, without dout neither eateeth spiritually his flesh, nor drinketh his bloud, though carnally & visibly he prefetcheth with tooth the signe of the bodie and bloud. We heare againe that the visible signe is set in comparison as contrarie to spiritual eating. Whereby that error is confuted, that the bodie of Christ invisible is in deed eaten sacramentally, though not spiritually. We heare also that nothing is granted to prophane & vnchristian men beside the visible receiuing of the signe. Hereupon commeth his famous saying, that the other diçiples did eate the bread the Lord, but Judas did eate the bread of the Lord; wherin he plainly excluteth the vnbelieuers fro the partaking of the body & bloud. Neither teareth it to any other end which he faith in another place: What marueilest thou, if to Judas was giuen y bread of Christ, by which he might be made bond to the diuel: when thou feest on the contrary side y to Paul was giuen the Angel of the diuel, by whom hee might be made perfect in Christ? He faith verily in another place, y the bread of the Supper was the bodie of Christ to them to whom Paul faide, He that eateeth vnworthily, eateeth & drinketh judgement to himselfe: and that they haue not therefore nothing, because they haue receiued noughtily. But in what sense, he declareth more fully in another place. For taking in had purposely to define how the wicked & evil doers, which professe the Christian faith faith with mouth but with deeds doth deny it, doth eat the body of Christ, and that against the opinion of some which thought that they did not eat in sacrament onely but in very deed.) But neither (sayth he) ought it to be sayd that they eate the body of Christ, because they are not to be reckned among the members of Christ. For (to speake nothing of the rest (they can not together be the members of Christ, and the members of a harlot. Finall ly where himselfe sayth, He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my bloud, a bideth in me, and I in him, he sheweth what it is not sacramentally but in very deed to eate the body of Christ. For this is to abide in Christ, that Christ may abide in him. For, he so sayd this, as though he had sayd, he that abideth not in me, and in whom I abide not, let him not say or thinke that he doth eate my body, or drinke my bloud. Let the readers wey the thinges set as contraries in the comparison to eate, sacramentally, and in very deed: and there shall remaine no doubt. Hee confirmeth the same, no lesse plainly in these wordes: Prepare not your iawes, but your heart. Hereupon is this Supper commenced. Lo, we beleue in Christ, when we receiue by faith: in receiuing we know what to thinke. We receiue a little & are fatted in heart. Therefore not that which is seene, but that which is beleued, doeth feede. Here also y which the wicked receiue, he restraineeth to the visible signe: and teacheth that Christ is none otherwise receiued than by faith. So also in an other place, pronouncing expressly that the good and the euill doe communicate in the signes, he exclueth the euill from the true eating of the flesh of Christ. For if they receiued the thing it selfe, he would not vterly haue left that vsspoken which was more fit for his matter. Also in an other place, entreatyng of the eating and the fruite thereof, he concludes thus: Then shal the body and bloud of Christ be life to euery man, if that which in the Sacrament is visibly receiued, be in the truerth it selfe spiritually eaten, spiritually dronk. Therefore who so make vnbelieuers partakers of the flesh & bloud of Christ, that they may agree with Augustyne, lette them swee vs the visible body of Christ: forasmuch as, by his judgement, the whole truth is spiritual.

And it is certainly gathered out of his wordes, that the Sacramental eating, when vnbeliefe closeth vp the entrie to truerth, is as much in effect as visible or outarde eating. If the body of Christ might be eaten truely and yet not spiritually, what should be that meanes which he sayeth in an other place? Yee shall not eate this body which ye see, and drinke the bloud which they shall shedde that shall crucifie me. I haue commended a certaine Sacrament vnto you, being spiritually understood it shall quicken you. Verily he would not deny but that the same bodie which Christ offered for sacrifice, is delivered in the Suppers: but he did sette out the manner of eating: namely that bein received into heauenly glorie, by the secret power of the Spirite, it breatheth life into vs. I graunt in deed that there is oftentimes founde in him this manner of speaking, that the body of Christ is eaten of the vnbelie-uers: but he expoundeth himselfe, adding, In Sacrament. And in an other place hee describeth spiritually eating, in which our biringes consume not grace. And leaft mine auditors should say, that I fight with them with a heap of places, I would knowe of them howe they can vnwinde themselves from one lying of his, where he layeth that Sacramentes doe worke in the only elect that which they figure. Truly they dare not deny but y the bread in the Supper figureth the body of Christ. Whereupon followeth y the reprobate are debarrd from the partaking of it. That Cyrill also thought none otherwise, these wordes do declare. As if a man vpon molten waxe do powre other waxe, he wholly tempereth the one waxe with the other: so it is necessarify if any man receive the flesh & bloud of the Lordy he be joined with him that Christ may be found in him & he in Christ. By these wordes I think it is evident, that they are bereued of the true and reall eating, that do but sacramentally care the body of Christ, which can not be feuered from his power: and that therefor faileth not the faith of the promises of God, which ceaseth not to raine from heauen, although the stones and rockes conceive not the liquor of the raine.

35. This knowledge shall also easilly drawe vs away from the carnall worshipping, which some haue with perturbe rashnesse erected in the sacrament: because they made account with themselues in this manner: If it be the body, then both the soule and the Godhead are together with the body, which now can not be feuered: therefore Christ is there to be worshippd. First if their accompanying which they pretend be denied them, what will they do? For howe much more they cry out vpon an absurditie, if the body be feuered from the soule and the godhead: yet what found witted and sober man can perswade himselfe that the body of Christ is Christ? They think themselues in deed gaily to prove it with their logical arguments. But if Chrift speakeoth distinctly of his body and bloud, but describeth not the manner of presence: howe will they of a doubtfull thing gather certainly that which they would? What then? if their confciences chaunce to be exercised with any more greuous feeling, shall not they by & by with their logical arguments be dissolved and melt? namely when they shall see themselues destitute of the certaine word of God, vpon which alone our soules do stand fast, when they are called to account, & without which they faint at every first moment: whic they shall call to mind that the doctrine and examples of the Apostles are against them, & that themselues alone are to themselues the authors of it. To such motions shalbe added other not small prickinges. What? Shall it be a matter of no importance, to worship God in this forme, where nothing was prescribed vnto vs? When it concerned the true worship of God, ought they with so great lightnesse to have attempted that of which there is no where reade any one worde? But if they had, with such humblenesse as they ought, holden all their thoughtes vnder the worde of God, they would truely haue harkened to that which he sayde, Take, eate, drinke, and would haue obeyed this commandement, wherein he biddeth the sacrament to be receiued, not to be worshippd. But they which, as it is commanded of God, do receiue it without worshipping, are affirued that they do not swarue from Gods commandement: than which assurednes there is nothing better when wee take any worke in hand. They haue the example of the Apostles, who we read not to haue fallen down flat & worshippd it, but even as they were sitting, to haue receiued it & eaten it. They haue the use of the Apostolike Church, wherein Luke reporteth y the faithful did communie not in worshipping, but in bread and of bred. They haue the Apostles doctrine, wherewith Paul instruccted the Church
And these things verily tend to this end, that the godly reader hold weye howe perillous it is in suche matters to wander from the simple worde of God to the dreams of our owne braine. But those things that are aboue sayde, ought to deliuer vs from all dout in this behalfe. For that godly soules may therein rightly take holde of Christ, they must needes be lifted vppe to heauen. If this be the office of a Sacrament, to helpe the mind of man which otherwise is weake, that it may rife vpwarde to reach the height of spirittuall mysteries: then they which are holden downe in the outwarde signe do stray from the right way of seeking Christ. What then? Shall wee denie that it is a superstitious worshipping, when men doe throwe themselves downe before bread, to worship Christ therin? Doubtlesse the Nicene Synode meant to meet with this mischief, when it forbade vs to be humbly intentiué to the signes set before vs. And for none other cause was it in olde time ordained, that before the consecration the people should with a loude voice be put in mind to haue their heartes lifted vpwarde. The Scripture it selue also, beside that it diligently declareth vnto vs the ascension of Christ, whereby he conueyed away the presence of his body, from our sight & conversacion: to shake away from vs all carnall thinking of him, so oft as it maketh mention of him, commandeth vs to be in mindes raised vpwarde, and to seeke him in heauen sitting at the right hand of his Father. According to this rule he was rather to be spirittualll worshipped in heauenly glorie, than this so perillous a kinde of worshipping to be deviued, full of carnall and grosse opinion of God. Wherefore they haue inuented the worshipping of the Sacrament, haue not only drea\n\nmented it of themselues beside the Scripture, in which no mention of it can be shewed (which yet should not haue bene ouerpassed if it had bene accept\n\nable to God.) But also all the Scripture crying out against it, they have framed to themselues a God after the will of their owne lust, leaving the living God. For what is idolatry, if this be not to worship the giftes in stede of the giver himselue? Wherin they haue doublye offended: For both his honor taken from God was conueyed to a creature: and hee himselue also dishonoured in the delising and prophaning of his benefite, when of his holy Sacrament is made a curled idole. But let vs contrariwise, leaft we fall into the same pittie, throughly settel our cares, eyes, heartes, minds, and tongues in the holy doctrine of God. For that is the schoole of the holy Ghost, by best scholemiaster, in which such profit is attained, that nothing neede more to bee gotten from any where else, but we willingly ought to be ignoraunt of whatlocuer is not taught in it.

But nowe (as superstition, when it hath once passe\n\nth the right bounds, maketh no end of sinning) they fell a great way further. For they haue devised Ceremonies altogether strange from the institution of the Supper, to this end only that they might giue divine honors to the signe. We yeeld (say they) this worship to Christ. First, if this were done in the Supper, I would say that that worshipping onely is lawesfull, which resteth not in the signe, but is directed to Christ sitting in heauen. But nowe by what pretense doe they boast that they worchippe Christ in that bread: when they have no promise thereof?
thereof: They consecrate an host, as they call it, which they may carry about in pompe, which they may shew forth in a common gazin to be looked upon, worshipped, and called vpon. I aske by what power they thinke it to bee rightly consecrate. Verily they will bring forth those wordes, This is my body, But I will obiect to the contrary, that it was therewithall sayde, Take and eate. Neither will I doe that of nothing. For when a promise is knit to a commandement, I say that the promise is so contained vnder the commandement, that being leuered it is made no promise at all. This shalbe made plainer by a like example. God gave a commandement, when he sayde, Call vpon me: He added a promise, I will heare thee. If any man calling vpon Peter & Paul, do glory vpon this promise, will not all men cry out that he doth wrongfully? And what other thing I pray you, doe they which leaving the commandement concerning eating, doe catch holde of a maimed promise, this is my body, to abuse it to strage ceremonies from y institution of Christ? Let vs therefore remember that this promise is giuen to them which keepe the commandement joyned with it: but that they be destitute of all the word, which remove the Sacrament to any other way. We haue heretofore entreated howe the myterie of the holy supper serueth our Faith before God. But forasmuch as the Lorde doeth here not onely bring into our remembrance so great largesse of his bountie, as we haue before shewed, but doth as it were from hande to hande bring it forth, & stirreth vs to acknowledge it: he doth therewithall warne vs that we be not unthankfull to fo plentiful liberalitie: but rather that we should publish it with such praiues as it is meece, and aduaunce it with thanksgiving. Therefore when hee delivered the institution of the Sacrament it selfe to the Apostles, he taught them that they shoulde doe it in remembrance of him. Which Paul expoundeth, to declare the Lordes death. That is, publiquely and altogether with one mouth openly to confess, that all our assurance of life and salvation is reposed in the death of the Lorde: that wee may gloryse him with our confession, and may by our example exhorte other to giue glorie to him. Here againe it appeareth whereunto the marke of this Sacrament is directed, namely to exercisse vs in the remembrance of the death of Christ. For, this that wee are commanded to declare the Lordes death till he come to judge, is nothing else but that wee should publish that with confessio of mouth, which our faith hath acknowledged in the Sacrament, that is, that the death of Christ is our life. This is the second vsce of the Sacrament, which perteineth to outwarde confession.

38 Thirdly the Lord also willed it to be to vs in steede of an exhortation, than which none other can more vehemenly encourage and enflame vs both to purenessse and holinesse of life, and also to charitie, peace and agreement. For the Lorde doeth therein so communicate his body to vs, that he is made thorously one with vs, and we with him. Nowe sith hee hath but one body, whereof he maketh vs all partakers, it is necessarie that all we alio be by such partaking made one body. Which vnitieth the breade which is delucret in the Sacrament, representeth: which as it is made of many graines in such form mingled together that one can not be discerned from another; after the same manner we also ought to be conioyned and knit together with so great agree-

Agreement of minds, that no disagreement or division come between us. This I had rather to be expressed with Paul's words. The cup of blessing (faith he) which we bless, is the communicating of the blood of Christ: & the bread of blessing which we break, is the partaking of the body of Christ. Therefore we all are one body, that partake of one bread. We shall have verie well profited in the Sacramente, if this thought so shall bee imprinted and ingraven in our minds, that none of the brethren can bee hurt, despise, refuse, abused, or any wise bee offended of vs, but that therewithall we do in so doing hurt, despise, and abuse Christe with our injurious dealings: that wee can not disagree with our brethren but that wee must therewithall disagree with Christe: that Christ cannot bee loved of vs, but that hee must be loved in our brethren; that which care we haue of our owne body, such also we ought to haue of our brethren which are members of our body: as no part of our body is touched with any feeling of griefe, which is not spread abroad into all the other parts, so wee must not suffer our brother to be grieved with any euill whereof we should not also be touched with compassion. Therefore Augustine not without cause so oft calleth this Sacramente the bond of charitie. For what sharper spur could be put to vs, to stir vp mutual charitie among vs, than when Christ giveth himselfe to vs, doth not onely allure vs with his owne example that wee should mutually dedicate and deliver our selves one to another: but in so much as he maketh himselfe common to al, he maketh al vs alfo one in himselfe?

39 But hereby is that verie well confirmed which I haue saide in another place, that the true ministration of the Sacrament standeth not without the word. For whatsoever profite commeth to vs of the Supper, requireth the word: whether we be to be confirmed in faith, or to be exercised in confession, or be stirred vp to dutie, prayer is needfull. Therefore nothing can be more disordered done in the suppers, than if it bee turned to a dumbe action: as hath bene done under the tyranny of the Pope. For they would have the whole force of consecratio to hang uppon the intent of the Priest, as though this nothing pertaining to the people, to whom it most of all behooved that the mysterie should be declared. But whereas hath grown this error, they marked not that those promises wherewith the consecration is made, are directed not to the elements themselves, but to them receiue the. But Christ speakes not to the bread, it may be made his bodie, but commandeth his discipiles to eat, & promiseth to them the communicating of his body & blood. And none other order doth Paul teach, than that together with the bread and the cup, the promises should be offered to the faithful. Thus it is truely. We ought not to imagine any magickal inchauntment, that it be sufficient to have mumbled vp these words, as though the elements did hear them; but let vs understand that those words are a lively preaching, which may edifie the hearers, which may inwardly pierce into their minds, which may bee imprinted and setted in their hearts, which may sowe forth effectualnes in the fulfilling of which it promiseth. By these reasons it clearly appeareth, the laying vp of the Sacrament, which many do earnestly require, it may be extraordinarily distributed to sick, is unprofitable: For either they... receive it without rehearsing of the institution of Christ, or the minister shall together with the signe ioyne the true declaration of the mysterie. In silence is abuse and fault. If the promises be rehearsed, and the mysterie declared, that they which shall receive it may receive it with fruite, there is no cause why we should doubt that this is the true confectionation. To what ende then will that other confectionation come, the force whereof of commeth not so farre as to the sicke men? But they that do so, have the example of the old church.

I grant: but in so great a matter, and in which wee erre not without great danger, nothing is safer than to follow the truth it selfe.

40 Nowe as we see that this holy brede of the Supper of the Lorde is spiritual meat, no leffe sweete and delicate than healthfull to the godly worshippers of God, by the taft whereof they seele that Christ is their life, who it raiseth vp to thanksgiving, to whome it is an exhortation to mutuall charitie among themselves: so on the other side it is turned into a most noyfome poyson to all them whose Faith it doeth not nourishe and confirme, and whome it doeth not stirre vp to confession of praise and to charitie. For as bodily meate, when it findeth a stomache possessed with euill humors, being it selfe also thereby made euill and corrupted doeth rather hurt than nourishe: so this spiritual meate, if it light vppon a soule defiled with malice and naughtiness, throweth it downe headlong with greater fall: verily not by the fault of the meate itselfe, but because to defiled and vnbelieving men nothing is clean, though otherwise it bee neuer so much sanctified by the blessing of the Lorde. For (as Paul faith) they that eate & drinke vnworthily, are guiltie of the bodie and blood of the Lorde, and doe eate and drinke judgement to themselves, not decentering the bodie of the Lorde. For such kinde of men as without any sparcle of faith, without any zeale of charitie, doe thrust themselues foorth like swine to take the Supper of the Lorde, doe not discerne the body of the Lorde. For in so much as they doe not beleene that that bodie is their life, they doe as much as in them liceth to dishonour it, spoiling it of all the dignitie thereof, and finally in so receiuing it they prophane and defile it. But in so much as being estranged and disagreeing from their brethren, they dare mingle the holy signe of the bodie of Christ with their disagreemences, it is no thank to them that the bodie of Christ is not rent in sunder, and limmemaale torne in pieces. And so not vnworthily they are guiltie of the bodie and blood of the Lord, which they doe with vn godliness full of sacrilege so fowle desile. Therefore by this vnworthie eating, they take to themselves damnation. For wheras they haue no faith reposed in Christ, yet receiuing the sacrament they profeasse there is salvation for them no where else than in him, and doe forswear all other assiance. Wherefore they themselves are accusers to themselfes, they themselves pronounce witness against themselfes, and they themselves feale their owne damnation. Againe when they being with hatred and euill will divided and drawen in sunder from their brethren, that is, from the members of Christ, haue no part in Christ: yet they doe testifie that this is the onely salvation to communicat with Christ, and to bee made one with him. For this cause Paul commandeth, that a man prooue himselfe, before he eate of this brede or drinke of this cup. Whereby (as I expound it) he meant. meant that every man should descend into himself, and we with himself, whether he doe with inward affurance of heart rest upon the salvation which Christ hath purchased: whether he acknowledge it with confession of mouth; then whether he doe with defirous endeavour of innocency and holiness aspire to the following of Christ: whether after his example he be readie to give himselfe to his brethren, and to communicat himselfe to them with whom he hath Christ common to him: whether, as he himselfe is accounted of Christ, he do likewise on his behalf take all his brethren for members of his owne bodie: whether he couet to cheerish, defend and helpe them as his owne members. Not for that these duties both of faith and charitie can now be perfect in vs: but because we ought to endeavour this, and with all our desires to long toward it, that we may daily more and more encrease our Faith began.

41 Commonly when they goe about to prepare men to such worthines of eating, they have in cruell wise tormented and vexed poore consciences: and yet they brought never a whit of all those things that might servne to the purpose. They saide that those did eate worthily which were in state of grace. To be in state of grace they expounded to bee pure and cleansed from all sinne. By which doctrine all the men that euer haue at any time bin or nowe be in earth, were debared from the vs of this sacrament. For if we goe about this, to fetch our worthines fro our selues, we are utterly undone: onely despeire and damnable ruine abideth for vs. Though we endeavor with our whole strengthes, we hall nothing more preuaile, but that then at lasst we shall be most vnworthie, when wee haue most of all trauelled about seeking of worthines. To value this, they haue devised away to attaine worthines: that, as much as in vs lieth, making examination, and requiring of our selues accompt of all our doinges, we shoule with contrition, confession, and satisfaction cleanse our vnworthines: which way of cleansing, what manner of thing it is, we haue alreadie shewed there where was more conveniency place to speake of it. So much as serueth for our present purpose, I say ye these be too hungrie and vanishing comfortes, to dismayed and discouraged consciences, and such as as striken with horror of their sinne. For if it Lord by speciall forbidding,admitteth none to the partaking of the supper but the righteous and innocent: there needeth no small heedle that may make a man assured of his owne righteousnes which hee heareth to be required of God. But whereby is this assurednes confirmed vnto vs, that they are discharged afore God, which haue done so much as in them lay? But although it were so, yet when shal it be that a man may be bolde to affirme himselfe that he hath done as much as in him lay? So when there is made no certaine assurance of our worthines, the entrie shall alwaye remayne shut by that horrible forbidding, whereby is pronounced that they eate and drinke judgement to themselves, which eate and drinke vnworthily.

42 Now it is easie to judge what maner of doctrine this is which reigned in the Papacie, and from what author it hath proceeded, which with y outrageous rigor thereof, bereaught and spoyleth, misleable sinners & such as be tormented with feare and sorrow, of the comfort of this Sacrament in which yet all the sweete delicates of the Gospel were set before them. Surely the the devil could; by no readier way destroy men, than by so making them senseless, that they could not perceive the taste and favour of such food, wherein it was the will of the most good heavenly Father to feed them. Least therefore we run into such headlong downfall, let vs remember that this holy banquet is medicine to the sick, comforte to sinners, liberal gift to the poor: which bring no profit to the healthie, righteoues, and rich, if any such could be found. For whereas in it Christ is giuen vs for meat: we understand that without him we pine, starue, and faint, like as famine destroieith the lively strength of the body. Againe whereas he is giue vs for meat: we understand whether of him we are in our felues utterly dead. Wherefore this is the worthinesse both the onely and best that we can bring to God, if we offer to him our owne vilenes & (as I may so call it) vnworthines, y of his mercie he may make vs worthy of him: if we despeire in our selues, that we may be comforted in him; if we humble our selues, that we may bee raised vp of him: if we accuse our selues, we may be iustified of him: moreover if we aspire to that vnittie which he commendeth to vs in his supper: & as he maketh vs all one in himselfe, so if we wight to vs al altogether one soule one hart one tongue. If we haue these things throughly well weied & considered, such thoughts although they shake vs, yet shall never overthrow vs. As, how soold we being needie & naked of all good things, we desyled with ilhineses of sins, we halfe dead, eat the bodie of the Lord worthilie: We wil rather think that we being poore come to the liberal giuer, we seek to y Philisian, we sinners to the author of righteousesse, finally we dead men to him that giueth life: that that worthinesse which is commanded of God, consisteth chiefly of Faith, which reposeth all thinges in Christ and nothing in vs: and next of charitie, and the selues same charitie which it is enough to offer vnperfect to God, that he may increase it to better, forasmuch as it cannot be giuen perfect. Some other agreeing with vs in this, that the worthinesse it selfe consisteth in Faith and charitie; yet in the measure of worthinesse haue gone farre out of the way, requiring a perfection of Faith, whereunto nothing may bee added, and a charitie egall with that which Christ hath shewed towards vs. But hereby they do none other wise than those other before, drive all men away from comming to this holy Supper. For if their sentence should take place, no man (hold receiue but vnworthily, forasmuch as all without exception should be holde guiltie and convicte of their vnperfectnesse. And truely it were a point of too much amazed dulnesse, I will not say foolishnesse, to require such perfection in the Sacrament, as may make the Sacrament void and superfluous: which was not ordained for the perfect, but for the weake and feeble to awake, to stirre vp, to pricke forward and exercise the affections of faith and charitie, and to correct the default of either of them.

43 But so much as concerneth the outward forme of doing, whether faithfull receiue it in their hand or no, whether they deuide it, or euerie one cate that which is giuen him: whether they put againe the cup in the hand of y deacon, or deliuer it to y next: whether the bread be leauened, or unleaueed: whether the wine be read or white: it maketh no matter. These things be indifferent and left in the libertie of the Church. Howebeit it is certe, that the visage of the olde Church was, that euery one shoulde take it into his hande. And Christ saide, Diuide it among you. The histories report that it was leauened and common bread before the time of Alexander Byshop of Rome, which first delited in unleauened bread: But for what reaso\n\nsee not, unlesse it were with a newe sight to drawe the eyes of the common people to wondring at it, rather than to instruct their minde with good religion. I aduiie all them that are touched with any though but light zeale of godlinesse, to tel whether they do not euidently see, both howe much more brightly the glorie of O D shineth herein, and how much more aboundant sweetenesse of spirittual comfort commeth to the faithfull, than in these cold and playerlike trifles, which bring none other vse but to deceiue the senfe of the amazed people. This they call the holding of the people in religion, when being made foolish & senselesse with superstition it is drawn, whither they list. If any man will defende such intenctions by antiquitie, I my felfe also am not ignorant how auncient is the vse of chreisme, and blowing in Baptisme: Howe nie to the age of the Apostles the Supper of the Lord was infected with rustinesse: but this verily is the waiwardnes of mans boldnesse, which can not withholde it felfe but that it muft alway play and bee wanting in the mysteries of God. But let vs remember that God doeth so highly esteeme the obedience of his word, y he willeth vs in it to judge both his Angels and the whole worlde. Now, bidding farewell to so great a heape of ceremonys: it might thus have been most comely ministrd, if it were oft and at least every weake set before the Church, but that first they shoulde beginne with publike prayers: then a sermon shoulde be made, then the minifter, haung breade and wine set vp vnpon the boorde, shoulde rehearse the institution of the supper: and then shoulde declare the promisses that are in it left vnto vs: and therewithall shoulde excommunicate all them that by the Lords forbidding are debarrd from it, afterwarde they shoulde pray y with what liberalitie the Lord hath gien vs this holy foode, he would instruct & frame vs also with the same faith, and thankfullnesse of minde to receive it, and that forasmuch as wee are nor of our selues, he woulde of his mercie make vs worthie of such a banket: that then either Psalmes should be song, or somewhat red, and the faithfull should in seemely order communicate of y holy banket, the minifters breaking the bread and giving it to the people: that when the supper is ended, exhortation should be made to pure faith and confection of faith, to charitie, and to maners meete for Christians: last of all that giving of thanks should be rehearsed, and praises be song to God:which being ended the congregation should be let goe in peace.

44 These things that wee haue hitherto spoken of this Sacrament doe largely shewe, that it was not therefore ordeyned, that it shoulde bee received yearely once, and that slightly for maners sake (as nowe commonly the custome is) but that it shoulde bee in often vse to all Christians that with often remembrance they shoulde repeat the passion of Christ: by which remembrance they might lusteyne and strengthen their faith, and exhort themselves to sing confection of praise to God, and to publishe his goodnesse: finally by which they might nourithe mutuall charitie, and tenues it among themselves, whereof they sawe the knot in the vitrie of the body of Christ. For so oft as we communicatethe signe of the body of the Lord, we doe as by a token giuen and received, interchangeably binde our selues one to another unto all dutieis of love, that none of vs doe any thing whereby he may offende his brother, nor leaue any thing undone whereby he may helpe him, when neede requireth and abilitie sufficeth. That such was the vs of the Apostolike Church, Luke rehearseth in the Acts, when he faith that the faithfull were continuing in the doctrine of the Apostles, in communicating, in breaking of bread, and in prayers. So was it altogether meete to be done, that there should bee no assembly of the Church without the worde, prayers, partaking of the Supper and almes. That this order was also institute among the Corinthians we may sufficiently gather of Paul and it is certaine that in many ages afterwarde it was in vs. For thereupon came those olde Canons, which they fathervpon Anacleitus and Ca- lixus, that when the confection was done, all should communicate, that wil not be without the doers of the Church. And it is red in those olde Canons, which they cal the canons of the Apostles:that they which continue not vnto the ende, and do not receive the holy Communion, must bee corrected as men that moue vnquietnesse of the Church. Also in the Councell at Antioch, it was decreed that they which enter into the Church, and heare the scriptures, and doe abstaine from the communion, should be removed from the Church, till they haue amended this faulte. Which although in the first Councell at Toletum it was either somewhat qualified or at least fet forth in milder wordes, yet it is there also decreed, that they, which when they haue hearde the sermon, are founde neces to communicate, shoulde be warned; if after warning they abide ye the, they shoulde be debarred from it.

45 Verily by these ordinances the holy men meant to retayne & maintaine the often use of the Communion, which often use they had received from the Apostles the selues, which they saw to be most wholsome for the faithfull, & by little and little by the negligence of the common people to grow out of vs. Augustine testifieth of his owne time: The Sacrament (faith hee) of this thing, of the viatie of the Lordes bodie, is somewhere dayly, somewhere by certaine distances of the dayes, prepared vnto the Lordes table, and is there received at the table, to some vnto life, to other some vnto destruction. And in the first Epistle to Januarius: Some doe dayly communicate of the body and bloode of the Lord: some receive it at certaine dayes: in some places there is no day let passe wherein it is not offered: in some other places onely vpon the Saturday and the Sunday, and in some other places neuer but on the Sunday. But forasmuch as the common people was (as we haue saied) somewhat slacke, the holy men did call earnestly vpon them with sharpe rebukinges, leaft they should seeme to winke at such slothfulnesse. Such an example is in Chrylo to vpon the Epistle to the Ephesians. It is not faid vnto him that dishonored the banquet wherfore didst thou sit down? but, wherefore diddest thou come in? Whosoever is not partaker of the mysteries, hee is wicked and shamelesse for that hee standeth here present. I beseech you, if any be called to a banquet, weeketh his handes, sitteth down, seeth no to prepare hiselxe to eat, and then doeth taft of nothing: that he not shame both the banquet, and the maker of the banquet: So thou standing among among them that with prayer doe prepare themselves to receive the holy meate, haft even in this that thou haft not gone away confessed that thou art one of the number of them, at the last thou dost not partake: had it not bin better that thou hadst not bin present? Thou wilt say, I am unworthy.

Therefore neither wilt thou worthie of the communion of prayer, which is a preparing to the receiving of the holy mystery.

46 And truly this custome, which commandesth to communicate yerelely once, is a most certaine invention of the diuell, by whose minifterie focuer it was brought in. They say that Zepherinus was author of that decree, which it is not likely to have bene such as we now haue it. For he by his ordinance did peradventure not after the worst manner provide for the church, as the times then were. For it is no doubt but that then the holy supper was not before the faithfull so oft as they came together in assembly, neither is it any doubt but that a good part of them did communicate. But when it scarcely at any time happened that all did communicate together, and whereas it was neecessary they which were mingled with prophane men and idolaters, should by some outward signe testifye their faith: the holy Mass for order and policies sake, appointed that day, wherein the whole people of Christians should by partaking of the Lords supper vter a confession of their faith. The ordinance of Zepherinus being otherwise good hath beene cruelly wrested of them that came after, when a certaine lawe was made of one communicating yereely: whereby it is come to passe, that almost all men when they have once communieate, as though they had gaily discharged themselues for all the rest of the yeare, sleepe soundly on both ears. It ought to haue bene farre otherwise done. Every weeke at the leaft, the Lords table should be set before the assembly of the Christians; the promises should bee declared, which might bee vs spiritually at it; none shold in deed be compelled by necessitie, but all shold bee exhorted and pricked forward: the sluggishnesse alfo of the slothfull should be rebuked. Al shold by heapes, as hungry men, come together to such dainties. Not without rightfull cause therefore at the beginning I complained, that by the craft of the diuell this custome was thrust in, when which it appointeth one certaine day of the yeare, maketh men slothfull for all the rest of the yeare. We see in deed that this peruerse abuse was crept in eu en in the time of Chrysoftome: but we may also therewithall see how much it displeased him. For he complaineth with grieuous wordes in the same place in which I eu en nowe alleaged, y there is so great inequality of this manner, that often in some times of the yeare they came not ev en when they were cleane, but at Easter they came even when they were vnclene. Then he crieth out: O custome. O presumption. Then in vaine is the daily offering wof in vaine we stond at the altar; there is none that partaketh togethether with vs. So farre is it off that he allowed it by his authoritie approy ned to it.

47 Out of the same shop proceded also another ordinance, which hath stolen away or violently taken away the halfe of the supper from the better number of the people of God, namely the signe of the blood, which being denied to lay & profane men (for with such titles forfooth they set out Gods inheritance) became a peculiar possession to heaven and annoynted men.
It is the commandement of the eternal God, that all should drinke, which commandement man dare discontinue and repel with a new and contrarie law, commanding that not all should drinke. And these lawmakers should not fee me to fight without reason against their God, they pretend peril that might happen if this holy cup were commonly given to all: as though those dangers had not beene foreseen & marked of the eternal wisdom of God. And then subtly forsooth they reason, that the one is enough for both. For if (say they) it be the body, it is whole Christ, which cannot now be feuered from his bodie. Therefore by accompanying the bodie containeth the bloud. Lo how our wit agreeith with God, when it hath neuer so little began with loose reins, to be wanton and wilde. The Lord shewing bred faith that it is his bodie: when he sheweth the cup, he calleth it his bloud. The boldnes of mans reason, crieth out contrariwise, that the bread is the bloud, and the wine is the bodie: as though the Lord had for no cause seuered his body from his bloud both in wordes and in signes: or as though it had euer been heard spoken that the bodie or bloud of Christ is called God & man. Verily if he had meant to signify whole himselfe, he might haue said it is I: as he is wont to speake in the scriptures, and not, this is my body, this is my bloud. But he willing to help our weakenes, did set the cup feuerally from the bread, to teach that he sufficeth no leafe for drink than for meat. Nowe let one parte be taken away, then wee shall finde but one halfe of the nourishmentes in him. Therefore, although it be true which they pretend, that the bloud is in the bread by way of accompanying, and againe, the bodie in the cup, yet they defraude godly soules of the confirmation of faith which Christ deliuereth vs as necessarie. Therefore bidding their suetleties farewell, we must hold fast the profit which is by the ordinance of Christ in the two earneftes.

48 I knowe in deede that the ministers of Sathan do here caull, as it is an ordinarie thing with them to make mockerie of the Scriptures. First they allege that of one bare doing ought not to be gatherd a rule whereby the Church shoule be bounde to perpetuall obseruing. But they lie when they say that it was but a bare doing: for Christ did not onely deliuer the cup, but also did institute that his Apostles shoule in time to come do the same. For they are the wordes of a commender, drinke ye all of this cup. And Paul so rehearseth that it was a deede, that he also commendeth it for a certaine rule. Another starting hole is, that the Apostles alone were receiued of Christ to the partaking of this supper whome he had alreadie chosen & taken into the order of the sacrificing Priests. But I woule have them answer mee to these questions, from which they shall not be able to escape, but that they shalbe easily convinced with their lies. First, by what oracle have they this solution reualed, being so strange from the wordes of God: The Scripture reckoneth twelve that sate with Iesus: but it doeth not so obscure the dignitie of Christ that it calleth them sacrificing Priests of which name wee will speake hereafter in place fit for it. Though he gave it then to the twelve, yet he commanded that they shoule do the same, namely that they shoule so distribute it among them. Secondly, why is that better age, from the Apostles almost a thousande yeares, were all without exception made made partakers of both the signs? was the old church ignorant what gifts Christ had received to his supper? It were a point of most desperate shameless here to tickle and daily in granting it to be true. There remaine the ecclesiastical histories, there remaine the books of the old writers, which minister evident testimonies of this matter. The fleshe (sayth Tertullian) is fed with the body and bloud of Christ, that the foule may be fattened with feeding upon God. Howe (sayde Ambrose to Theodosi) wilt thou receiue with such handes the holy body of the Lorde? With what boldnesse wilt thou with thy mouth partake of the cup of the precious bloud? And Hierome sayth. The priests which make the Thanksgiving, and doe distribute the bloud of the Lorde to the people. Chrysostome. Not as in the old lawe, the Priest did caste part, and the people parte: but one body is set before all, and one cuppe. Those things that perteine to the Thanksgiving are all common betweene the Priest and the people. The selfe same thing doeth Augustine testify in many places.

49 But why dispute I about a thing most known? Let all the Greeke and Latine writers be read out of such testimonies shall each where offer the selues. Neither was this custome grown out of vfe, while there remainede one drop of purenesse in the Church. Gregorie, whom you may rightly say to have beene the last Bishop of Rome, teacheth that it was kept in his time. What is the bloud of the lambe, ye haue now learned, not by hearing but by drinking. His bloud is pured into the mouthes of the faithfull. Yea it yet endu- red foure hundred yeares after his death, when all thinges were grown out of kinde. For neither was that taken only for an vsage, but also for an inviolable law. For then was in force the reverence of Gods institution, & they doubted not if it was sacrilege, to seuer those things which the Lord had coniyned. For thus faith Gelasius. We haue founde, ysome receiving only the portion of the holy body, do absteine from the cup. Let them without doubt, because they seeme to be bound with I wot not what superstition, either receive the Sacraments whole, or be debarred from the whole. For the doing of this mystery is not committed without great sacrilege. Those reasons of Cyprian were heard, which truly ought to moue a Christian mind. How (sayth he) do we teach or provoke them to shed their bloud in the confessing of Christ, if we deny his bloud to them that shall fight? Or how do we make them fit for the cup of Martyrdom, if we doe not first in the church by the right of communion admit them to drink the cup of the Lord. Whereas the Canonists do restraine that decree of Gelasius to the Priests, that is so childish a cauill that it neede not to be confuted.

50 Thirdly, why did he simply say of the bred, that they should eat: but of the cuppe, that they should all drinke? even as if he had meant of set purpose to meete with the craft of Sathan. Fourthly, if (as they would haue it) the Lorde vouchsafed to admit to his supper onely sacrificing Priests, what man ever durft call to the partaking of it, strangers whom the Lorde had excluded? yea and to the partaking of that gift, the power whereof was not in their handes, without any commandement of him which only could give it? Yea upon confidence of what warrant do they vs at this day to distribute to the common people the Signe of the body of Christe, if they haue neither commandement nor example of the Lord: Fisly, did Paul ye, when he said to the Corinthians, that he had received of the Lorde that which he had delivered to them? For afterwade he declareth the thing that hee delivered, that all without difference should communicate of both the signes. If Paul received of the Lord, that all should be admitted without difference: let them looke of whom they have received which doe drue away almost all the people of God: because they cannot nowe pretend God to be the author of it, with whom there is not yea and nay. And yet shall for cloaking of such abhominations they dare pretend the name of the church, and with such pretence defend it. As though either these Antichristes were the church, which so easly tread vnderfooce, scatter abroade, and destroy the doctrine and institution of Christ: or the Apostolike Church were not the churche, in which the whole force of religion flourished.

The xviii. Chapter.

Of the Popish Mass, by which sacrilege the Supper of Christ hath not only been prophesied, but also brought to nought.

With these and like intencon Satan hath travailed, as by overspreading of darkenesse to obscure and defile the holy supper of Christ, that at least the purenesse of it should not be kept still in the Church. But the heade of horrible abomination was when hee aduancened a Signe, by which it might not onely be darkened and pervertted, but being utterly blotted and abolished shoulde vanishe and fall out of the remembrance of men; namely when he blinded almost the whole world with a mott pestilent error, that they should beleue that the Maffe is a sacrifice and obligation to obtaine the forgivnesse of sinnes. Howe at the beginning the founder forth of the schoolemen tooke this doctrine, I nothing regard: farewell they with their crabbed suttleties: which howesoeuer they may be defended with cauilling, yet are therefore to be refused of all good men, because they doe nothing elles but spreade much darkenesse over the brightnesse of the Supper. Therefore bidding them farewell, lette the readers understande that I here match in fight with that opinion, wherewith the Romihe Antichrist and his Prophetes haue infested the whole world, namely that the Masse is a worke whereby the sacrificing Priest which offereth vp Christ, and the other that doe partake at the same oblation, doe deserve the favour of GOD: or that it is a cleansing sacrifice, whereby they reconcile GOD to themselves. Neither hath this beene received onely in common opinion of the people, but the very doing it selfe is so framed, that it is a kinde of pacifying wherewith satisfaction is made to GOD for the purging of the quicke and dead. The wordes also which they vie, doe expresse the same: and no other thing may we gather of the daily use of it. I knowe hoe deepere rootes this pestilence hath taken, vnder hoe great seeming of goodness it lurketh, howe it beareth in howe the name of Christes, howe in the one name of Masse many beleue that they comprehend the whole summe of faith. But when it shalbe by the worde of God most clearely proved, that this Masse, how how much gocuer it bee coloured & glorious; yet shamefully dishonoureth Christ, burieth & opprest him, spoileth his spoile, putteth his death in forgetfulness, taketh away the fruites that commeth there of. unto vs, doth weaken & destroy the sacrament whereon was left the memeory of his death: shall there then be any so deepe roots, which this most strong axe, I mane the word of god, shall not cut downe & overthowe? Is there any face so beautifull, that this light cannot bewray the euil which lurketh under it?

2. Let vs therefore shew that which hath beene set in the first place, that it is intollerable blasphemie & dishonor done to Christ. For he was consecrate of his father a priest & bishop, not for a time as we reade that they were ordaine in the old testament, whose life being mortal, their priesthood also could not be immortal, for which cause also there needed successors, should from time to time be put in the place of them that died. But in place of Christ, which is immortal, there needed no vicar to be set after him. Therefore he was ordained of the Father a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedech, that he should execute an everlaﬆing priesthood. This mystery had bene long before figured in Melchisedech, whom when scripture had once brought in for the priest of the living God, it never afterwards made mention of him; as though he had had no ende of his life. After this point of likenesse, Christ was called a priest according to his order. Nowe they that do daily sacrifice, must needs appoint priests to make the oblations, whom they must appoint as it were successors and vicars in the stead of Christ. By which putting in stead of him, they doe not solely spoyle Christ of his honour, and plague from him the prerogative of eternal priesthood, but also traualle to thrust him downe from the right hande of his Father, on which he cannot fit immortal, but that hee must therewithall remaine the eternall priest. Neither let them lay for themselues, that their pettie sacrificers are not put in place of Christ as if he were dead, but onely are helpers of his eternall priesthood, which ceaseth not therfore to continue. For they are more strongly holden fast with the wordes of the Apostle, than that they may escape; namely, that there were many other priests made; because they were by death letted to continue. Therefore there is but one that is not letted by death, and he needeth no companions. Yet, such is their straوردness, they arme themselues with the example of Melchisedech to defende their wickednesse. For, because it is saide that he offered bread and wine, they gather that he was a foreshewing of their Masle: as though the likenesse betweene him and Christ were in the offering of bread and wine. Which is so emptie and trifling that it needeth no confusion. Melchisedech gave bread and wine to Abraham and his companions, to refresh the being weariest after their journeie and battaile. What is this to a sacrifice? Moses praieth the gentlenesse of the holy king: these fellows vnseasonably comminge a mystery whereof no mention is made. Yet they deceitfully paint their error with an other color, because it followeth by and by after. And he was the priest of the huest God. I answer, that they wrongfully draw to the bread and wine that which the Apostle referreth to the blessing. Therefore when he was the priest of God he blessed Abraham. Whereupon the Heb. 7.7; same Apostle (than whom we neede to seeke no better expostor) gathereth. his excellence, because the letter is blessed of the greater. But if the oblation of Melchisedech were a figure of the sacrifice of Maffe, would the Apostle, I pray you, which searcheth out all even the least things, have forgotten so earnest and weightie a thing? Nay (howsoever they trifle) they shall in vaine goe aboute to overthrowe the reason which the Apostle himselfe bringeth, that the right and honour of sacrificing priesthoode ceaseth among mortall men, because Christ which is immortal, is die onely and perpetuall sacrificing priest.

3. An other virtue of the Maffe was, that it oppressteth and bureth the crosse and passion of Christ. This verily is most certaine, that the crosse of Christ is ouerthrown to soone as the alter is set vp. For if he offered himselfe for a sacrifice upon the crosse, that he might sanctifie vs for ever, and purchase to us eternall redemption: undoubtedly the force and effectuall effecte of that sacrifice continueth without any end; Otherwise we should think nothing more honourably of Christ, than of oxen and calves which were sacrificed under the lawe: the offerings whereof are proved uneffectuall & weake by this that they were oft renuend. Wherefore either we must confess, that the sacrifice of Christ, which he fulfilled upon the crosse, wanted the force of eternall cleansing, or that Christ hath made an end of all with one sacrifice once for ever. This is it that the Apostle sayeth, that this chiefe bishop Christ once appeareth by offering vp of himselfe before the ending of the world, to the driving away of sinne. Again, That we are sanctified by the will of God, by the offering of the bodie of Iesus Christ once. Again, That Christ with one oblation for ever hath made perfect them that are sanctified: whereunto he adjoineth a notable sentence that forgiveness of sinnes being once purchased, there remaineth no more any oblation. This also Christ signifieth by his last saying, and uttered among his last gaspings, when he said, It is ended. We are wont to note the last sayings of men when they are dying, for oracles. Christ dying testifieth that by his one sacrifice is perfected & fulfilled whatsoever was for our salvation. Shall it be lawful for vs daily to patch innumerable sacrifices to such a sacrifice, (the perfection whereof he hath so shunningly set forth) as though it were unperfect? When the holy word of God not only affirmeth, but also trieth one, and procesth, that this sacrifice was once fully done, that the force thereof remaineth everlasting; whose require an other sacrifice, do they not accuse this of imperfection and weaknesse? But as for the Maffe, which hath beene delivered in such sort that there may every day be made a hundred thousand sacrifices, to what end tendeth it, but that the passion of Christ, whereby he offred him an only sacrificed oblation to the Father, should by buried & drowned? Who, vnclesse he be blind, cannot see that it was the boldnes of Satan which wras- fited against so open and cleare truth? Neither am I ignorant with what deceits that Father of lying weth to colour this his fraud, saying that there are not sundrie nor diverse sacrifices, but that one selfe same sacrifice is repetted. But such smokes are easly blown away. For in the whole discourse the Apostle trauaileth to prove, not only that there are no other sacrifices, but that one sacrifice was once offered vp, & that no more be repeated. The fur- seller men do ye yet flie out at a narrower hole, saying, it is not a repea... bur an applying. But this Sophistical argument also is no less easily confuted. For neither did Christ once offer vp himselfe with this condition: that his sacrifice shd be daily confirmed with new oblations: but by the preaching of the Gospel, & ministering of the holy Supper, the fruit thereof should be communicated vnto vs. So Paul faith that Christ our paschouer was offered vp, & biddeth vs to cate of him. This (I say) is the mean whereby the Sacrifice of the Cross is rightly applied to vs, when it is communicated to vs to take the vs of it, & we with true faith receive it.

4. But it is worth the labour to heare, with what other foundation beside these they uphold the sacrifice of the Maffe. For they drawe to this purpose the prophecie of Malachie, whereby the Lord promiseth that the time shall come when throughout the whole world there shall be offered to his name incense and a cleane sacrifice. As though it were a newe or unawonted thing among the Prophets, when they speake of the calling of the Gentiles to express by the outward, ceremonial of the lawe the spiritual worshipping of God, to which they exhort them, that they might the more familiarly declare to the men of their age, that the Gentiles should be called into the true fellowship of religion. Like as also they are wont altogether to describe by figures of their law, the truth that was delivered by the Gospel. So they set for turning to the Lord, ascending into Jerusalem: for the worshipping of God, the offering of all kinds of gifts: for larger knowledge of him which was to be given to the faithful in the kingdom of Christ. threemes & visions, That therefore which they allege, is like unto an other prophecie of Esay, where the Prophet foretelleth of three altars to be set vp in Assyria, Egypt, and Iu-

ry. For first I ask, whether they doe not grant that the fulfilling of this prophecie is in the kingdom of Christ. Secondly, where be these altars, or when they were ever set vp. Thirdely whether they thinke that to ever-ye several kingdomes is appointed a several Temple, such as was that at Ierusalem. These things if they wry, I think they wil confesse, that the Prophet vnder figures agreeable with his time, prophesie of the spiritual worship of God to be spread abroad into the whole world. Which we glue to the for a solution. But of this thing sith there doe every where examples commonly offer themselves, I wil not burie my self in longer rehearse of them. Howbeit herein also they are misterably deceived, that they acknowledge no sacrifice but of the Maffe, whereas in deed the faithful do nowe sacrifice to the Lord, & do offer a cleane offering of which shall be spoken by and by.

Nowe I come downe to the third office of the Maffe, where I must declare howe it blotteth out the true and onely death of Christ, and shake it out of the remembrance of men. For as among men the strength of a testament hangeth upon the death of the testator: so alfo our Lord hath with his death confirmed the testament whereby he hath given vs forgiveness of sinnes and eternall righteousness. They that dare varie ot make newe any thing in this testament, doe denie his death, and holde it as it were of no force. But what is the Masse, but a newe and altogether diuerse testament? For why? Doeth not every several Maffe promise newe forgiveness of sinnes, newe purchasing of righteousness, so that nowe there be so many testamentes, as there be Masses? Let Christ therefore come againe.
and with an other death confirm this testament, or rather with infinite deathes confirm innumerable testamentes of Masse. Haue not therefore said true at the beginning, that the only and true death of Christ is blotted out by Masse? Yea what shall we say of this that the Masse directly tendeth to this end, that if it be possible, Christ should be slaine againe? For where is a testament (faith the Apostle) there of necessitie must be the death of the testator. The Masse is the end it selfe to be a newe testament of Christ: therefore it requireth his death. Moreover the hoste which is offered, must necessarily be slaine and sacrificed. If Christ in every feteral Masse be sacrific'd, then hee must at every moment bee in a thousande places cruelly slaine.
This is not mine, but the Apostles argument. If he had needed to offer him-selvse off, he must of haue died since the beginning of the worlde. I knowe that they haue an aunswere in readinesse, whereby also they charge vs with flander. For they say that that is objected against them which they neuer thought, nor yet can. And wee knowe, that the death and life of Christ is not in their hand. Wee looke not whether they goe about to kill him: onely our purpose is to shewe, what manner of absurditie followeth of their ungodly and wicked doctrine. Which selue thing I proue by the Apostles owne mouth. Though they criе out to the contrarie a hundred times, that this sacrifice is vnbloudie. I will denie that it hangeth upon the will of men, that sacrifices should change their nature, for by this meanes the holy & in-iualoble ordinance of God should faile. Whereupon followeth that this is a true principle of the Apostle, that there is required shedding of bloud, that waffing may not be wanting.

6 Now is the fourth office of the Masse to be entreated of, namely to take away from vs the fruite that came to vs of the death of Christ, while it makest vs not to acknowledge it and thinke on it. For who can call to minde that he is redeemed by the death of Christ when he feeth a newe redemption in the Masse? Who can truft that sinnes are forgiven him, when he feeth a newe forgiuenesse? Neither shall he escape that shall say, that wee do for no other cauе obtaine forgiuenesse of sinnes in the Masse, but because it is alreadie purchased by the death of Christ. For he bringeth nothing else than as if he should boyst, that Christ hath redeemed vs with this condition that we should redeeme our selues. For such doctrine hath beene spread by the minifters of Satin, and such at this day they maintain with cryings out with swords & fire, that we when in the Masse wee offer vp Christ to his Father, by this worke of offering do obteine forgiuenesse of sinnes, & are made partakers of the passion of Christ. What nowe remaineth to the passion of Christ, but to be an example of redemption, whereby we may learne to bee our owne redeemers? Christ himselfe, when in the Supper he sealeth y confidence of pardon, doth not bid his discipkes to sticke in that doing, but tendeth them away to the sacrifice of his death: signifying that the Supper is a moniment or memorialis (as the common speach is) whereby they may learn that the satisfactorie cleansing sacrifice, by which the Father was to bee appeased, must have bene offer'd but once. For neither is it enough to knowe that Christ is the only sacrificing, vnlesse the only sacrificial be joyned with it; y our faith may be fasten'd to his crosse.
7 Now I come to the conclusion, namely that the holy Supper, in which the Lord had left the remembrance of his passion graven and expressed, is by the setting vp of the Masse, taken away, defaced, and destroyed. For the Supper itself is the gift of God, which was to be received with thanksgiving. The sacrifice of the Masse is fained to pay a price to God, which he may receive for satisfaction. Howe much difference there is betwene to give and to receive, so much doth the sacrifice differ from the Sacrament of the Supper. And this truely is the most wretched vs thankefullnesse of man, that where the largeffe of God's bountie ought to have bin acknowledged, and thankes to be geuen, therein he maketh God his debtor. The Sacrament promiseth, that by the death of Christ we are not onely once restored into life, but are continually quickned, because then all the partes of our salvation were fulfilled. The sacrifice of the malle fingeth a farre other song, that Christ must be daily sacrificed, that he may somwhat profit vs. The Supper shoulde have beene distributed in the common assemblie of the Church, that it might enforce vs of the communion whereby we all cleaue together in Christ Jesus. The sacrifice of the Masse dissolueth and plucketh in sunder this communitie. For after that the error grewe in force, that there must be sacrificers that shoulde sacrifice for the people, the Supper of the Lorde as though it were posted over to them, ceased to bee communicated to the congregation of the faithfull according to the commandement of the Lorde. An entry was made open to priuate Masses, which might rather resemble a certaine excommunication, than that same communitie ordained of the Lord, when the pettie sacrificer willing feuerally by himselfe to devour his sacrifice, doth feuer himselfe from the whole people of the faithfull, I call priuate Masse (leaff any man be deceived) wherefoever there is no partaking of the Lordes Supper among the faithfull, although otherwise a great multitude of men be present.

8 And whence the very name of Masse first sprong, I could never certenly judge: sauing that it seemeth to me likley that it was taken of the offeringes that were gien. Whereupon the olde writers vs it commonly in the plural number. But to laue struing about the name, I say that priuate Masses are directly against the ordinance of Christ, and therefore they are a wicked profaning of the holy Supper. For what hath the Lorde commandad vs not to take, and divide it among vs? What manner of observing of the commandement doth Paul teach? not the breaking of bread, which is the communion of the body & bloud? Therefore when one taketh it without distributing, what likenesse is there? But that same one man doth it in the name of the whole Church. By what commandement? Is not this openly to mucke God, when one man priuately taketh to himself that which ought not to have bene done but among many? But because the wordes of Christ and Paul are plaine enough, we may briefly conclude, that wherefoever is not breaking of bread to the communion of the faithfull, there is not the Supper of the Lord, but a false and wrothfull counterfating of the Supper. But a false counterfating is a corrupting. Now the corrupting of so great a mystery is not without wickednesse. Therefore in priuate Masses is a wicked abuse. And (as one fault in religion from time to time breedeth another) after that that manner of offering without communion was once crept in, by little and little they began in every corner of Churches to make innumerable Masses, and diversly to draw the people hither and thither, which should have come together into one assembly, that they might acknowledge the mystery of their own vanity. Now let them go and deny it to be idolatry, that in their Masses they shew forth bread to be worshipped in stead of Christ. For in vain they boast of those promises of the presence of Christ, which howsoever they be vnderstood, verily were not given to this purpose, that wicked & profane men, so oft as they will, and to whatsoever abuse they lift, may make the body of Christ: but that the faithfull, when with religious observation they doe in Celebrating of the Supper follow the commandement of Christ, may enjoy the true partaking of him.

9 Beside that, this persuerfies was unknowne to the purer Church. For howsoever the more shamelesse sort among our adversaries doe here go about to disguise the matter with false colours, yet it is most sure that all antiquitie is against them, as wee haue afore prooved in other things, and it may more certainly be indiged by the continual reading of old writers. But ere I make an ende of speaking of it, I ask our Masling doctors, see they knowne that obedience is more esteemed of God than oblations, and that hee more requireth that his voyce be harkened to, than that sacrifices bee offered: nowe they beleue that this manner of sacrificing is acceptable to G O D, whereof they haue no certaine commandement, and which they see not to be allowed by any one syllable of the Scripture. Moreover when they heare the Apostles say, that no man taketh to himselfe the name and honor of sacrificing priesthood, but he that is called as Aaron was, yea & that Christ himselfe did not thrust in himselfe, but obeyed the calling of his Father: either they must bring forth God the author and ordeiner of their sacrificing priesthood, or they must confesse that the honour is not of G O D, into which they haue with wicked raffines broke in vncalled. But they can not fhow one title of a letter by mainteineth their sacrificing priesthood. Why therefore shall not their sacrifices vanishe away, which can not bee offered without a priest?

10 If any man doe thrust in short sentences of the olde writers gathered here and there, and doe by their authority traunile to prove that the sacrifice which is done in the Supper is farre otherwise to be vnderstond than wee doe expounde it: let him be briefly aunswered thus: if the question be of allowing the forged device of sacrifice, such as the Papistes haue saied in the Maffe, the olde writers doe never speake in defence of such sacrilege. They doe in deed eue the word Sacrifice: but therewithall they expounde, that they meane nothing else but the remembrance of that true and onely sacrifice, which Christ our onely sacrificing priest (as they eech where reporte of him) made on the croffe. The Hebrues (sayeth Augustine) in the sacrifices of beasts which they offered to G O D, did celebreate a prophecye of the sacrifice to come, which Christ offered: the Christians doe with the holy oblation and partaking of the body of Christe celebrate a remembrance of the sacrifice already made. Here verily he teacheth altogether the same thing, which is written in most words in the books of faith to Peter the Deacon, whosoeuer be thy author of it. The words be these: Belieue most stedfastly and and doubt not at all, that the only begotten himselfe, being made flesh for vs, offered himselfe for vs a sacrifice and oblation to God into a savour of sweeteneffe: to whome with the Father and the Holy Ghost in the time of y old testament beasts were sacrificed; and to who me now with the father and the holy Ghost (with whom he hath an holy place) the holy Church throughout the whole world cease not to offer the sacrifice of bread and wine. For in those fleshly sacrifices was a figuring of the flesh of Christ which he should offer for our sinnes, and of his blood which he should shed to the forgiveness of sinnes. But in this sacrifice is thanksgiving and rehearsal of the flesh of Christ which he offered for vs, & of his blood which he hath shed for vs. Wherupon Augustine himselfe in many places expoundeth to be nothing else but a sacrifice of praise. Finally you shall commonly find in him, that the supper of the Lord is for no other reason called a sacrifice, but because it is the remembrance, image, and witness of that singular, true, and only sacrifice wherewith Christ hath cleansed vs. Also there is a notable place in his fourth booke of the Trinitie the xxiii. Chapter, where after that he hath discoursed of the only sacrifice, he thus concludes: because in a sacrifice fewer things are considered, to whom it is offered, and of whom, what is offered, and for whom. The same he himselfe the one and true mediator reconciling vs to God by the sacrifice of peace, remaineth one with him whom he offered: maketh them one in him for whom he offered: is one himselfe which offered, and the thing which he offered. To the same effect also speaketh Chrysostome. But they so challenge the honour of sacrificing priesthoode to Christ, that Augustine testifieth it to be the voice of Antichrist if any man make a Bishop intercessor betweene God and men.

Yet doe we not deny but that the offering vp of Christ is there so shewed in vs, that the spectacle of the cross is in a manner set before our eyes: as the Apostile saith that Christ was crucified in the eyes of the Galathians, when the preaching of the cross was set before them. But forasmuch as I see those old Fathers also wiesed this remembrance another way than was agreeable with the institution of the Lorde (because their supper contained I wote not what repeated or at least renewed forms of sacrificing) the safest way for godly hearts to be rest in the pure and simple ordinance of God: whose also the supper is therefore called, because in it his authority alone ought to be in force. Truly sith I finde that they have kept a godly and true sense of this whole mysterie, and I do not perceve that they meant to abate any thing were it never so little from the only sacrifice of the Lord, I cannot condemn them of vn godliness: yet I think they cannot be excused, but they have offended somewhat in the manner of the celebration. For they counterfeited the Jewish manner of sacrificing more nearly than either Christ had ordained, or the nature of the Gospel did beare. Therefore that same outward appliance to heavenly things is the only thing wherein a man may worthily blame them, for that being not contented with the simple & natural institution of Christ, they swarueto the shadowes of the law.

If a man doe diligently way, that this difference is put by the words of the Lord between the sacrifices of Moses, and our Thanksgiving, that whereas those did represent to the Jewish people, the same effeualienesse
Of the death of Christ, which is at this day delivered to us in the Supper, yet the manner of representing was diverse. For in those, the Levitical Priests were commanded to figure that which Christ should perform it: there was brought a sacrifice which should be in the stead of Christ himselfe: there was an altar whereupon it should be offered: Finally all things were so done, y there was set before their eyes an image of sacrifice which was to be offered to God for a satisfaction cleansing. But since the time that the sacrifice is ended, the Lord hath appointed to us another order: namely that it should convey to the faithful people the fruit of the sacrifice offered to him by the Sonne. Therefore hee hath given vs a table whereat wee should eat, not an altar whereupon sacrifice should be offered; hee hath not consecrated priests to sacrifice, but ministers to distribute the holy banquet. Howe much more hie and holie the mysterie is, so much more religiously & with greater reverence it is meete to be handled. Therefore there is no way safer, than putting away all boldnesse of mans understanding, to sticke fast in that alone which the Scripture teacheth. And truely if wee consider that it is the Supper of the Lorde and not of men, there is no cause why we should suffer our felues to bee removed one heire breadth from it by any authoritie of men or prescription of yeares. Therefore when the Apostle minded to cleanse it from all all faultes which had already crept into the Church of the Corinthians, hee voucheth the readiest way thereunto, that is, he calleth it backe to the onely institution of it, from whence he sheweth that a perpetual rule ought to be fetched.

13 Nowe least any wrangler, shoulde stirre vs vp strife by reason of the names of sacrifice and sacrificing priest, I will also declare, but yet breefely what in the whole discours I haue meant by a sacrifice, and what by a sacrificing priest. Whose stretehe the worde sacrifice to all holy Ceremonies and doinges of religion, I see not by what reason they doe it. We doe knowe that by the continual use of sacrifice a sacrifice is called that which the Greekes call sometime Thufia, sometime Prophora, sometime Telete. Which being generally taken comprehended whatsoeuer is in any wise offered to God. Wherefore we must make distinction: but yet so that this distinction may have a supernall appliance of similitude from the sacrifices of the lawe of Moses: vnder the shadowes whereof the Lorde willed to represent to his people the whole truth of sacrifices. Of those although there were diverse forms, yet they may all bee referred to two sortes. For either there was oblation made for sinne after a certaine manner of satisfaction, whereby guiltinesse was redeemed before God: or it was a signe of the worshipp of God, and a testifying of religion: sometime in stead of Supplication, to crave the favour of God: sometime in stead of thanksgiving, to testify thankfulnesse of minde for benefits receiued: sometime only for an exercitse of godlinesse, to renewe the establishing of the covenant: to which latter sort pertained burnt offerings, drinke offerings, oblations, first fruits, and peace offerings. Wherefore let vs also divide ours into two kindes: and for teacheinges sake let vs call the one the sacrifice of worship and of Godly devotion, because it consisteth in the honouring and worshipping of God, which the faithfull both owe and yeeld unto him: or, if you will, the sacrifice
The sacrifice of Thanksgiving: forasmuch as it is given to God of none but of them that being laden with immeasurable benefits, do render to him themselves with all their doings. The other may be called propitiatory or of expiation. The sacrifice of expiation is that which tendeth to appease the wrath of God, to satisfy his judgment, and to wash and wipe away sins: whereas the sinner cleaved from the filthy spots of them, and restored into purity, may return into favour with God himself. So in the law theoph were called sacrifices that were offered for the purging of sins: not for that they were sufficient to recover the favor of God, or to put away iniquities: but for that they shadowed out such a true sacrifice which at length was fully done by Christ alone, and by him alone, because it could be done by none other: and once, because the effectualness and force of that one sacrifice which Christ hath fully done, is eternal, as he himself hath testified with his own mouth, when he said that it was ended and fulfilled: that is to say, that whatsoever was necessary to the reconciling of the Fathers favor, to the obtaining of the forgiveness of sins, to righteousness and to salvation, all the same was performed and fulfilled with that his only oblation, and therefore nothing wanted thereof, that there was afterward no place left to any other sacrifice.

14 Wherefore I determine, that it is a most wicked reproach, and blasphemy not to be suffered, as well against Christ as against the sacrifice which he hath fully done by his death upon the cross for us, if any man by renewing an oblation think to purchase the pardon of sins, to appease God, and to obtain righteousness. But what is else done by MSNBC, but that by desiring of a new oblation we may be made partakers of the passion of Christ. And, if there might be no measure of madding, they thought it but a small thing to saye that there is made indifferently a common sacrifice for the whole Church, unless ye further sayd that it is in their choice to apply it peculiarly to this man or that man to whom they would, or rather to every one whatsoever he were that would buy for himself such ware with ready money. Now because they cold not reach to the price that Ludas had, yet that they might in some manner resemble their author, they kept the likeness of number, Ludas sold him for thirtie florin pence: these fellows fell him, after the French account, for thirtie brazen pence: but Ludas sold him once, these fellows fell him as oft as they can finde a buier. In this sense also we denote that they bee sacrificing priests, that is to say, they with such an oblation are meanes to God for the people, they appeasing God, may purchase the fatis factorie purging of sins. For Christ is the only Bishop & sacrificing priest of the new Testament, into whom all Priests are remoued, & in whom they be shut vp and ended. And if the Scripture had made no mention of the eternal Priesthood of Christ; yet for so much as God, since that he hath taken away thofe old Priesthoods, hath ordained none, the Apostles argument remaineth invincible, no man taketh honor to himself but he that is called of God. By what assurance therefore dare these robbers of God, that boast themselves for the butchers of Christ, call themselves the sacrificing Priests of the living God?

15 Plato hath an excellent place in his second booke of common weale.
Where when he entreateth the olde maners of expiation, and laugheth to scorne the foolsih confidence of euil men and wicked doers, which thought that their wicked doynges were by these as by courtinges hidden that ye gods could not see them, and did, as if they had gotten warrant of the gods by couenant, more carfully follow their owne lustes; bee seemeth throughly to touch the manner of satisfactorie purging of the Masse, suche as it is at this day in the world. To beguile and undermine an other man, all men knowe to be vnlawefull. To grecue widowes with wrongfull dealings, to robb the fa-therleffe, to trouble the poore, by euill craftie meanes to catche other mens goods to themselues, with forewearnings and deceits to enter forceably into any mans possessions, to oppresse any man with violence & tyrannous feare, all men confesse to be wicked. How therefore dare so many commonly do all these things, as though they should freely be bolde to doe them? Truely, if we rightly wye it, no other cause doeth so much encourage them, but because they have confidence, that by the sacrifice of a Masse, as by payment of full price for recompence, they shall satisfie God, or at the leaft that this is an easie way to compounde with him. Then Plato proceedeth further to scorne their grosse blockishnesse, which thinke that by such satisfactorie cleansinges those peines are redeemed that otherwise they shoulde suffer in hell. And where to serue at this day the yecerely obites, and the greater part of Masses, but that they which throughout all their life have been most cruell tyrantes, or most raunous robbers, or gien foorth to al mischious doings, should as though they were redeemed by this price, escape the fire of purgatorie?

16 Vnder the other kinde of sacrifice, which we haue called the sacrifice of Thankesgiving, are contenied all the dutifull workes of charitie, which when we extende to our brethren, we honour the Lord himselfe in his memers: then, all our prayers, praifings, giyings of thankes, and what fouver we do to the worshipping of God. All which things finally do hang vpon the greater sacrifice, whereby we are in soule and body halowed to be a holy te-ple to the Lorde. For neither is it enough, if our owarde doynges be appli-ced to the obeying of him: but if our fcelues, and then all that is ours ought to be consecrat and dedicaｔ to him: that whatsoever is in vs, may serve his glory, and may favor of zealous endeavour to advance it. This kinde of sacri-ifice tendeth nothing at all to appease the wrath of God, nothing at all to obtaine forgiuencesse of finnes, nothing at all to defere righteoufnesse: but is occupied only in magnifying & extolling of God. For it can not be pleasant and acceptable to God, but at their handes, whom by forgiuencesse of finnes already receiued he hath by other meanes reconciled to himselfe, and therfore acquited them from guiltinesse. But it is so necessarie for the Church, that it can not be away from it. Therefore it shalbe everlastinge, so long as the people of God shall continue, as we haue before already shewed out of the Prophet: for in that meaning I will take this prophecie. For from the rising of the sunne to the going downe thereof, great is my name among the Gentiles, and in euerie place incense shalbe offerd to my name, and a cleane offering: because my name is terrible among the Gentiles, sayth the Lord: So far is it off, that we would put it away. So Paul biddeth vs to offer our bodies a sacri-a sacrifice living, holy, acceptable to God, a reasonable worshippe. Where he spake verie pithile, when he added that this is our reasonable worship-ning; for he meant the spiritual manner of worshipping of God, which he did secretly set in comparison against the carnall sacrifices of the lawe of Moses. So liberall doing of good and communicating are called sacrifices by which God is pleased. So the liberalitie of the Philippians, whereby they had releued the pouertie of Paul, is called a sacrifice of sweete smelling. So all the good worke of the faithfull are called spiritual sacrifices.

17 And why doe I secke out many examples? For commonly this manner of speaking is often founde in the scriptures. Yea and while the people of God was yet holden vnder the outwarde schooleing of the lawe,yet the Prophetes did sufficiently expresse, that vnder those carnall sacrifices was the true st, which the Christian Church hath common with the nation of the Iewes. After which manner David prayed, that his prayer might as incense ascende into the sight of God. And Osee called giuings of thanks, the values of lippes, which in an other place David calleth the sacrifices of praife. Who the Apostle himselfe following, calleth them also the sacrifices of praife, & expoundeth them the fruities of lippes confessing to his name. This kind of sacrifice the Supper of the Lorde cannot want; wherein when we declare his death and render thanksgiving, wee doe nothing but offer the sacrifice of praife. Of this office of sacrificinge, all wee Christians are called a kingly Priesthood; because by Christ wee offer to God that sacrifice of praife of which the Apostle speaketh, the fruit of lippes that confess to his name.
For neither doe we with our giiftes appeare in the sight of God without an intercessor. Christ is hee, which being the mediator comming between, we offer vs and ours to the Father. Hee is our Bishoppe, which being entred in the sancturie of heaven, hath opened the entrie to vs. Hee is the altar, upon which wee lay our giiftes, that in him wee may bee noble all that wee are bolde. It is hee (I say) that hath made vs a kingdome and Priests to the Father.

18 What remaineth, but that the blinde may see, the deafe may heare, children themselves may vnderstande: this abomination of the Maffe, which being offered in a golden cup, hath made dronke the kings and peo-oples of the earth, from the hiest to the lowest, hath so stricken them with drowneinesse and giddinessesse, that being become more fenelesse than brute beasts, they haue set the whole ship of their sacrstie only in this deadly deuoring gulf. Truely Satan neuer did bend himselfe with a stronger engine than this to affale and vanquish the kingdome of Christ. This is the Helene, for whome the enimies of the true st fight at this day with so great rage,so great furiousness, so great crueltie: and a Helene in deed, with whome they so desile themselves with spiritual whoridome; which is the most cursed of all.
I doe not here so much as once touch with my little finger those grosse ar-buses wherewith they might colour the vnholie purencesse of their holy Maffe: howe filkie markettinges they vs, howe unholie giaines they make with their maffinges, with howe great rauncheing they fill their couetousnes.
Onely I doe point vnto, and that with fewe and plaine worde, what manner of thing is euem the vertie holiest holinessse of the Maffe, for which it hath de-
desired in certain ages past to be so honorable & to be had in so great reverence. For, to have these so great mysteries set out according to their worship, requireth a greater workes; and I am unwilling to mingle herewith those filthy uncleannes but that commonly sheweth themselves before the eyes and faces of all men: that all men may understand, that the Mass taken in her most piked pureness, and where in it may be set out to the best shew, without her appendances, from the root to the toppe swarneeth full of all kindes of wickednes, blasphemie, idolatrie, and sacrilege.

19 The Readers nowe haue in a manner almost all those things gathered into an abridgement, which we have thought behoouful to be known concerning these two Sacramentes: the vs of which hath bene delivered to the Christian Church from the beginning of the newe testament, to continue to the verie ende of the world; namely, that Baptisme should be as it were a certaine entrie into it, and an admission into faith: and the supper shoulde be as it were a continual foode, whereby with Christ spiritually feedeth the familie of his faithfull. Wherefore as there is but one God, one faith, one Christ, one Church his body: so there is but one Baptisme, and is not oft ministred againe. But the supper is from time to time distributed, that they which have bene once received into the Church, may understand by they be continually feed with Christ. Beside these two as there is no other sacrament ordainèd of God, so neither ought the Church of the faithfull to acknowledge any other. For, that it is not a thing that lieth in the choice of man to raise and set vp newe sacraments, he shall eaily understande that remembereth that which hath bene here before plainly enough declared, that is, that Sacramentes are appointed of God to this end, that they should instruct vs of some promise of his, and testify to vs his good will toward vs; and he also that calleth to minde, that none hath bin Godes counsellor, that might promise vs any certaintie of his will, or assurance vs, and bring vs out of care, what affection he beareth toward us, what he will give, or what he will take away. For therewith is also determined, that no man can set forth a signe to bee a testimonie of any will or promise of his: it is he himselfe alone, that can by a signe giv en testify to vs of himselfe. I will speake it more briefly, and parabrauluer more grossly, but more plainly, A Sacrament can never be without promise of salvation. All men gathered on a heape together can of themselves promise nothing of our salvation. Therefore neither can they of the Sacramentes set fourth or set vp a sacrament.

20 Therefore let the Christian Church be contented with these two, and let her not only not admit or acknowledge any thinde for the present time, but also not desire or looke for any to the end of the world. For whereas certaine diuere Sacramentes, beside those their ordinarie ones, were given to the Iews, according to the diuere course of times, as Manna, Water springing out of the rocke, the Brafen serpant and such other: they were by this change put in minde that they should not stay vpon such figures, whose faine was not verie fed faine: but that they should looke for some better thing from God, which should continue without any decaying, and without any end. But we are in a farre other case, to whom Christ is openly shewed: in whom all the treasures of knowledge and wisdome are hidden with with so great abundance and plentie, that either to hope for or looke for any newe encreafe to these treasures, is verily to move God to wrath, and to procure him against vs. Wee must hunger for, feeke, looke vppon, leerne, and throughly leerne Christ alone, vntill that great day shall appeare, wherein the Lord shall openly shewe to the full the glorie of his kingdom, and himselfe such as he is, to be beholden of vs. And for this reason this our age is in the Scriptures signified by the last houre, the last dayes, the last times, that no man should deceiue himselfe with vaine looking for any new doctrine or revelacion. For many times & in many sorts he spake before of his prophets: in these last dayes the heavenly Father hath spoken in his beloved Sonne, which onely can manifestly shewe the Father: and in deede he hath manifestly shewed him to the full, so much as behoueth vs, while we now beholde him by a glasse. As therefore this is nowe taken away from men, that they cannot make newe Sacraments in the Church of God: so it were to be wished, that as little as were possible of mans invention might be mingled with those Sacraments that are of God. For like as when water is powered in, the wine departeth and is delayed: and as with leauen scattered among it, the whole lumpe of doae waxeth fouer: so the purenesse of the mysteries of god is nothing else but defiled when man addeth any thing of his owne. And yet we see how farre the Sacraments are swarued out of kinde from their natural purenesse, as they be handled at this day. There is ech where too much of pompes, ceremonies, and gesturings: but of the worde of God in this meane time there is neither any consideration nor mention, without which even the Sacraments them selves are not Sacraments. Yea and the verie ceremonies that are ordained of God, in so great a rout cannot once lift vp their head, but lie as it were oppressed. Howe little is that scence in baptisme, which onely ought there to have shined and beene looked vpon, as wee haue in an other place rightfulluy complained, even baptisme it selfe: As for the Supper, it is vterly buried, since that it hath beene turned into the Maffe, sauing that it is seence once every yeare but in a mangled and halfe torne fashion.

The xix. Chapter.

Of the five falsely named Sacraments: where it is declared, that the other five which have beene hisberso commonly taken for Sacraments, are not Sacraments: and then is shewed what manner of things they be.

O vr former discourse concerning Sacraments might have obteined this with the sober and willing to leerne, that they shoule not ouer curiously procee to any further, nor shoule without the worde of God embrace any other Sacramentes beside those two which they knewe to be ordained of the Lorde. But forasmuch as that opinion of the feuen Sacraments, being commonly vsed in all mens talke, hauing wandered through all schoolees and preachinges, hath by very auencerctie gathered rootes, and is yet still settled in the mindes of men: I thought that I should do a thing worthy the travel, if I shoule severally and more nearly search those other five that are commonly adnumbred among the true and natural Sacraments of the Lord.
Oft although instruments they now and there wilJofGod excellent they unproporneIle in the speaking. All this I graunt: although it was better that the wordes should be made subject to things, than things to the wordes. But in the name of Sacrament there is another consideration. For they which make seven Sacraments, do therewithall giue to them all this definition, that they be visible formes of invisible grace: they make them altogether vessels of the holy Ghost: instruments of giving of righteounnesse, causes of the obtaining of grace. Yea and the Master of the sentences himselfe denyeth that the Sacraments of the lawe of Moses are properly called by this name, because they did not deliuier in deed the thing that they figured. Is it, I beseech you, to be suffered, that those signes which the Lorde hath hallowed with his owne mouth, which he hath garnished with excellent promises, should not be accounted for Sacramentes: and in the meanes time this honour should be conveyed to those vsages which men either have devised of themselves, or at least doe observe without express commandement of God: Therefore either let them change the definition, or let them abide frome the wrongful v sing of this world, which doth afterward engender false opinions & full of absurdities. Extreme annoying (say they) is a figure and cause of invisible grace, because it is a Sacrament. If wee ought in no wise to graunt that which they gather vpon it, then truly we must resiit them in the name it selfe, leaft thereby we admit that it may giue occasion to such an errour. Againe when they would professe it to be a Sacrament, they adde this cause, for that it consisteth of the outewarde signe and the word. If we finde neither commandement nor promise of it, what can we do else but criue out against them?

Now appeareth that we bawle not about the worde, but do moue a controversie not superfluous concerning the thing it selfe. Therefore this we must strongly hold fast, which we haue with inuincible reaso before confirmed, that the power to institute a Sacrament is in the hande of none but of God only. For a Sacrament ought with a certaine promise to raise vp and comfort the confections of the faithful: which could never receive this certaintie from man. A Sacrament ought to bee to vs a witnessing of the good will of God toward vs, whereof none of all men or Angels can be witnesses, forasmuch as none hath bene of Gods counsel. Therefore it is he alone which doth with right authoritie testifye of himselfe to vs by his word. A Sacrament is a scale, wherewith the testament or promise of God is sealed. But it could not be sealed with bodily things and elements of this world, vnsiue they be by the power of God framed and appointed thereunto. Therefore man can not ordaine a Sacrament, because this is not in the power of man, to make that so great mysteries of God should lyce hidden under so base things. The worde of God must go before, which may make a Sacrament to be a Sacrament.
The Apostles therefore they were grown to an age of discretion, should be brought before the bishop, that they should fulfill that due, which was required of those that being grown... grown in yeares did offer themselves to baptism. For these falfte among those that were to be catechized, till being fully instructed in the mysteries of the faith, they could make a confession of their faith before the bishop and the people. Therefore they that were baptized being infantes, because they had not then made confession of their faith before the church, were about the ende of their childhood or in the beginning of their yeares of discretion presented againe by their parents, and were examined of the Bishop according to the forme of the Catechisme, which they had then certaine & common. And that this doing, which otherwise ought worthily to be grave and holy, might have the more reverence and dignitie, there was added also the Ceremonie of laying on of handes. So that same childe, his faith being allowed, was let go with solemn blessinge. The olde writers doe oft make mention of this maner. Leo the Pope wrieth: If any returne from Heretikes, let him not be baptised againe: but (which he wanted among the Heretikes) let the vertue of the Spirit be given him by the Bishops laying on of his handes. Here our aduersaries will erie out, that it is rightfully called a Sacrament, in which the holy Ghost is giuen; but Leo himselfe doeth in another place declare what he meaneth by those wordes: Who so (saith hee) is baptised among heretikes, let him not be rebaptised, but with calling upon the holy Ghost, let him be confirmed with laying on of handes: because he received onely the forme of baptism without sanctifying. Hierome also maketh mention of it, writing against the Lucifersians, But although I doe not deny that Hierom somewhat errreth therein, for that hee saith that it is an obseruation of the Apostles: yet he is most farre from these mens folies. And the verie same also hee qualifieth, when he addeth, that this blessing is giuen to the bishops onely, rather in honor of their prieshood then by the necessitie of lawe. Therefore such laying on of hands, which is done simply in steede of blessing, I praffe and would that it were at this day restored to the pure vs thereof.

5 But the later age hauing in a manner blotted out the thing itself, hath fet I wote not what fained confirmation for a Sacrament of God. They have fained that the vertue of confirmation is, to giue the holy Ghost to the encreafe of Grace, which in baptism was giuen to innocencie: to strengthen them to battaile, which in baptism were newe begotten to life. This Confirmation is celebrate with annoynting, and with his forme of wordes, I signe thee with the signe of the holy croffe, and confirme thee with the chresme of saluation, in the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost. All this is gaily and trimly done. But where is the word of God, that may promise here the presence of the holy Ghost? They cannot bring foorth one title. Whereby then will they certifie vs, that their chresme is the vessel of the holy Ghost? We see oyle, that is, a thick and fat liquor & nothing else. Let the wordes (faith Augustine) bee added to the element, & there shalbe made a Sacrament. Let them (I say) bring foorth this wordes, if they will have vs in the oyle to looke vpon any thing but the oyle. If they did acknowledge themselves ministers of the Sacramentes, as they ought, we needed to striuie no longer. This is the first law of a minister, that he do nothing without commandement. Go to, let them bring foorth any commandement of this point of ministerie, & I will not speake one worde more. If they haue no commandement, they cannot excufe their boldnesse full of fcarilege. After this maner the Lord asked the Pharisees, whether the baptism of Iohn were from heauen or from men: if they had answered, for men, then he had made them confess that it was tripling and vaine: if from heauen, then were they compelled to acknowledge the doctrine of John. Therefore left they should too much flander Iohn, they durft not confess that it was from men. If therefore Confirmation be from men, it is proued to be vaine and tripling: if they will persaude vs that it is from heauen, let them prowe it.

6 They do in deede defend themselves with the example of the Apostles, whome they thinke to have done nothing rashly. That is well in deede: neither would we blame them, if they shewed themselves followers of the Apostles. But what did the Apostles? Luke reporteth in the Acts, that the Apostles which were at Hierufalem, when they heard that Samaria had received the worde of God, sent thither Peter & Iohn: they prayed for the Samaritans, that they might receive the holy Ghost, which was not yet come into any of them, but they were baptised onely in the name of Iesus: when they had prayed, they laid their hands vpon them: by which laying on, the Samaritans received the holy Ghost. And of this laying on of hands he diverse times maketh mention. I heare what the Apostles did: that is, they faithfully executed their ministerie. The Lord willed that those visible and wonderfull graces of the holy Ghost, which he then poured out vpon his people, should be miniftered and distributed of his Apostles by the laying on of hands. But vnder this laying on of hands: I thinke there was not contained any hier mysterie: but I expound it, that they adjoynd such a ceremonic, that by the verie outward doing they might signifie, that they commended and as it were offered to God him vpon whom they laied their hands. If this ministerie which the Apostles then executed, were yet stil remaining in the Church, the laying on of hands also ought to be kept. But since that same grace hath ceased to be gien, where to serueth the laying on of hands? Truly the holy Ghost is yet present with the people of God, without whom being guider & director, the Church of God cannot stand. For we haue the eternall promife & which shall ever stand in force, by which Christ calleth to himselfe them that thirst, that they may drinke living waters. But those miracles of powers, & manifest workings, which were distributed by the laying on of hands, haue ceased, neither behouded it that they shoulde bee, but for a time. For it behooved that the preaching of the Gofpel while it was newe, should be gloriously set forth & magnified, with vnheard of and vnwonte miracles. From which when the Lord ceased, he did not by and by forfake his Church, but taught that the royltice of his kingdom & the dignitie of his worde was excellently enough disclosed. In what point therefore will these stageplayers say that they follow the Apostles? They shoulde haue done it with laying on of hands, that the euident power of the holy Ghost might by and by be vifible. This they bring not to passe: why therefore doe they boaft that the laying on of hands maketh for them, which we read in deede that the Apostles yied, but altogether to another end?
7 This hath like reason as if a man should teach that y breathing where-with the Lord breathed upon his disciples, is a Sacrament whereby the holy Ghost is given. But whereas the Lord did this once, he did not also will we should do the same. After the same manner also the Apostles laid on their hands, during the time that it pleased the Lord that the visible graces of the holy Ghost should be distributed at their prayers: not that they which come after, should only playerlike & without the thing in deede counterfeit an emptie & cold signe, as these apes do. But if they proue that in laying on of hands they follow the Apostles, (wherein they have no like thing with the Apostles) sauing I wroue not what ouerthwart wrongfull counterfaite) yet whence commeth their oyle which they call the oyle of saluation? Who taught them to seeke saluation in oyle? Who taught them to give to it the power of strengthening? Did Paul, which draweth vs farre away from the elements of this world, which condemnethe nothing more than the sticking such pety obseruations? But this I boldly pronounce, not of my selfe, but from the Lorde. Who so call oyle the oyle of saluation, they forswere the saluation which is in Christ, they deny Christ, they have no part in the kingdom of God. For oyle is for the belly, and the belly for oyle, the Lord shall destroy both. For all these weake elementes, which decay with very vite, belong nothing to the kingdom of God, which is spiritual and shall never decay. What then? Will some men say: do you mesure with the same mesure, the water wherewith we be baptised, and the bread & wine vnder which the Supper of the Lord is giuen? I answere that in Sacramentes giuen of God, two things are to be looked vnto: the substance of the bodily thing which is set before vs, and the forme that is by the worde of God printed in it, wherein lyeth the whole strength. In respect therefore that the bread, wine, and water that are in the Sacramentes offered to our sight, doe keepe their own substance, this laying of Paul alway hath place, Meate for the belly, and the belly for meate: God shall destroy them both. For they passe and vanish away with the fashion of this world. But in respect that they be sanctified by the word of God, that they may be Sacraments, they do not hold vs in the flesh, but do truely and spiritually teach vs.

8 But let vs yet more neerely looke into it, how many monsters this fast liquor fostereth and feedeth. These annointers say, that the holy Ghost is giuen in baptism, to innocence: in Confirmation, to increase of grace: that in Baptisme, we are newe begotten into life: in confirmation, we are prepared to battle. And they are so paft shame, that they deny that baptism can well be done without confirmation. O wickednesse! Are we not therefore in baptising buried together with Christ, being made partakers of his death, that we may be also parteners of his resurrection? But this fellowwhippe with the death & life of Christ Paul expoundeth to be the mortifying of our flesh, and quickning of our Spirit: for that our old man is crucified, that we may walke in newnes of life. What is to be armed to battell if this be not? If they counted it a matter of nothing, to tread vnder feere the worde of God: why did they not yet at least reverence? Church, to whom they will in every point seeme so obedient? But what can bee brought forth more strong a-gainst their doctrine, than y decrees of the Mileuitane councel? Who so faith that that baptism is gien only for forgiueneffe of sinnes, and not for a helpe of grace to come; accursed be he. But whereas Luke, in the place which wee, haue alleged, faith that they were baptised in the name of Iefus Chrift, which had not received the holy Ghost; he doeth not simply deny that they were endued with any gift of the holy Ghost, which beleeued in Chrift with hart, and confessed him with mouth: but meaneth of that receiuing of the holy Ghost, whereby the open powers and visible graces were received. So is it saide that the Apostles received the Spirit on the day of Pentecoff, whereas it had bin long before lay de vnto them of Chrift, it is not you that speake, but the Spirit of my Father which speake in you. Behold al ye that are of God, the malicious and poysenous deceite of Satan. That thing which was truly gien in baptism, hee lyingly sayth to be gien in his confirmation, that he may by stealth leade you vnware from baptism. Who now can dout that this is the doctrine of Satan, which cutting away from baptism the promifes properly belonging to baptism, doth conteue away and remove them, to an other thing? It is found (I say) vpon what maner of foundation this godly an-nointing standeth. The word of God is, that all they which are baptised in Chrift, haue put on Chrift with his giftes. The word of the anointers is, that they receiued in baptism no promife, by which they may be armed in bar-tails. That is the voyce of truth: threfore this must be the voyce of lying. Therfore I can more truly define this confirmation than they haue hitherto defined it: namely, it is a notable slander of baptism, which darkeneth yea abolisheth the vie therof: that it is a false promife of the deuill, which draweth vs away from the truth of God. Or, if you wil, it is oyle deffiled with the lying of the deuill, which as it were by overspreading of darkenesse deceiueth the eyes of the simple.

9 They adde furthermore, that all the faithful ought after baptism to receiue the holy Ghost by laying on of hands, that they may be founde full Christians: because he saith never be a Christian, y is not chreifed with the bishoppes Confirmation. These be their owne sayinges worde for worde.
But I had thought what other things perteined to Christianitie, were all set forth in writing and comprehended in Scriptures. Now, as I perceiue, the true forme of religion is to be sought and learned from these worde than out of the Scriptures. Therefore the whole wisedome of God, the heavently trueth, the whole doctrine of Chrift, doth begin Christians, and oyle maketh them perfect. By this sentence are damned all the Apostles, and so many Martyrs, whom it is most certaine to haue never beene chreifed: forasmuch as the oyle was not yet made, which being pouted vpon them, they might full al ye parts of christianitie, or rather might be made Christians which yet were none. But, though I holde my peace, they doe largely consume themselues. For howe many of the number of their owne people doe they anoint after baptism? why therefore doe they suffer such halfe christians in their flocke, whose imperfection might easily bee holpen? Why doe they with so careless negligence suffer the to omit that which was not law-full to be omitted without grousous offence? Why do they not more seere-ly, call vpon the keeping of a thing fo necessearie, and without which fualtio cannot be obtained, viles peraduenture some be prevented by death? Verily when when they so freely suffer it to be despised, they secretly confesse that it is not of so great value as they boast it.

10 Last of all they determine, that this holy anointing is to bee had in greater reverence than baptism: because this anointing is peculiarly mi-nered by the hands of the chiefie bishops, but baptism is commonly distributed by every Priest. What may a man here say, but they are utterly mad, which so flatter their owne intentions, that in comparison of them they carelessly despise the holy ordinances of God? O mouth that robbest God, darceft thou set a fatte liquor only defiled with the stinke of thine owne breath, and enchaunted with murmuring sound of words, against the Sacrament of Christ, and to compare it with water hallowed with the words of God? But thy wickednesse accounted this but a small matte: whence thou didst also prefer it above the same. These be the answeres of the holy see, these be the Oracles of the Apostolike trefle. But some of them, even in their owne opinion, begonne somewhat to qualify this unbridled madnesse. It is (lay they) to be worshipped with greater reverence: peraduenture not for the greater vertue and profit it giveth: but because it is gien of the worshipers men, & is made in the worshiper part of the body, that is, in the forehead: or because it bringeth a greater encrease of vertues, although baptism availe more to forgivenesse. But in the first reason do they not betray themselves to be Donatists, which measure the force of the Sacrament by the worthines of the minister?
But I will admitt, that Confirmation bee called the worshiper by reason of the worthinesse of the Bishops hand. But if a man aske of them, from whence so great prerogative hath beene gien to Bishoppes, what reason will they bring beside their owne luft? The Apostles alone vfed that power, which a-one distributed the holy Ghoft. Are the bishoppes alone Apostles? Yea are they Apostles at all? But let vs also grant them that: why do they not by the same argument affirme, that bishoppes alone ought to touch the Sacrament of the bloud in the Supper of the Lord: which they therefore deny to lay men, because the Lord gaued to the Apostles alone? If to the Apostles alone, why do they not conclude thenceft to the bishoppes alone? But in that place they make the Apostles simple priests: but nowy giddines of their head ca-richieth them another way, suddenly to create them bishoppes. Finally Ananias was no Apostle, to whom yet Paul was sent, that he should receive his sight, be baptised, and be filled with the holy Ghoft. I wil adde this also to the heapes:
If by the law of God this was the proper office of bishoppes, why haue they bin:
sol to giue it away to common priests? as we read in a certaine epistle of Gregorie.

11 As for their other reason, how tripping, sone, and foolish is it, to call their confirmation worthieier than the baptisme of God, because in the forehead is annointed with oyle, and in baptisme the hinder part of the head, as though baptisme were done with the oyle and not with the water? I call al the godlyly to witnesse, whether these slofes do not endeavour themselves to this oneely ende, to corrupt the purenesse of the Sacramentes with their leasen.
I have already spoken this in an other place, that in the Sacraments, which is of God, scarcely glimmereth through at holes, among the rout of the inventions of men. If any man did not beleue me therein, lette him nowe

at leaft beleue his owne masters. Loe passing ouer the water, and making no accompte of it, they highly esteeme the onely oyle in baptisme. Wee therefore on the contrary side doe say, that in baptisme the forehead also is dipped in water. In comparison of this, wee esteeme not your oyle worth one peecce of dong, whether it be in baptisme or in confirmation. If any allegiance that it is solde for more: by this adding of price, the goodnes (if any were in it) is corrupted: so much lesse may they commend a most filthie deceit by theft. In the third reason they bewray their owne vngodlines, while they prate that in confirmation is gien a greater increase of vertues than in baptisme. By the laying on of handes the Apostles distributed the visible graces of the Spiritre. In what thing doe these mens fat liquor shewe it selfe fruitefull? But away with these qualifiers, that couer one saulted with manie sacrileges. It is like the Gordian: which it is better to breake in sunder, than to labour so much in vndoing it.

12 But nowe when they see themselves destitute of the worde of God & probable reason, they pretend as they are wont, that it is a moft auncient observation and stablished by consent of many ages. Although we were true, yet they winne nothing thereby. A Sacrament is not from the earth, but from heavre: not from men, but from God alone. They must proove God to be the author of their confirmation if they will haue it taken for a Sacrament. But why do they obstruct antiquitie, whereas the old writers, when they mind to speake properly, doe no where reckon more sacramentes than two? If a foretasse of our faith were to be fought from men, we haue an invincible tower, that the old fathers never acknowledged those for sacramentes which these men do lyeingly faine to the sacramentes. The old writers speake of the laying on of handes: but do they call it a sacrament? Augustine plainlye affirmed that it is no other thing than prayer. Neither let them here barke against me with their flinking distinctions, that Augustine meant that not of the laying on of handes vsed to confirmation, but which was vsed to healing or reconciliation. The booke remaineth and is abroad in the hands of men. If I wrast it to any other senfe than Augustine himselfe wrote it, I give them leave after their ordinarie manner to oppresse me not onely with railing but also with spitting at me. For he speake of them that returned from Schisme to the unitie of the Church. He denieth that they needed to be newly baptifed: for he faith, that the laying on of handes sufficeth, that by the bonde of peace the Lord may giue them the holy Ghost. But for almuch as it might seeme an abfurdtie, that the laying on of handes should be done of new rather than baptisme: he sheweth a difference. For (faith he) what other thing is the laying on of hands, than prayer vpon a man? And this is his meaning appeareth by an other place, where he faith: Hand is laid vpon heretikes as mended, for the coupling of Charitie, which is the greatest gift of the Holy ghost, without which whatsoever holy things are in man they availe not to salvation.

13 But I would to God we did keepe still the manner which I haue faide to haue bin in the old time, before that this vntimely delitered image of a sacrament was borne: not that it should be such a confirmation as they faine, which cannot once be named without injury to baptisme: but a catechising,
Cap. 19. Of the outward means whereby children or they that were neere to the age of discretion did declare an account of their faith before the Church. But it shoulde be the best manner of Catechising, if a forme were written to that use, containing and familiarly setting out a summe in a manner of all the articles of our religion, in which y whole Church of the faithful ought without controversie to agree: that a childe being ten yeres old should offer himselfe to the Church to declare a confession of his faith, shoulde be examined of every article, and anfwere to every one: if he were ignorant of any thing, or did not understand it, he might be taught. So shoulde he, before the Church witnesing and beholding it, professe the onely, true, and pure faith, wherewith the people of the faithful doth with one mind worship the one God. If this discipline were at this day in force, truly the slothfulness of some parents woulde bee whetted, who doe carelessly negle{t the instruction of their children as a thing nothing belonging to them, which then without open shame they could not omit: there should be among Christian people a greater content of faith, & not so great ignorance and rudeness of many: some should not be so rashly caried away with new and strange doctrines: finally al should haue as it were a certaine order in the instruction of Christian learning.

Of Penance,

14 In the next place they set Penance, of which they intreate so confusedly & disorderedly, that confessions cannot beare away no fure or sound thing of their doctrine. We have already in an other place declared at large, what we have learned out of the scriptures concerning repentance, & then what they also teache of it. Nowe we have this onely to touch, what reason they had rais’d vp the opinion, which hath heretofore raigned in Churches and schooles, that it is a sacrament. But first I will briefly say somewhat of the vnage of the old Church, the pretence whereof they have abused to stablish their fained invention. This order they kepe in publike penance, they which had fully done the satisfactions enjoynd them, were reconciled with solemnne laying on of handes. That was the signe of absolution, whereby both the sinner himselfe was rais’d vp before God with truft of pardon, & the Church was admonished gentely to receive him into fauor, putting away the remembrance of his offence. This Cyprian oftentimes calleth, to give peace. That this doing might bee of great dignitie, and haue more commedication among the people, it was ordyned that the Bishops authoritie shold alway bee vsed for ye meane herein. From hence came ye decree of the second council at Carthage: Be it not lawful to a priest at the Maſf publickely to reconcile a penitent. And another decree of the council at Araufi, Let those, which in time of their penance depart out of this life, be admitted to the Communion without the laying on of hands vſed in the reconciling: if they recover of their sickenesse let them stand in the degree of penitentes, and when the time is fully expired, let them receive of the bishop the laying on of hands vſed in reconciling. Againe the decree of the third council at Carthage: Let not the priest without the authoritie of the bishop reconcile a penitent. Al these tended to this end, y the severitie which they would haue to bee vſed in ye behalfe, should not with too much lenitie grow to decay. Therefore fore they willed the bishop to be judge of it, which was likely he would bee more circumpect in the examination thereof. Howbeit Cyprian in a certain place sheweth, that not only the bishop, but also the whole clergie laid their hands on him. For thus he faith, At the full time they do penance, then they come to the Communion, & by the laying on of hands of the bishop & the clergie, they receive power to partake of the communion. Afterward by process of time it came to this point, that beside publike penance they vsed this ceremonial also in private absolutions. Hereupon came that distinction in Gratian betweene publike and private reconciliation. I judge that same old visage of which Cyprian maketh mention, to haue bin holy and healthfull for the Church, and I would that it were at this day restored. As for this latter, although I dare not disallowe it, or at least speake more sharply against it, yet I thinke it to be leffe necessarie. Howsoever it be, yet we see that the laying on of hands in penance is a ceremonial ordained of me, not of God, which is to bee set among meaner things & outward exercises: & those verily which are not to be despised, but which ought to be in a lower degree, than those which are commended vnto vs, by the worde of the Lord.

15 But the Romanists and the schoolemen, (which have an ordinary custome to corrupt all things with wrong expounding them) doe here verie carefully trauell in finding out a sacrament. Neither ought it to seeme any maruell, for they secke a knot in a ruftie. But where they haue it best, they leave a thing entangled in fulfume, vncertaine, and confounded and troubled with diversitie of opinions. They say therefor either that the outward penance is a sacrament, and if it bee so, that it ought to bee taken for a signe of the inward penance, that is, of the contrition of hearte, which shall be the thing of the Sacrament: or that they both together are a Sacrament, not two Sacramentes, but one ful one. But, that the outward penance is onely the Sacrament: the inward is both the thing and the Sacrament: & that the forgiuensesse of sinnes is the thing and not the Sacrament. Let them which keepe in remembrance the definition of a Sacrament which we have above set, examine thereby that which these men call a Sacrament, & they shall finde that it is not an outward cereimonie ordeined of the Lorde for the confirming of our faith. If they cauill that my definition is not a lawe which they neede to obey: let them heare Augustine, whom they faigne that they esteeme as most holy. Visible Sacramentes (faith hee) were ordeined for carnall mens fakes, that by degrees of sacramentes they may be conuerted from those things that are seene with eyes to those things that are understood. What like thing doe either they themselves see, or can they shewe to other in that which they call the sacrament of Penance? The fame Augustine saith in another place: It is therefore calle a Sacrament, because in it one thing is seene, and an other thing is understood. That which is seene hath a bodily forme: that which is understood, hath a spirituall fruite. Neither do these things in any wise agree with the Sacrament of penance, such as they faigne it, where there is no bodily forme that may represent a spirituall fruite.

16 And soe kill these bees after upon their owne fighting place, if there be any sacrament here to be fought, may it not be much more colourably faied the the absolution of the priest is a sacrament, than penance either inwarde or outwarde: For it might redely be said, that it is a ceremonie to assure our faith of the forgiuenesse of sinnes, and hath a promise of the keyes as they call it, Who soever ye shall binte or loose uppon earth, shal be bound or loosed in heauen. But some man would have objected, that the most part of them are absolved of the Priestes, obtene no such thing by such absolution: where as by their doctrine the Sacramentes of the newe law ought to worke indeed which they figure. This were but to be laughed at. For, as in the supper, they make a double eating, a sacramental eating which is eequally common to good and to cuill, and a spirituall eating which is onely proper to the good: why might they not also faine absolution is receiued two waies: Yet could I not hitherto understande what they meant with this their doctrine, which we have already taught how farre it disagreeeth from the truth of God, where we purposely intreated of that argument. Here my mind is onely to shewe; that this doubt withstandeth nor, but that they may call the absolution of a priest a Sacrament. For they might aunswere by the mouth of Augustine, sanctification is without the visible Sacraments, & the visible sacrament with out inwarde sanctification. Againe, that the sacramentes doe worke in the onely elect that which they figure. Againe, that some doe put on Christ so far to the partaking of the Sacrament, otherforme to sanctification: the one, the good and cuill egally doe: this other, the good onely. Truely they have more than childishly erred and beene blinded in the cleare sinne, which travelling with great hardnesse, yet espied not a thing so plaine and open to euery man.

17 Yet least they shoulde waxe too proude, in what part soever they set the sacrament, I denie that it ought rightfullie to be taken for a Sacrament. First, because there is no speciall promise to it, which is the onely substance of a Sacrament. Againe, because whatsoever ceremonie is here shewed forth, it is the meere intention of men: whereas we haue already proued, the ceremonies of Sacraments cannot be ordained but of God. Therefore it was a lie and deceit which they haue inuedent of the Sacrament of penance. This fained sacrament they haue garnished with a meete commendation, calling it a second boord after shipwrecker: because if a man haue by sinning marred his garment of innocence which he receiued in baptisme, he may by penance reparie it. But it is saying of Hierome. Whose fouer it be, it cannot be excused but it is vertely wicked if it bee expounded after their meaning. As though baptism be blotted out by sinne, and is not rather to be called to remembrance of every sinner, so oft as he thinketh of the forgiuenesse of sinne, that he may thereby gather vp himselfe, and recouer courage, and strenthen his faith, that he shall obtaine the forgiuenesse of sinnes which is promiseth him in baptisme. But that which Hierome hath spoken hardly and vnproperly, that by penance baptism is repaired (from which they fall away that deserue to be excommunicate from the Church) these good expostitours draw to their wickednesse. Therefore you shall mote fitly speake, if you call baptism the sacrament of penance, sith it is given for a confirmation of grace, and scale of confidence, to them that purpose repentance. And least you should thinke this to bee our deuise, beside this it agreeeth with the
The words of the Scripture, it appeareth that it was in the old Church commonly spoken like a most certain principle. For in the booke of Faith to Peter, which is said to be Augustines, it is called the Sacrament of Faith and of penance. And why flee we to uncertain sayings? As though we could require any thing more plain, than that which the Evangelist reciteth: that John preached the baptismfof repentance unto forgiveness of sins?

Of extreme unction as they call it.

18 The third named Sacrament is extreme unction, which is not done but of the priest, and in extremes, (so they term it) & with oyle consecrate of the bishop, and with this form: By this holy anointing, & by his most kind mercy, God pardon thee whatsoever thou hast offended by seeing, by hearing, by smelling, feeling, tasting. They faine, that there be two: virtues of it, the forgiveness of sins, & ease of bodily sickness if it be so expedient; if not, the salvation of the soul. They say that the institution of it is set of James, whose wordes are these: Is any sick among you? Let him bring in the Elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oyle in the name of the Lord; & the prayer of Faith shall take the sick man, and the Lord shall raise him vp: and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him. Of the same sort is this anointing, of which wee haue aboue shewed that the other laying on of handes is, namely a playrlike hypocrisy, whereby without reason & without fruit, they would resemble the Apostles. Marke reheareth that the Apostles at their first sending, according to the commandement which they haue received of the Lord, raised vp dead men, cast out deuils, cleansed leprous men, healed the sick, and in healing of the sick, they vc. d. oyle. They anointed (faith he) many sick men with oyle, and they were healed. Hereunto James had respect, when hee commanded the Elders to be called together to anoint the sick man. That under such ceremonies is contained no hier mystery, they shall easilie judge which marke how great liberty the Lord and his Apostles vsed in these outward things. The Lord going about to restore fight to the blinde man, made cley of dust & spittle, some he healed with touching, other some with his word. After the same manner the Apostles healed some diseases with word only, some with touching, other some with anointing. But it is likly that this anointing was not (as all other things also were not) causelie put in vce. I grant yet not that it should be a mean of healing, but only a signe, that the dulnes of the vskillfull might bee put in minde from whence so great power proceeded, to this ende that they should not give the praise thereof to the Apostles. And, that the holy Ghost and his gifts are signifieth by oyle it is a comon and vfit thing. But that same grace of healinges is vanished away, like as also the other miracles, which the Lord willed to be shewed for a time, whereby he might make the newe preaching of the Gospell marvelous for ever. Therefore though wee grant rather so much, that anointing was a Sacrament of those powers which were then ministred by the handes of the Apostles, it nowe nothing pertaineth to vs to whom the ministiration of such powers is not committed.

29 And by what greater reason do they make a Sacrament of this anointing? ing, than of all other signes that are rehearsed to vs in the Scripture? Why do they not appoint some Syloah to swim in, whereinto at certaine ordinarie recourses of times sicke men may plunge themselves? That (say they) hold be done in vaine. Truely no more in vaine than anointing. Why do they not he along upon dead men, because Paul rais'd vp a dead child with lying upon him? Why is not clay made of sipttle & dust, a Sacrament? But the other were but singular examples: but this is gien of James for a commandment. Verily James spake for the same time, when the Church yet stil enjoyed such blessing of God. They assume in deed that there is yet still the same force in their anointing: but we finde it otherwise by experience. Let no man now maruell how they haue with such boldnesse mocked soules, which they knowe to be senflesse and blinde when they are spoyled of the word of God, that is, of their life and light: for they are nothing ashamed to goe about to mocke the liuing and feeling senses of the body. Therefore they make themselves worthy to be scorned, while they boast that they are endowed with the grace of healings. The Lord verily is present with his in all ages, & so oft as ncede is he helpeth their sicknesse no lesse than in old time: but he doth not so ytter those manifest powers, nor distributeth miracles by the hands of the Apostles: because this gift both was but for a time, and also is partly fallen away by the vnthankfulness of men.

20 Therefore as not without cause the Apostles haue by the signe of oyle openly testified, that the grace of healings committed to them was not their owne power, but the power of the holy Ghost: so on the other side they are wrongdoers to the holy Ghost, which make a flaming oyle and of no force, to be his power. This is altogether like as if one would say that all oil is the power of the holy Ghost, because it is called by that name in Scripture: that every due is the holy Ghost, because he appeared in that forme.
But these thinges, let them looke to. So much as for this present is enough for vs, we doe most certainly perceive that their anointing is no Sacrament: which is neither a Cерemonie ordain'd of God, nor hath any promise. For when we require these two things in a Sacrament, that it be a ceremonic or-dain'd of God, & that it haue a promise of God: we do therewithall require that the same Ceremonie be giv'n to vs, and that the promise belong vnfo to vs. For no man doth affirme that Circumcision is nowe a Sacrament of the Christian Church, although it both was an ordain'd of God, and had a promise knitte vnfo it: because it was neither command't to vs, nor the promise which was adjoin'd to it was giv'n to vs with the same condition.
That the promise which they proudly boast of in their anointing, is not giv'n to vs, we haue euidently shew'd, and they themselves declare by experience, The Ceremonie ought not to haue beene vs'd, but of them that were endued with the grace of healings, not of these butchers that can more skill of slaying and murthering than of healing.

21 Howebeit although they obtaine this, that that which James com-mandedth concerning anointing, agreeeth with this age (which they are most farre from) yet euen so they shall not haue much preval'd in proving of their vction where with they haue hitherto anointad vs. James will eth that all sicke men bee anointed: these men infect with their fahte liquor, not sicke men, but corporis halfe dead, when the life lieth already laboring at the toppe of their lippes, or (as they themselves terme it) in extremes. If they haue in their Sacrament a present medicine, whereby they may either eafe the sharpest esse of diseases, or at least may bring some comfort to the soule, they are too cruel that doe neuer healre in time. James willeth that the sicke man be annointed of the Elders of the Church; these men allowe no annointer but the petic Sacrificing Priest. Whereas they expound in James preby teros the Elders to bee Priests, and fondly say that the plural number is there set for comelineffe sake; that is but trifling: as though the Churches at that time abounded with swarmes of sacrificing Priests, they might go in a long pompos shew to carry a pageante of holy oile. When James simply bideth y sicke men be annointed, I under stande by it none other annointing but of common oyle: none other is founde in Markes rehearse: These men vouchsafe to haue none other oyle, but which is hal lowed of the Bishop, that is to say, warmed with much breathing on it, en chaunted with much mumbling, and with the knee bowed nine times saluted in this maner: thrice Haile holy oile: thrice Haile holy chrisme: thrice Haile holy balm. Out of whom haue they sucked such coniurations? James saith that when the sicke man is annointed with oile, and prayer hath beene pronounced over him, if he be sinnes they shall be forgiven him: namely, that the guiltinesse being taken away, they mayobtaine releafe of the paine not meaning that sinnes are put away with fat liquor, but that the prayers of the faithful whereby the afflicted brother is commended to God, shall not be vain. These men do wickedly ly, that by their holy, that is to say, abominable anointing, sinnes are forgiven. lo howe daily they shall presaire, when they haue bin at large suffred to abuse the testimonie of James at their pleasure. And least we should neede to travaile long in proofof hereof, their owne chronicles do discharge vs of this hardnes, For they report that Pope Innocentius which in Augustines time governed the Church of Rome, ordained that not onely Priests, but also all Christians should use oyle to annoint for their necessitie and others. Author hereof, is Sigebert in his Chronicles.

22. The fourth place in their regis ter hath the, Sacrament of Order: but the same is fruitfull, that it breaddeth out of it false seauen little sacramets. But this is very worthie to be laughed at, that whereas they affirme y there be seauen Sacramentes, when they goe about to rehearse them, they re ken vp thrteene ne. Neither can they allege for them selves, that they are but one Sacrament, because they tende all to one Priesthood: and are as it were certaine degrees vnto it: For sith it is evident that in every one of them are several Ceremonies, and they themselves say that there be divers grace no man can doubt but that they ought to be called seuen sacraments if their opinions be receied. And why strue we about it, as though it were a thing doubtfull, for as much as they themselves do plainly and severally declare seuen? But lest we will briefly knit vp by the way, how many & howe

Of the outward meanes
to vs their Orders insteade of Sacraments: and then we will see whether the the Ceremonie which Churches vs in ordering of ministers, ought to bee called a Sacrament at all. They make therefore seuen ecclesiastical orders or degrees, which they garnish with the name of a Sacrament. Those bee, Dorekeepers, Readers, Exorcistes, Acoluthes or followers, Subdeacons, Deacons, Priestes. And vii. they say that they bee, for the seuenfoolde grace of the Holy Ghost, wherewith they ought to be induced that are promoted vs to them. But it is increased and more largely heaped to them in their promotion. Nowe the number is else is hallowed with a wrongfull expounding of scripture, when they thinke that they have red in Esay viii. vertues of the holy Ghost, whereas both in deede Esay there rehearseth but sixe, and also the Prophete meant not to comprehende them all in that place: for hee is else where as well called the spirite of life, of sanctification, of adoption of the children, as he is in that place called the Spirite of wisedome, of understanding, of counsel, of strength, of knowledge, and of the feare of the Lorde.

Howbeit some sutteler men make not seuen orders, but nine, after the like¬ness (as they say) of the Church triumphing. But among them also there is strife: because some would have the shauing of the cleargie to bee the first order of all, and Bishopricke the last: other some excluding shauing altogether, reken Achebishopricke among the orders. Ifdore otherwise diu¬deth them. For he maketh Psalmists and Readers to be diversifie he appointeth the Psalmists for song, & the Readers to the reading of the Scriptures, wherewith the people may be instructed. And this distinction is kept by the Canons. In so great diversitie what will they have vs to follow or vee? Shall we say that there be seuen orders? So teacheth the master of the schoole: but the most illustimate doctors doe otherwise determine. Againie they also disagree among themselves. Moreover the most sacred Canons call vs an other way. Thus forsooth doe men agree, when they dispute of godly matters without the word of God.

23 But this exceedeth all follicie, that in suerie one of these they make Christ fellowe with them. First (say they) hee executed the office of dorekeeper, when hee did with a whip made of cordes, drive the buiers and sellers out of the temple. Hee signifieth himselfe to bee a dorekeeper, when hee faith, I am the dore. Hee took vppon him the office of Reader, when hee red Esay in the Synagogue. Hee did the office of an Exorcist, when touching the tongue and eares of the deafe and dummie man, hee restored to him his hearing. Hee testified himselfe to bee an Acoluth or follower in these wordes. Hee that followeth mee, walketh not in darkenesse. Hee executed the office of Subdeacon, when being girded with a linen cloth hee washed the disciples feete. Hee did beare the person of a Deacon, when hee distributed his bodye and bloud in the stopper. Hee fulfilled the office of Priest, when hee offered himselfe vppon the croffe a sacrifice to his Father. These things cannot bee hearde without laughing, that I marvel that they were written without laughing, if yet they were men that wrote them. But most notable is their sutteler where with they play the Philosophers about the name of Acoluth, calling him a Cerferat, a taper beare with a worde (as I thinke) of Narcisse, cruelie such a one as was never hearde of in all nations. nations and languages, whereas Acoluthos in Grecie simply signifies a follower. Howbeit if I should earnestly tarry in confuting these menne, I should my selfe also worthily be laughed at, they are so trifling & very mocckeries.

24 But that they may not be able yet still with false colours to deceuie euery very sillie women, their vanitie is by the way to be verteed. They create with great pompe and solemnity their Readers, Psalmsifts, Dorekeepers, Acoluthes, to execute those offices, whereunto they appoint very children, or those whom they call lay men. For who for the most part lighteth the candles, who pourreth wine and water into the cruets, but a child or some base fellowe of the laitie, that maketh his gaine thereof? Do not the same men sing, Doe they not shut and open the Church doers? For who euer fawe in their temples an Acoluth, or a Dorekeeper executing his office? But rather hee that when he was a boy did the office of an Acoluth, who he is once admitted into the order of Acoluthes, cafe that be is which he beginneth to be called, that they may seeme to will of purpose to cast of the office when they take vpon them the tule. Beholde why they haue neede to be consecrate by Sacramentes, and to receive the holy Ghost, namely, that they may do nothing. If they alleage for exercise, that this is the frowardnesse of times, that they forfake and negleect their ministeries; lette them therewithall confession that there is at this day in the Church no use nor fruit of their holy Orders, which they maruellously advance, and that their whole Church is full of curse: because it suffereth tapers and cruets to be handled of children and prophane men, which none are worthy to touch but they that are consecrate Acoluthes: and because it committeth the songes to children, which ought not to be heard but of a hallowed mouth. As for their Exorcists, to what end do they consecrate them? I here y the Iewes had their Exorcists: but I see that they were so called of the exorcistes or conjurations which they vsed. Of these counterfaite exorcistes who euer heard it spoken, that they shewed any example of their profession? It is sained that they have power giuen them to lay their handes vpon mad men, them that are to bee catechised, and men possesse with deviles: but they can not perswade the deuilles that they haue such power, because if deviles do not onely not yeeld to their commandementes, but also vs commanding authoritie ouer them. For a man can fearely finde euery tenthe of them, that is not ledde with an euill Spiriue. Therefore whatsoever things they babble concerning their pettie Orders, are patched together of foolish and vsauoric lies. Of the olde Acoluthes, and Dorekeepers, and Readers, we haue spoken in another place, when we declared the order of the Church. Our purpose here is only to fight against that newe founde intention of the seuenfold Sacrament in ecclesiasticall orders. Of which there is no where any thing red, but among these foolish praters the Sorboniftes and Canoniftes.

25 Now let vs confider of the ceremonies which they vs about it. First Cap. Dupl., whosoeuer they receive into their order of soldiers, they do with one common signe enter them into Clergie. For they shawe them in the crowne, that the crowne may betoken kingly dignity, because Clerkes ought to be kings, that they may rule themselves and other. For Peter speake the things of them, Ye SS are a chosen kinde, a kingly priesthood, a holy nation, a people of purchase. But it was faterlege to take to themselues alone that which is giuen to the whole Church, and proudely to glorie of the title which they had taken from the faithfull. Peter speaketh to the whole Church:these fellows wretst it to a few flauen me: as though it were fai to them alone, be ye holy: as though they alone were purchased by y blood of Christ: as though they alone were by Christ made a kingdom and priesthood to God. Then they affigne also other reasons: the top of their head is made bare, that their minde may bee declared to be free vnto the Lorde, which with open face may beholde the glorie of God. Or that they may be taught that the faults of their mouth & their eyes must be cut off. Or the shaying of their head is the putting away of temporall things, and the hayrie compass about the crowne are the re- nants of goods that are retaine for their sustenance. All in signes: because forsooth the veile of the temple is not yet cut in sunder. Therefore beeing perfuded that they haue gaylie discharged their duties, because they haue figured such things by their crowne, of the verie things in deede they per- fourme nothing at all. How long will they mocke vs with such falie colours and decietes? The clerge by the hearing of a fewe hayres doe signifie that they haue caft away the abondance of temporall goods, that they beholde the glorie of God, that they haue mortisied the lust of the eares and eyes: but there is no kind of men more raucung, more fensfey dull, more luftfuil. Why do they nor rather truely performe holinesse, than with falie & lying signes counterfeit a fewe of it?

26 Moreover when they say that the crowne of y Clergie hath the be- ginning and reason from the Nazarites: what other thing do they alleage than y their mysteries are sprong out of the Jewish ceremonies, or rather y they are meere Jewishnesse? But whereas they further say, y Prifeilla, Acila, & Paul himselfe, taking a vowe upon them did shewre their heads, that they might be purifed: they bewray their grossfey ignorance. For it is no where red of Prifeilla: & of Acila also it is doubtfull: for y fame shewing may as well be re- ferred to Paul as to Acila. But, that wee may not leaue to them that which they require, that they have an example of Paul: the simpler must note, that Paul did never shewre his head for any santification, but onely to serue the weakness of his brethren. I am wont to call such vowes the vowes of cha- ritie not of godliness: that is to say, not taken in hand for any service of god, but to beare with the rudeneis of the weake: as he himselfe faith, that he was made a leve to the Jewes, &c. Therefore he did this, & the fame but once, & for a short time; y he might for a time fashion himselfe to the Jewes. These me when they wil without any vfe counterfeit the purifings of the Nazarites, what do they effe but raise vp another Jewishnesse, when they wrongfully count to follow the old Jewishnesse? With the fame religiousnesse was that decretall Epiftle made, which, according to the Apostle, forbiddeth clerekes that they should not suffer their haire to growe, but shewre it rounde like a bowle. As though the Apostle, when he teacheth what is comely for allmen, were carefull for the round shewing of the Clergie. Hereby let the readers consider, of what force & worthinesse are those other mysteries that follow, into which there is such an entrie.
27 Whence the hearing of Clerkes tooke beginning, appeareth sufficiently even by Augustine alone. Whereas at that time none suffered their haire to growe, but nice men, & such as coueted a smothenesse & trimmesse not meete enough for men; it seemed to be a point of no good example, if they were permitted to the clergie. Therefore Clerkes were commanded either to sheare their head or to haue it, that they should not beare any fhewe of womanlike trimming. But this was so common, that certaine Monkes, that they might the more set out their holinesse with notable & severall attire from other men, did let their haire growe long. But after wande when the fashione turned to wearing of haire, and certaine nations were added to Christiandom which alway vfed to weeare long haire, as Fraunce, Germanie, & England: it is likely that clerkes did euer where sheare their heads, leaft they should seeme to couete the gainesse of haire. At the last in a corrupte age, when all olde ordinances were either perverted or gone ouf of kind into superstition, because they saw no cause in the hearing of the clergie (for they had reteined nothing but a foolish counterfating) they fled to a mysterie, which now they superstitionally thrust in vnto vs for the approching of their Sacrament. The dorekeepers at their consecration receive the keyes of the Church, whereby they may understand that the keeping of it is committet to them. The readers receive the holy Bible. The exorcifites receive the forms of exorcifimes, which they should vs euer ouer mad and them that are to be catechized. The Acoluthes receive their tapers & crouet. Lo these are ye ceremonies, wherein (if God will) there is so much secret power, they may be not onely signes & tokens, but also causes of invisible grace. For this they require by their definition, when they will haue them taken among the Sacramentes. But to make an end in few words, I say it is an absurdtie that in their choles and canons they make these lesser orders Sacraments: whereas eu en by their owne confession that teach this, they were vnknownen to the primitive Church, & deviset many yeres after. For Sacraments, fith they contain the promife of God, can nor be ordeined of Angels, nor of me, but of God a lone, whose office alone it is to give promife.

28 There remaine three orders, which they call the greater. Of the which, Subdeaconry (as they call it) was remoened into that number, since that the rout of the smaller ones beganne to growe. But because they seeme to haue a testimonie for these out of the worde of God, they doe peculiarily for honors fake, call them holy orders. But nowe it is to be seene, how crookedly they abuse the ordinances of God to their pretence. We will beginne at the order of Priesthoode or the sacrificers office. For by these two names they signifie one thing, and so they call them to whome they say that it pertayneth to offer vpoun the altar the sacrifice of the body and bloude of Chrifte, to pronounce prayers, and to blesse the giftes of God. Therefore at their consecration they receive the patine with the hostes, for tokens of power gien to them, to offer acceptable sacrifices to God. And their handes are annointed: by which signe they are taught, that they haue power gien them to confecrate. But of the Ceremonies we shall speak hereafter. Of the thing itself I say: it isoth no title of the worde of God which they pretende, that they coulde not more wickedly corrupt the order

For first verily this ought to stande for a thing confessed (which we have affirmed in entreaty of the Popish maffe) that they are all wrong doers to Christe, which call themselves sacrificing priests, or offer a sacrifice of appeasement. Hee was appointed and consecrate of the Father a priest with an oath, according to the order of Melchisedech, without any end, without any successour. He once offered a sacrifice of eternal satisfaction cleaning, and reconciliation: and now also being entred into the Sanctuary of heaven, he maketh intercession for vs. In him we are all sacrificing priests, but to praises and giuings of thankes, finally to offer vs and ours to God. It was his singular office alone, with his offering to appease God, and to purge sinnes. When these men take that upon them, what remaineth but that their sacrificing Priesthood is vngodly and full of sacrilege? Truly they are too wicked, when they dare garnish it with the name of a Sacrament. As touching the true office of Priesthood, which is commended to vs by the mouth of Christ, I willingly account it in that degree. For therein is a ceremonial, first taken out of the Scriptures, then such a one as Paul testifieth not to bee vaile nor superfluous, but a faithfull signe of spirituall grace. But whereas I have not set it for a thirde in the number of Sacramentes, I did it because it is not ordinarie and common among all the faithfull, but a speciall rite for one certaine office. But such this honour is given to the Christian ministrie, there is no cause therefore why the Popish sacrificers should be proude. For Christ commended distributors of his Gospell and mysteries to be ordained, not sacrificers to be consecrate. Hee gaued them commandement to preach the Gospell and to feede the flocke, not to offer sacrificers. He promised them the grace of the holy Ghost, nor to make satisfactorie purging of sinnes, but rightly to execute and to mainteine the gouernement of the Church.

29 The ceremonies agree very well with the thing it selfe. Our Lorde when he sent forth the Apostles to preach the Gospel, did blowe upon them. By which signe he represented the power of the holy Ghost which hee gaue unto them. This blowing these good men have receiued, and as though they did put forth the holy Ghost out at their throat, they whisper over their sily priests that they make, Receive the holy Ghost. So leaue they nothing which they do not overtharly counterfeit. I will not say like plaiers (which vse their gesturings neither without art nor without signification) but like apes, which counterfeit every thing wantonly & without any choyse. We keepe (say they) the example of the Lorde. But the Lorde did many thinges which he willed not to be examples to vs. The Lorde sayd to the disciples, Receive the holy Ghost, He sayd also to Lazarus, Lazarus come forth. He sayd to the man sicke of the palse, Rife and walke. Why do not they say the same to all dead men and sicke of the palse? He shewed a profe of his divine power, when in blowing vpon the Apostles hee filled the with the grace of the holy Ghost. If they goe about to doe the same thing, they enuously counterfeit God, and doe in a maner challenge him to trie with them: but they are farre from the effect, and do nothing with this foolish gesturing but mocke Christ. Verily they be so shamelesse, that they dare affirme that they give the holy Ghost. But how true that is, experience teacheth, which trieth... that so many as be consecrated priests are of horses made asses, of booles made mad men. Neither yet do I strive with them for that: only I condemn the ceremonial itselfe, which ought not to have beene drawn to be an example, forasmuch as it was used of Christ for a singular signe of one myracle: So farre is it off, that the excuse ought to defend them.

30 But of whom so received they the annoynting? They ansouwere that they received it of the sones of Aaron, from whom their order also tooke beginning. Therefore they had rather alway to defend them selues with wrongfull examples, than to confesse that themselues have deuised which they use without cause. But in the mean time they consider not, that while they professe themselves the successors of the sones of Aaron, they are wrong doers of the priefthood of Christ, which alone was shadowed and figured by all the olde sacrificing priefthoods. In him therefore they were all contained and fulfilled, in him they ceased, as we haue sometimes alreadie reposed, & the Epistle to the Hebrues without helpe of any glosses testifieth. But if they be so much delited with the ceremonies of Moses, why do they not hastily take oxen, calves, & lambs to make sacrifices? They haue in deede a good part of the olde tabernacle and of the whole Iewish manner of worshipping: but yet this wanteth in their religion, that they doe not sacrifice calves and oxen. Who cannot see, that this obseruation of annoynting is much more hurntfull than Circumcision, specially when there is adioyned superstition and Pharisaical opinion of the worthisse of the work? For the Iewes did set in Circumcision, trueth of righteousness: these men doe set in annoynting, spiritual graces. Therefore while they couet to bee counterfeiters of the Leuites, they are made Apostataes from Christ, and doe put themselves from the office of Paeftors.

31 This is (if God wil) the holy oyle that printeth the marke that can not be rased out. As though oyle could not be wiped away with dust & salt, or if it sticke faster, with water. But this marke is spiritual, What hath oyle to do with the soule? Have they forgotten that which they oft chaunte to vs out of Augustine, that if the worde be taken from the water, it shall be nothing but water, and that it hath this from the worde that it is a Sacrament? What word wil they shewe in their fat liquor? Will they shewe the commandement that was giuen to Moses, concerning the annoynting of the sones of Aaron? But there is also commandement giuen, of the coat, the ephod, the hat, the crowne of holiness, with which Aaron was to be garnished, and of the coats, girdles, and miters, wherewith the sones of Aaron were to bee clothed. There is commandement giuen to kill a cale, and burne the fat of him for incape, to cut rammes and burne them, to sanctifie their eares and garments with the blood of another ram, and innumerable other observations, which being past oner, I maruele why the onely annoynting of oyle pleaseth them, But if they loue to be sprinkled, why are they rather sprinkled with oyle than with blood? Forsooth they goe about a wittie thing, to make one religion of Christianitie, Iewishnesse, and Paganitie, as it were of patches sowed together. Therefore their annoynting stinketh which is without the salt, that is, the worde of God. There remaineth laying on of hands, hands, which as I grant in true and lawfull Orderings to bee a Sacrament, so I denye that it hath any part in this play, where they neither obey the commandement of Christ, nor haue respect to the end whereunto the promise ought to leade vs. If they will not haue the signe denied them, they must apply it to the thing it selfe, whereunto it is appointed.

32. About the order allese of Deaconrie, I woulde not struee with them, if that same minisiterie which was in the Apostles time & in the purer church, were restored to the uncorrupted state thereof. But what like thing haue they whome those men faine to be deacons? I speake not of the men ( least they should complaine that the doctrine is wrongfull weyed by the faultes of the men) but I affirme that for those whome they deliver vs by their doctrine, they unworthily fetche testimonie from the example of them whom the Apostolike Church ordained Deacons. They say that it pertaineth to their deacons to stand by the priestes, to minister in all things that are done in the Sacraments, namely in Baptisme, in the chresine, in the patine, in the chalice: to bring in the offerings and lay them vpon the altar, to make readie the Lordes table, and to cover it: to carry the cross, to pronounce and sing the Gospel and Epistle to the people. Is here any one worde of the true minisiterie of Deacons? Now let vs heare the instituting of them. Vpon y Deacon that is ordered, the Bishop alone layeth his hande. He layeth a prayer booke and a Stoale vpon his left shoulder, that he may understand that hee hath receuied the light yoke of the Lorde, whereby hee may subdue to the feare of God those things that pertaine to the left side. He giueth him the text of the Gospel, that he may perceiue himselfe to be a publisher of it. And what belong those things to Deacons? They do euens like as if a man woulde say that he ordained them Apostles whome hee appointed only to burne frankincense, to trimme the images, to sweepe the Churches, to catche mice, to drive away dogges. Who could suffre such kindes of men to be called Apostles, and to be compared with the vrie Apostles of Christ? Therefore let them not hereafter lyingly say that those be Deacons, whome they institute only for their enterlude like playes. Yes & by the very name it selfe they sufficiently declare what manner of office they haue. For they call them Leuiers, and will haue their order & beginning referred to y children of Le-ui, Which I giue them leave to do, so that they do not afterward garnish the with the fethers of other.

33. Of Subdeacons to what purpose is it to speake? For whereas in deed they were in old time appointed for care of the poore, they aßigne to them I wote not what trifling businesse, as to bring the chalice and the patine, the little cruete with water, and the towel to the altar, to powre water to wash the hands, &c. Now whereas they speake of receuine & bringing in of offerings, they meane those which they deuoure as abandoned to their holy vie. With this office vrie well agreeth the forme of their consecrating. That he receive of the bishop, the patine and the chalice : of the Archdeacon, the cruete with water, the manuale, and such other bagage. Within these trifles they require to haue vs confesse that the holy Ghost is enclosed. What godly man can abide to graunt this? But, to make once an ende, wee may determine the same of them y we do of the rest. Neitheer need we to be reser:
To Salvation. Lib. 4.

repete further these things that are above declared. This may be enough to teach the sober and willing to learne (whom I have taken in hand to instruct) that there is no Sacrament of God but where is shewed a Ceremonie joined with a promise: or rather verily but where is a promise shewn in a Ceremonie. Here is not founde one syllable of any certaine promise: therefore it were in vaine to seeke a Ceremonie to confirm the promise. Againe of those Cерemonies that they use, it is not red that any one is instituted of God. Therefore here can be no Sacrament.

Of Matrimonie.

34 The last is Matrimonie, which as all men confesse to be ordained of God, so no man vntill the time of Gregorie euer saue that it was giuen for a Sacrament. And what sober man would euer haue thought it? It is a good and a holy ordinance of God: so tillage, carpentrie, shoemakers craft, barbers craft, are lawfull ordinances of God, and yet they are no Sacramentes. For there is not onely this required in a Sacrament, that it bee the worke of God, but that it be an outwarde Ceremonie appointed of God to conforme a promise. That there is no such thing in Matrimonie, very children also can judge. But (say they) it is a signe of the holy thing; that is, of the spirituall conioyning of Christ with the Church. If by this word Signe, they understand a Toké before vs of God to this end to assurde vs of the assurednes of our faith, they are far beide from the truth, If they simply take a signe for which is brought to express a similitude, I will shew how wittily they reason. Paul sayth, As one star differeth from another starre in brightness, so shalbe the resurrection of the dead. Loe here is one Sacrament. Christ sayth, The kingdome of heaven is like a gaine of mustardseede. Loe here is another. Again, The kingdome of heaven is like vnto leauens. Loe here is the third. Esay sayth, Behold, the Lord shall feede his flocke as a shepheard. Loe here is the fourth. In an other place, The Lord shall goe forth as a Giant. Loe here is the fifth. Finally what end or measure shall there be? There is nothing but by this means it shalbe a Sacrament. How many parables and similitudes are in the Scripture, so many Sacramentes there shalbe. Yea & saith shalbe a Sacrament, because it is written, the day of the Lord is like a thiefe. Who can abide thee soplhisters prating so foolishly? I grant in dede that so oft as we see a vine, it is very good to call to remembrance that which Christ sayth, I am a vine, ye be branches, my Father is the vinedrester. So oft as a shepheard with his flocke commeth toward vs, it is good also that this come to our minde, I am a good shepheard, my sheepe heare my voice. But if any man add such similitudes to the number of Sacramentes, he is meete to be sent to Antycira.

35 But they still lay forth the wordes of Paul, in which he gueht to Matrimonie the name of a Sacrament: hee that loueth his wife, loue him selfe. No man euer hated his owne flethe, but nourished it and cherisheth it, even as Christ doth the Church: because we are members of his bodie, of his flethe and of his bones. For this a man shall leaue his Father and mother, and shall cleaue to his wife, and they shalbe two into one flesh. This is a great Sacrament: but I say in Christ and in the Church. But so to handle the Scriptures, is to mingle heauen and earth together. Paul sayth, to

The rebuke to married men, what singular love they ought to beare to their wives, setteth forth Christ to them for an example. For as he poured forth the bowels of his kindness vp to the Church which he had espoused to himselfe: to ought every man to be affectioned towards his owne wife. It followeth after, He that loueth his wife loueth himselfe: as Christ loved the Church. Nowe to teach howe Christse loued the Church as himselfe, yea howe hee made himselfe one with his spouse the Church, hee applieth to him those things which Moses reporteth that Adam spake of himselfe. For when Eve was brought into his sight, whom he knewe to have bene shapen out of his side: This woman (sayth hee) is a bone of my bones, and flese of my flese. Paul testifieth that all this was spiritually fulfilled in Christse and vs, when he sayeth that wee are members of his body. of his flese, and of his bones, yea and one flese with him. At length he addeth a concluding sentence, This is a great mysterie. And least any man should be deceived with the double signifying of the words, he expreith that he spake not of the fleshly conioyning of man and woman, but of the spiritual marriage of Christ and the Church. And truly it is in deed a great mysterie, that Christ suffered a ribbe to be taken from himselfe, whereof wee might be shapen: that is to say, whiche was strong, he willed to be weake, that we might be strengthened with his strength: that nowe wee may not our selues flie, but wee may live in vs.

36 The name of Sacrament deceived them. But was it rightful that the whole Church should suffer the punishment of their ignorance? Paul sayde Mysterie: which word when the translator might have left being not vnused with Latin cares, or might have translated it a Secret: he chose rather to put in the word Sacrament, yet in no other sense than Paul had in Greeke called it mysterie. Nowe let them go and with crying cut raile against the skill of tongues, by ignorance whereof they have so long most foully beene blinde in an easie matter, & such as oftenth it selfe to be perceived of every man. But why do they in this one place so earnestly sticke upon this little word Sacrament, and some other times doe passe it over vnregarded? For also in the first Epistle to Timothee the Translator hath vsed it, and in the selfe same Epistle to the Ephesians; in every place for Mysterie. But let this slipping be pardoned them: at least the fiers ought to have had a good remembrance. For, when they have once set out Matrimonie with title of a Sacramente, afterward to call it vncleannesse, defiling, and fleshly filthinesse, how giddy lightnesse is this? Howe great an abfurditie is it to debarre priestes from a Sacrament? If they denye that they debarre them from the Sacrament, but from the luft of copulation: they escape not so away from me. For they teach that the copulation it selfe is a part of the Sacrament, and that by it alone is figured the visiting that wee have with Christ in conformitie of nature: because man and woman are not made one, but by carnall copulation. Howbeit some of them haue here founde two Sacramentes: the one of God and the soule, in the betrothed man & woman: the other of Christ and the Church, in the husband and the wife. Howsoever it be, yet copulation is a Sacrament, from which it was vnlawfull that any Christian should be debarred: Vnlesse peraduenture the Sacramentes of Christians doe so ill agree, that they cannot stand together. There is also an other absurdity in their doctrines. They affirm that in the Sacrament is given the grace of the holy Ghost: they teach that copulation is a Sacrament: and they deny that at copulation the holy Ghost is at any time present.

37 And because they would not simply mocke the Church, howe long a roaue of errors, lies, deceites, and wickednesse haue they knitte to one errour? so that a man may saye, that they did nothing but seek a denie of abominations, when they made of matrimony a Sacrament. For when they once obtaine this, they drew to themselves the hearing of cause of matrimony: for it was a spiritual matter, which prophan judges might not medle with. Then they made lawes, whereby they stablished their tyranny, but those partly manifstely wicked against God, and partly moft vniust toward men. As are these: That marries made betweene yong persons without consent of their parentes, should remaine of force and stablished. That the marries be not lawfull betweene the kinsfolkes to the feuenth decree: and if any such be made, that they be divorced. And the very degrees they faine against the lawes of all nations, and against the ciuile government of Moses. That it be not lawfull for a man that hath put away an adulteresse to marry an other. That spiritual kinsfolkes may not be coupled in marriage. That there be no marries celebrate, from Septuagesime to the vs of Easter, in three weakes before Midsummer, nor from Aduent to Twelfetide. And innumerable other like, which it were long to rehearse. At length wee must crepe out of their mire, where in our talke hath now tarried longer than I would. Yet I thinke I haue somewhat profited, that I haue partly plucked the lyons skynnes from these affes.

The xx. Chapter.

Of ciuill Government.

Nowe whereas we haue aboue fette two kindes of government in man, and where as we haue spoken enough of the one kinde which consisteth in the soule or in the inwarde man, and hath regarde to eternall life: this place requirith that we speake somewhat alfo of the other, which pertaineth onely to the ciuile and outwarde righteousnesse of manners. For the course of this matter semeth to be sequenced from the spiritual doctrine of faith, which I took in hande to entreate of: yet the proceeding shall shewe that I doe rightfully ioyne them together, yea that I am of necessitie compelled to doe it: specially fith on the one side, madde and barbarous men doe furiously go about to ouerthrowe this order stablished by GOD: and on the other side the flatterers of princes, aduancing their power without measure, stiche not to set it against the empire of God himselfe. Vnde both these mischieues be met with al, the purenesse of faith shalbe lost. Beside that it is not finally for our behoofe, to knowe howe louingly God hath in this behalfe provided for mankind, that there may flourish in vs a greater desire of godlinesse to witnes our thankesfulnesse. First, ere we enter into the thing it selfe, wee must holde fast that distinction which wee haue aboue et leaff (as it commonly happeneth to many) we unwisely mingle these two things together, which haue altogether diuerse consideration. For when they heare that libertie is promised by the Gospell, which acknowledgment among men no king and no magistrate, but hath regard to Christ alone: they thinke that they can take no fruitie of their libertie, so long as they see any power to haue preeminence over them. Therefore they thinke that no thing shall be safe, vnlesse the whole world be reformed into a newe fashion: where may neither be judgementes, nor lawes, nor magistrates, nor any fuch thing which they thinke to withstande their libertie. But who soever can put difference between the body and the soule, between this present and transtorie life, and that life to come and eternall: he shall not hardly vnderstand that the spiritual kingdom of Christ, and the ciuill government are things farre a sunder, Sith therefore that is a Jewish vانيte, to seeke and in close kingdom of Christ vnnder the elementes of this worlde: let vs rather thin king, as the scripture plainly teacheth, that it is a spiritual fruitie, which is gathered of the benefte of Christ, remeber to keep within the bonds there of this whole libertie which is promised and offered vs in him. For, what is the cause why the same Apostle which biddeth vs to stand, and not to be made subject to the yoke of bondage, in an other place forbiddeth bond servantes to be carefull of their state: but because spiritual libertie may verie wel agree with ciuill bondage? In which sense also these his sayinges are to be taken: In the kingdom of God there is no lewe, nor Grecian, no male, nor female, no bondman, nor freeman. Againe, There is noe lewe nor Grecian, Circumcision, Vncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, Bondman, Freeman: but Christ is all in all. Whereby hee signifieth, that it maketh no matter in what estate thou be among men, nor vnder the lawes of what nation thou liuest: forasmuch as in these things consisteth not the kingdom of Christ.

2 Yet doeth not this distinction tende hereunto, that we should thinke that the whole order of policie is an vnclene thing, nor pertaining at all to Christian men. So indeed do the prentike men, that are delighted with vnbridled licentiousnesse, erie out and boaste. For such we be dead by Christ to the elementes of the worlde, and being removed into the kingdom of God doe sit among the heavenly ones: they thinke that it is vnworthy for vs, and farre beneath our excellence, to bee occupied with these prophan and vnclene cares that are busied about affaires not pertaining to a Christian man. To what purpofe (say they) are lawes without judgementes and judgementes? But what hath a Christian man to do with judgementes themselves? Yea if it bee not lawfull to kill, wherefore sue lawes and judgementes among vs? But as we have euin nowe giuen warning, that this kinde of governement is feuerall from that spiritual and inward kingdom of Christ; so it is also to be knowne that they nothing disagree together. For the Ciuill governement doeth now beginne in vs vpon earth certaine beginnings of the heavenly kingdom, and in this mortall and vanishing life, doeth as it were enter vpon an immortall and incorruptible bleffednesse: but the intent of his spiritual governement is, so long as we hall liue among men, to cheere and maintaine the outward worshipping of God, to defende the sound doctrine of Godlinesse and the state of the Church, to frame our life to the fellowship of men, to fashion our manners to civil righteousness, to procure vs into friendship one with another, to nourish common peace and quietness; all which I grant to be superfluous, if the kingdom of God, such as it is now among vs, doe destroy this present life. But if the will of God be so, that we while we long toward the heavenly country, should bee wayfaring from home upon the earth: and sinth the vs of such wayfaring needeth such helps: they which take them from man, doe take from him his very nature of man. For whereas they alludge, that there is so great perfection in the Church of God, that her owne moderate government sufficeth it for a lawe: they themselves doe foolishly imagine that perfection which can never bee found in the common fellowship of men. For sinth of naughtie men the pride is so great, and the wickednesse so obstinate, as can not bee restrained with great sharpneses of lawes: what thinke wee that they will doe, if they see unpunished libertie ly open to their lewdnesse, which can not euern with force be sufficiently compelled not to do evil?

3 But of the order of policie, there shall bee an other fitter place to entreat. Nowe our meaning is to have this onely vnderstonded, that to think to drive it away, is outrageous barbarousnes, the vse whereof is no lesse among men, than of brende, water, the sunne, and aire, but the dignitie much more excellent. For it tendeth not onely hereunto (which is the only commoditie of all those things) that men may breath, eate, drinke and bee cheerfulled (although indeede it comprehendeth all these things, while it maketh that they, live together) yet I say, it tendeth not hereunto onely: but also that idolatrie, sacrileges against the name of God, blasphemies against his truthe, and other offences of religion may not rife vp and be scattered among the people, that common quiet be not troubled, that every man may kepe his owne peace and vnappeared, that men may vse their affaires together without hurt, that honestie and modestie be kept among them: finally that among Christians may be a common shewe of religion, and among men may bee manlike civilitie. Neither let any man bee moued, for that I doe nowe referre the care of stablishing of religion to the policie of men, which I feeme before to have set without the judgement of men. For I do no more here, than I did before, give men leaue after their owne will to make lawes concerning religion and the worshipping of God: when I allow the ordinarie of policie, which endeoureth hereunto, that the true religion which is contained in the lawe of GOD, be not openly and with publique sacrileges freely broken and defiled. But the readers being holpen by the verie plainenesse of order, shall better understannde what is to bee thought of the whole kinde of ciuill governement, if we seuerallie entreat of the partes thereof. There be three partes of it: the magistrate, which is the governour and keeper of the lawes, the lawes according to which hee governeth: the people, which are governed by the lawes, and obey the magistrate. Therefore let vs first consider of the office of the Magistrate, whether it bee a lawfull vocation and allowed of God, what maner of office hee hath, and howe great is his power: then in what lawes a Christian ciuill state is to be ordered: then last of all, what profitte of the lawes commeth to the people, what reuence is due to the magistrate.

Of the outwärde meane.

4. The Lord hath not onely testified that the office of magistrates is allowed and acceptable to him; but also setting out the dignities thereof with most honourable titles, he hath marvellously commended it unto us. That I may rehearse a fewe of them. Whereas who so euer be in place of magistrates are named Gods, let no man thinke that in that naming is small importance. For therby is signified that they have commandement from God, that they are furnished with the authoritie of God, and doe altogether bear the person of God, whose free, they do after a certaine manner supplie. This is not my cauillation, but the exposition of Christ. If the scripture (last hee) called them Gods to whom the word of God was giuen: What is this else, but that God hath committed his businesse to them, that they shoulde serve in his office, and (as Moses and Josaphat saide to their judges whom they appointed inuerie seuerall citie of Juda) that they shoulde sit in judgement, not for man but for God? To the same purpose makest thou that the wisedome of God affirmeth by the mouth of Salomon, that it is his worke, that Kings reigne, and counsellors decree righteous things, that princes bear princely, and all the judges of the earth execute judgement. For this is al one in effect as if it had beene saide, that it commeth not to passe by the peruerse, notwithstanding, that the government of all things in earth is in the hand of kings and other rulers, but by the prouidence \* holy ordinance of God, to whom it so seemed good to order the matters of men: forasmuch as he is both present \* president among them in making of laws and in executing uprighnes of judgements. Which Paul also plainly teacheth, when he reckoneth governments among the gifts of God, which being diversely distributed according to the diercstie of grace, ought to be employed of the servants of Christ to the edification of the Church. For although he there properly speaketh of a councell of grave men, which in the Primitive Church were appointed they shoulde have the rule of ordering the publike discipline (which office in the Epistle to the Corinthians he calleth Government) yet forasmuch as we see that the ende of civil power commeth to the same point, it is no doubt but that he commendeth vs all kinde of civil government. But he speaketh more plainly, where he purposely makest the full discourse of that matter. For hee both sheweth that Power is the ordinance of God, and that there are no powers, but they are ordained of God; \* that the princes themselves are the ministers of God, to the well doers vnto praise: to the cruel,urers vnto wrath. Hereunto may be added also the examples of holy men: of which some haue possess'd kingdomes, as Dauid, Josias, Ezechias: other some, Lordships, as Joseph and Daniell: others some, Civil governementes in a free people, as Moses, Josite, and the judges: whose offices the Lord hath declared that he alloweth. Wherefore none ought nowe to doubt, that the ciuill power is a vocation not onely holy and lawful before God, but also the most holy, and the most honest of all other in the whole life of men.

5. They which couet to bring in a state without Rulers, take exception and say that although in olde time there were kings and judges over rude people, yet at this day that servile kind of gouerning agreeth not with perfection which Christ hath brought with his Gospel. Wherein they bewray not not only their ignorance, but also their deuilsih pride, while they take up upon themselues perfection, of which not so much as the hundredth part is scene in them. But what maner of men soever they be, it is easie to confute ity, because where Davi doth exhorteth all kings and Rulers to kisse the fonne of God, he doth not bid them, giuing over their authoritie, to take themselfes as a private life, but to submit the power that they bear to Christ, that hee alone may haue preeminenence above all. Likewise Efay, when he promiseth that kings shall bee fathers of the Church, and Queenes shall bee noursves, he doth not depose them from their honour: but rather doth by an honourable title make them defender to the godlie worshippers of God. For, that prophecie pertaineth to the comming of Christ. I do wittingly passe ouer many testimonies which do eche where offer themselfes, and specially in the Psalmes wherin all governours haue their right maintained. But most clearly of all is the place of Paul, where admonishing Timothiee that in the common assemblie prayers must bee made for kings, he by and by addeth a reason, That we may vnder them lead a quiet life with all godlynesse and honestie: in which words he committeth the state of the Church to their defence and saueguarding.

6 Which consideration ought continually to busie the magistrats their selfes, forasmuch as it may put a great spurre to them whereby they may be pricked forward to their dutie, and bring them a singular comfort whereby they may mitigate the hardnesse of their office, which truely are both many and great. For with howe great an endeouer of vprightnesse, wisdome, mildnes, continence, & innocencie, ought they to charge themselfes, which know themselves to be appointed ministers of the righteousnes of God? By what affiance shall they admit vniustice to their judgement seat, which they heare to bee the throne of the living God? By what boldnes shall they pronounce a wrongfull sentence with that mouth, which they understand to be appointed an instrument for the truth of God? With what conscience shall they subscribe to wicked decrees with the hands which they knowe to bee ordineed to write the acts of God? In a summe, if they remember that they be the vice gerences of God, they must watch with all care, earnestnes, & diligence, that they may represent in themselfes unto men a certaine image of the prouidence, preservation, goodnes, good will, and rightoufnes of God. And they must continually set this before their eyes, that if all they bee accursed, y do execute in deceite the worke of the vengeance of God, they are much more grievously accursed, that vse themselfes deceitfully in a rightfull vocation. Therefore when Moses and Iofaphat minded to exhort their judges to their dutie, they had nothing more effectuall to move their intendes with-all, than that which we haue before rehearsed, Looke what ye do. For yee sit in judgement not for man but for God: namely he which is nere to you in the cause of judgement. Now therefore let the feare of the Lorde bee vpon you.
Looke & be diligent: because there is no perswades with the Lord our God.
And in an other place it is said, the God stood in the assembly of the Gods & set a judge in the midst of the gods, y they may bee encouraged to their dutie when they haere that they bee the deputies of God, to whom they must one day yeilde accomplt of the government of their charge. And war-thily
Of the outward means
eaily this admonition ought to be of great force with them. For if they make any default, they are not only wrong doers to men whom they wickedly vex, but also slanderers to God himself, whose holy judgementes they defile. Againe they have also whereupon they may singularly comfort themselves, when they consider with these clesues that they are not busied in prophane affaires and such as are not fit for the servant of God, but in a most holy office, namely forasmuch as they are the deputies of God.

7. As for them that are not moved with so many testimonies of Scripture from being bolde to raile at this holy ministrie, as a thing disagreeing with Christian religion and godlinesse: what doe they else but raile at GOD himselfe, the dishonour of whom can not but be ionyed with the reproche of his minister? And verily they doe not refuse the magistrates, but do caft away God, that he should not reigne ouer them. For if the Lorde sayde this truely of the people of Israel, because they had refused the government of Samuel: why shall it be lesse truely fayde at this day of them that give themselves leave to rage against all governmentes ordained of God? But sith the Lorde sayde to the disciples, that the kings of nations beare rule ouer them, but that among them it is not so, where he that is the fift must be made the least: by this faying it is forbidden to all Christians that they should not take kingdomes or governmentes upon them. O handfome expostoors! There rose a strife among the disciples, which of them excelled other: the Lorde, to suppress this vaine ambition, taught them that their ministrie is not like unto kingdomes, in which one man hath preeminence above the rest. I befeech you, what doeth this comparison make to the dishonour of kingly dignitie? yea what doeth it prooue at all, but that the ministrie of an Apostle is not the office of a king? Moreover although among the magistrates themselves there be divers forms, yet there is no difference in this behalfe but that wee ought to take them all for the ordinances of God. For Paul also doeth comprehend them altogether, when hee fayeth that there is no power but of God: and that which best liked him of all, is commended with notable testimonie aboue the other, namely the power of one: which because it bringeth with it a common bondage of all, (except that one man, to whose will it maketh all things subject) in olde time could lesse be allowed of noble and the excellent fort of natures. But the Scripture, to meet with their vnjust judgementes, expressly by name affirmeth, that it is the providence of Gods wisdome that kinges do reigne, and peculiarly commandeth the king to be honored.

8. And truely it were very vaine that it should be disputed of private men which shoulde bee the best state of policy in the place where they liue: for whom it is not lawfull to consult of the framing of any common weale. And also the same could not be simply determined without rashnesse, forasmuch as a great parte of the order of this question consisteth in circumstances. And if thou compare also the states themselves together without circumstances, it shall not be easie to discerne which of them owreweith the other in profitablenesse, they match so equally together. There is an easie way to fall from kingdom into tyranny: but not much harder is it to fall from the rule of the chiefest men to the faction of a fewe: but most easie of all, from the peoples government, to sedition. Truely, if those three forms of governments which the Philosophers set out, to be considered in themselves I will not deny that either the government of the cheepest men, or a state tempered of it and common government farre excelleth all other: not of it selfe, but because it most seldom chaunce that kings so temper themselves, that their wil neuer swaruth from that which is just and right, again, that they bee furnished with so great sharpnesse of judgement and wisdom that every one of them seeth so much as is sufficient. Therefore the fault or default of men maketh, that it is safer and more tolerable that many hold have the government, that they may mutually one help an other, one teach and admonish an other, and if any aduance himselfe hier than is meet, there may be overseers and mufflers to restraine his wilfullnes. This both hath al-way bin approoved by experience, and the Lord alio hath confirmed it with his authoritie, when he ordained among the Israelites a government of the best men vertie neere vnto common government, at such time as hee minded to have them in best estate, till he brought foorth an image of Christ in Davids. And as I willingly grant that no kinde of government is more blessed than this, where libertie is framed to such moderation as it ought to be, and is orderly established to continuance: so I compt them also most blessed, may enjoy this estate: & if they stoutly and constantly trauell in preferuing and retaining it, I grant that they do nothing against their duttie. Yea & the magistrates ought with most great diligence to bende themselves herunto, that they suffer not the libertie of the people, of which they are appointed governours, to be in any part minisitred, much leffe to be disloled: if they be negligent and little carefull therein, they are false Faithbreakers in their offices, and betrayers of their coutrie. But if they woulde bring this kinde to themselves, to whom the Lord hath apointed an other forme of government, so that thereby they be moued to desire a change, the very thinking thereof shall not onely bee foolish and superfluous, but also hurtfull.
But if thou bende not thine eyes onely to one citie, but looke about, or behold the whole world together, or as least spread abroad thy fight into farther distances of countries, without doubt thou shalt find that this is not unprofitably appointed by the providence of God, that diuerse countries should be ruled by diuerse kindes of government. For as the elementes hang together but by an unequall temperature, so countries also are with their certaine inequality very wel kept in order. Howbeit all these things also are spoken in vaine to them whom the will of the Lord shall satisfy. For if it be his pleasure, to set kings over kingdoms, Senates, or officers over free cities, whosoeuer he make th ruledes in the places where we are contensant, it is our duttie to shew our felues yelding and obedient vnto them.

9 Now the office of Magistrates is in this place to bee declared by the way, of what sort it is described by the worde of God, and in what things it consisteth. If the scripture did not teach, y it extendeth to both the tables of law, we might learne it out of the prophane writers. For none hath intrea-ted of the dutie of Magistrates, of making of lawes and of publike works, that hath not begun at religion and the worshipping of God. And so have they all confessed, that no policie can be happily framed, vnlesse the first care be Of godlinesse: and that those lawes be preposterous which neglecting the right of God, doe provide only for men. Sith therefore with all the Phylophers religion hath the first place, & thye fame hath alway bin observed by the vnierfall consent of all nations, let Christian princes and magistrates be ashamed of their flourfulness, if they endeavour not themselves to this care. And we have alreadie shewed, that this dueute is specially esteemed them of God: as it is meete, that they shoule employe their trauell to defende and maintaine his honour, whose vicegerentes they bee, and by whose benefite they gouerne. For this cause also cheefly are the holy kings praised in scripture, for that they restored the worship of God being corrupted or overthrown, or took care of religion, that it might florish pure and safe vnder them.

But contrariwise, holy historie reckoneth states without gouernors, among faults, saying that there was no king in Israel, and that therefor euerie man did what pleased himselfe. Whereby their follic is confuted, which would haue them, neglecting the care of God, onely to applie themselves to bee judges of law among me. As though God appointed gouernours in his name to dicide controversyes, and omitted that which was of much weightier importance, that hee himselfe shoule be worshipted according to the prescribéd rule of his lawe. But a desire to innovate all things without punishmet moueth troublesome men to this point, that they wishe all reoungers of the breach of peace to be taken away. As for so much as pertaineth to ye seconde table, Jeremie warneth kings, to do judgemen and righteoufnes, to deliuer the forcellly oppresed from the hand of the false accuser, not to grieue the stranger and widow, not to do wrong, and not to shed innocent blood. To ye same purpose maketh the exhortation which is read in the 82. Psalme, that they should render right to the poore and needy, acquite the poore and needie, deliuer the poore and needie from the hand of the oppressor. And Moses giveth charge to the Princes whom he had set in his stead: let them heare the cause of their brethren, and judge betwene a man and his brother: a stranger, and not know faces in judgemen, let them heare as well the little as the great, and be not afraid of any man: because it is the judgement of God. But I speake not of these things: that kinges should not getto themselves multitudes of horses, not cast their minds to couerousnesse, not to be lifted vp above their brethren: that they may bee continually busied in studying upon the lawe of the Lorde all the dayses of their life: that Judges swarue not to one side, nor receive gifts: because in declaring here the office of magistrates, my purpose is not so much to instruct the magistrates themselves, as to teach other what Magistrates bee, and to what ende they are set of God. We see therefore that they bee ordained defenders and reoungers of innocence, modestie, honestie, and quietnesse, whose onely indevoure shoule bee to provide for the common safety and peace of all men. Of which virtues Dauid profeareth he will be an examplar, when hee shall be advanced to royall estate: that is, that hee will not consent to any euill doings, but abhorre wicked men, slanderers, and proude men, and gette to himselfe from eche where honest and faithfull men. But fith they cannot performe this, vnlesse they defende good men from the wronges of the euill, let them helpe good with succour and defence, let them also be armed with power whereby they may may severally suppress open evil doers and wicked men by whose lewdness the common quiet is troubled or vexed. For we thoroughly find this by experience which Solomon said, that common weales consist of reward & punishment, & that when those be taken away, the whole discipline of cities faileth & is dissolved. For the care of equitie & justice waxeth cold in the minds of many, vnlesse there be due honor readie for vertue: neither can the wilfulnesse of wicked men be restrained but by seueritie and chastisement of paines. And these two partes the prophet comprehended, when he biddeth kings and other governours to do judgement and righteousnes. Righteousnes is to take into charge of tuition, to embrace, to defend, to reuenge, to deliver innocent. Judgement is, to withst and the boldnes of wicked men, to repress their violence, to punish their offences.

But here, as it seemeth, doth arise a hie and hard question: If by the law of God all Christians are forbidden to kill, and the Prophet prophecied of the holy mount of God, that is, the Church, that in it they shall not afflict nor hurt: how many magistrates be together both godly & blood shedders? But if we understand, that the Magistrate in executing of punishments, doth nothing of himselfe, but executeth the very selfe judgements of God, wee shalbe nothing concerned with this doubt. The lawe of the Lorde forbiddeth to kill: least manslaughter should be unpunished, the lawe maker him selfe giueth to the ministres the sworde in their handes, which they should drawe forth against all man slayers. To afflict and to hurt, is not the doing of the godly: but this is not to hurt, not to afflict, by the Lorde's commandement to reuenge the afflictions of the godly. I woulde to God that this were alway present before our minde, that nothing is here done by the rashnesse of man, but all things by the authentie of God that commandeth, which going before, we never swarme out of the right way. Unlesse perhaps there be a bridle put vpon the righteousnesse of God, that it may not punishe wicked doings. But if it be not lawfull to appoint any law to it, why shal be our euille against the ministres of it? They bear not the sworde in vaine, sayeth Paul: for they be the ministres of God to wrath, reuengers to euill doers. Therefore if Princes & other rulers know that nothing shalbe more accepteable to God than their obedience, let them apply this ministerie, if they desire to shew their godlinesse, righteousnesse, & vncorruptnesse allowable to God. With this affections was Moses said, when knowing himselfe appointed by the power of the Lorde to bee the deliverer of his people, hee layde his handes vpon the Aegyptian. Againe, when by flaying of three thousand men in one day, he tooke vengeance of the sacrilege of the people. Davud also, when nye to the end of his life he gaue commandement to Salomon his sonne to slay Joab & Semei, Whereupon he also rehearseth this among virtues of a king, to slay the wicked of the lande, that all workers of wickednes may be driven out of the citie of God. To which purpose also pertineth the praisse that is givun to Salomon. Thou haft louted righteousnes and haft hated wickednesse. How doth that milde & gentle nature of Moses burne out into so great crueltie, that being spринkeled and embred with the bloud of his brethren, he runneth throughout the campe to newe slaughters? How doth Davud, a man of so great gentlenes in all his life, among his last brea-things make that bloodie testament, that his sonne should not bring his hoare haire of loab and Semei in peace to the grave: But they both when they executed the vengeance committed to them of God, so sanctified with cruel dealing their handes which they had defiled with sparing. It is an abomination with kings, faith Salomon, to doe iniquitate, because his throne is stablished in righteousness. Againe, The king which sitteth in the throne of judgement, spreadeth his eyes vpon euerie euill man. Againe, A wise king scattereth the wicked and turneth them vpon the wheel. Againe, Take away the drosse from the fliuer, and there shall come forth a vefsell to the melter: take away the wicked man from the sight of the king, and his throne shall be falt for in righteousness. Againe, He that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the righteous, both are abomination to the Lorde. Againe, A rebellious man purchaceth euill to himselfe, and a cruell messenger is sent vnto him. Againe, who so fayeth to the wicked man, thou art righteous, him peoples and nations do curse. Now if their true righteousness be, which drawn s worde to pursue giltie and wicked men: let them put vp their s worde, and holde their handes pure from bloud, while in the mean time desperate men do range with murthers and slaughters: then they shall make them fellers giltie of most great wickednesse, so much leffe shall they get thereby the praife of goodnesse and righteousness. Onely let there bee no precife and cruel rigoroufnesse, and that judgement feate which may worthily be called the rocke of accused men. For I am not hee that either fauour extreme crueltie, or do thinke that righteous judgement can be pronounced, but while clemencie the bett and surest counseller of kings, as Salomon affirmed, the prefuuer of the kinges throne is affiftent, which a certaine man in old time truely saide to be the principall gift of Princes. Yet a magistrate must take heed to both; that he do neither with rigoroufnes of minde, wound rather than heale, or by superstitious affection of clemencie fall into a most cruell gentlenesse; if with soft and loose tendernesse he bee dilolute to the destruction of many men. For this was in old time not without cause commonly spoken vnder the empire of Nerua, that it is in deede euill to live vnder a prince vnder whom nothing is lawfull, but much worse vnder whom all things are lawfull.

But sith sometime kings and peoples must of necessitie take s worde in hande to execute such publique vengeance, by this reason we may alfo judge that the warres are lawful which are so taken in hand. For if there bee power deliuered them, whereby they may maintaine quiet to their dominion, whereby they may kepe downe the seditious stars of vnguette, whereby they may helpe the forceably oppressed, whereby they may punish euil doings; can they at fitter seasos vter it, than to suppress his rage which troubled both privately the rest of every man, and the common quiet of all men, which seditionally maketh yprores, which committeth violent oppressions and hauous euil doings? If they ought to bee prefuuerers and defenders of the lawes, they must alfo overthowe the enterprifes of all them by whose wicked doing the discipline of lawes is corrupted. Yea if they worthily punish those the euens whose injuries haue extended onely to a fewe: shall they suffer a whole countrey to be without punishment vexed and wasted with.
with robberies? For it maketh no difference whether he be a king or one of the basest of the comonalty, if inuadeth an others country into which he hath no right, & spoileth it like an enemy: all are alike to be taken & punish'd for robbers. This therefore both natural equity, & the rule of dutie teacheth that Princes are armed not only to restraine private duties with judicial punishments, but also to defend with warre the dominions comitted to their charge if at any time they be enimicelike assailed. And such warres the holy Ghost by many testimonies of Scripture declareth to be lawfull.

12 If it be objected against me, that in the newe Testament is neither witness nor example which teacheth that war is a thing lawfull for Christians: first I answer, that the same rule of making warre which was in old time remaineth also at this day, & on the contrary side there is no caufe that may debar magistrates from defending of their subjectes. Secondly that an expresse declaration of these matters is not to be sought in the writings of the Apostles, where their purpose is not to frame a civill state, but to stablifi the spiritual kingdom of Christ. Last of all I say that in them also is shewed by the way, that Christ hath by his comings changed nothing in this behalfe. For if Christian doctrine I may speake in Augustines own words condemned all warres, this should rather have bin sayd to soldiers when they asked counsell of saluation, that they should cast away their weapons, and utterly withdrew themselves from the warre. But it was sayd to them: strike no man, do no man wrong, let your mages suffice you. Whom he taught his wages ought to suffice them, he did verily not forbid them to be warriers. But al magistrates ought here to take great heed, they nothing at al follow their owne desires: but rather, if they must punish, let them not bee borne away with a headlong anger, let them not be violently caried with hatred, let them not broyle with vnappeasable rigor, yea let them (as Augustine sayeth) pity comon nature in him in whom they punish his private fault. Or if they must put on armour against the enemy, that is, the armed robber, let them not lightly seek occasion thereof, nor take it being offered vnleesse they be driven to it by extreme necessitie. For if we ought to performe much more than that heathen man required, which would have warre to seeme a seeking of peace: truly we ought first to attempt all things ere we ought to trie the matter by warre. Finally in both kindes let them not suffer themselves to be caried with any private affection, but be led only with common feeling. Otherwise they do very ill abufe their power, which is given the, not for their owne commoditie, but for others benefit and ministery. Moreouer of the same rightfull rule of making warre hangeth the order both of garrisons, & leagues and other civill fortifications. Garrisons I cal those that are placed in townes to defend the borders of the countrey: Leagues, which are made with Princes adjoyning for this covenant if any trouble happen in their landes they may mutually helpe them, and joyn their forces in comon together to suppress the common enemies of mankind: Civill fortification, whose use is in the art of warre.

13 This also I will latt of al adde, that tributes and taxes are the lawful reuences of princes, which they may chiefly employ to sustaine comon charges of their office: which yet they may likewise vs to their private royaltie which which is after a certaine manner conioyned with honor of the princely state that they bear. As wee see that David, Ezechias, Josias, Josaphat, and other holy kings, and Joseph also and Daniell, according to the state of the person that they did bare, were without offence of godlines sumptuous of the common charge, and we read in Ezechiel that there was a very large portion of land assigned to the kings. Where although he paint out the spiritual kingdom of Christ, yet he fetcheth the examplar of his similitude from the lawfull kingdom of men. But yet so, that Princes againe on their behalues shoulde remember, that their treasure chambers are not so much their own private coffers, as the treasuries of the whole people (for so Paul testifieth) which they may not without manifest wrong, prodigally waste or spoyle; or rather that it is the yerie bloud of the people, which not to spare, is most cruel vnnaturalnesse: and let them thinke, that their impositions, and subodies, and other kindes of tributes, are nothing but the supportes of publike necessitie, wherewith to weare the poore communaltie without caule, is tyrannicall extortion. These things do not encourage Princes to wastfull expense and riot, (as verily there is no neede to adde a firebrande to their lustes that are of themselves too much already kindled) but such much behoveth that they shoulde with pure conscience before God be bolde to do all that they are bold to do, least with wicked boldnes they come into despising of God, they must be taught how much is lawfull for this. Neither is this doctrine superfluous for private men, that they shoulde not rashly and stubbornly give theis lustes leaue to judge at any expenses of Princes, although they exceede common and civill measure.

14 Next to the magistrate in civile states are lawes, the most strong seruices of common wealtthes, or (as Cicero calleth them according to Plato) the soules, without which the magistrate cannot stand; as they againe without the Magistrate haue no lively force. Therefore nothing could be more truly sayde, than that the lawe is a dumb Magistrate, and that the magistrate a living lawe. But wheras I promisde to speake, with what lawes a Christian civill state ought to bee ordered, there is no cause why any man should looke for a long discoursse of the beft kind of lawes, which both shall be infinite, and pertained not to this present purpose and place: yet in a few wordes, and as it were by the way, I will touch what lawes it may vs goddely before God, and bee rightly governed by them among men. Which selfe thing I had rather to have vterly passe ouer with silence, if I did not vnderstande that many do herein perilously erre. For there be some that denie that a common weale is well ordered, which neglecting the civile lawes of Moses is gouerned by the common lawes of nations. Howe dangerous and troublesome this sentencce is, let other men consider, it shall bee enough for me to haue shewed that it is false and foolish: That common diuision is to be kept, which diuideth the whole lawe of God published in to morall, ceremoniall, and judiciaall lawes: and all the partes are to bee severally considered, that we may knowe what of them pertaineth to vs, & what not. Neither in the meane time let any man bee combred with this doubt, that judicials and ceremonials also pertaine to the morall lawes: For although the olde writers which haue taught this diuision, were not ignoanent that
To Salvation. Lib. 4.

18. Let this therefore be said to such men, that the use of lawes is lawfull, if a man doe rightly use it. And that the right use both for the plaintiff to sue, & for the defendant to defend, is if the defendant being summoned do appear at an appointed day, & doth with such exception as he can, defend his cause without bitterness, but only with this affection to defend that which is his own by law; and if the plaintiff being unworthyly oppressed either in his person or his goods, doth referre to the defence of the Magistrate, make his complaint, and require that which is equitie and conscience, but farre from all greedy will to hurt or revenge, farre from sharpnesse and hatred, farre from burning heart of contention, but rather ready to yeeld of his owne and to suffer any thing, than to be carried with an enemulike mind against his aduerarie. Contrariwise when being filled with malice of minde, corrupted with envy, kindled with wrath, breathing out revenge, or finally so enflamed with the heat of contention, they give over any parte of charitie, the whole proceeding even of a most just cause can not but be wicked. For this ought to be a determined principle to all Christians, that a controuerse though it be never so righteous, can never be rightly pursued of any man, vnlesse hee beare as good will and love to his aduerarie, as if the matter which is in the controuerse were already concluded and ended by composition. Some man wil here paraduenture saye, that such moderation is so never vied in going to lawe, that it should be like a miracle if any such were found. I grant in deede, as the manner of these times be, that there is feldome seen an example of a good contender in law, yet the thing itselfe being destyled with addition of no euill, ceaseth not to bee good and pure. But when we here that the help of the Magistrate is a holy gift of God: we must so much the more diligently take heede, that it be not destyled by our fault.

19. As for them that precifely condemn all contending at law, let the understand that they do therewith all despise the holy ordinance of God, and a

Of the outward means gift of that kinde of gifts which may be cleane to the cleane: unlesse peraduenture they will accuse Paul of wicked doing, which did both put away from himselfe the flanders of his accusers with declaring also their deceit and maliciousnesse, and in judgement claimed for himselfe the prerogative of the citie of Rome, and when neede was he appelleed from an unrighteous governour to the Emperours judgement seat. Neither withstandeth it, that all Christians are forbidden to desire reuenge, which we also do drue farre away from Christian judgement seates. For, if the contention bee about a common cause, he goeth not the right way that doth not with innocent simplicitie, commit his cause to the judge as to a common defender, thinking nothing lesse than to render mutuall recompence of euill, which is the affection of reuenge: or if any matter of life & death, or any great criminal action be commenced, we require that the accuser be such a one, as commeth in to the court being taken with no boyling heate of reuenge, & touched with no displeasure of private injurie, but only hauing in minde to withstande the enterprises of a mischeuous man, that they may not hurt the common weale. But if thou take away a reuenging minde, there is no offence done against that commandement whereby reuenge is forbidden to Christians.
But they are not onely forbidden to desire reuenge, but they are also commanded to waite for the hande of the Lorde, which promiseth that he will be a present reuenger for the oppressed and afflicted: but they doe preuent all reuenge of the heauenly defender, which require helpe at the Magistrates hande either for themselves or other. Nor so. For wee must thinke that the Magistrates reuenge is not the reuenge of man but of God, which (as Paul saith) hee extendeth and exerciseth by the ministerie of man for our good.

And no more do we disagree with the worde of Christ, by which he forbidth to resifi euill, and commandeth to turne the right cheeke to him that hath given a blowe on the left, and to suffer him to take away thy droke that taketh away thy coate. He wilth in deed there that the minds of his shoule do much abhorre from desire of recompening like for like; that they should sooner suffer double injurie to be done to themselves, than desire to reacquire it, from which patience neither do we also leade them away. For Christians truly ought to bee a kinde of men made to beare re-proches and injuries, open to the malice, deceits, and mockeages of noughty men: and not that onely but also they must be bearers of all these euilles, that is to say so framed with all the i heartes, that hauing receiued one displeasure they make themselves ready for an other, promising to themselves nothing in their whole life but yt bearing of a continual Cross. In the meantime also they must doe good to them that do them wrong, and with the well to shooke that curse them, and (which is their onely victorie) triue to overcome euill with good. Beeing so minded they will not secke eye for eye, tooth for tooth, as the Pharisees taught their disciples to desire reuenge, but (as we are taught of Christ) they will doe suffer their body to bee mangled, and their goods to bee maliciously taken from them, that they will forgive and of their owne acorde pardon those euils so soon as they are done to them. Yet this euennesse and moderation of minde shall not withstande, but that the friendship toward their enemies remaining safe, they may see the helpe of the magistrate to the preseruing of their goods, or for zeal of pub-like commoditie may see a guiltie and pestilent man to be punished, whom y they knowe that he can not be amended but by death. For Augustine truly expoundeth that all these commandementes tende to this end, that a righteous and godly man should be ready to beare patiently the malice of them whom he seeketh to have made good men, that rather y number of the good may encresse, not that he shoulde with like malice adde himselfe also to the number of the euill: then, that they more pertaine to the preparation of the heart, which is inwardely, than to the worke which is done openly: that in secret may be kept patience of minde with good will, but openly that may be done which we see may be profitable to them to whom we are ought to beare good will.

21 But this which is wont to be obieected, that contendinges in lawe are altogether condemned of Paul, is also false: It may easly bee perceined by his wordes, that there was an immeasurable rage of struing at lawe in the Church of the Corinthians: so farre forth that they did make the Gospell of Christ and the whole religion which they professed, open to the caullations and euill speaking of the wicked. This is the first thing that Paul blameth in them, that by their intemperance of contentions they brought the Gosp-nel in euender among the vnbelieuers. And then this point also, that in such fart they strued among themselves brethren with brethren. For they were so farre from bearing of wrongs, that they greedily gaped one for an others goods, provoked one an other, & being unprovoked did hurt. Therefore he inuyeth against that rage of contending, and not simply against all controuersies. But he pronounseth that it is a fault or a weakenesse, that they did not rather suffer losse of their goods than to traualie euens to contentions for the preseruing of them: namely when they were so falsly mowed with euer damage, and for most small causes did runne to the court of lawe and to con-trooversies, he sayth that this is a prooue that they were of a minde too ready to anger & not well framed to patience: Christians verily ought to doe this, that they had alway rather to yelde of their owne right than to goe to lawe, from whence they can sacrably get out again but with a minde too much meued and kindled to hatred of their brother. But when a man seeth that without losse of charitie he may defend his owne, the losse whereof should be a fore hindrance vnto him: if he do so he offendeth nothing against this sayng of Paul. Finally (as we haue taught in the beginning) charitie shall giue euertie man best counsell, without which whatsoeuer controversies are taken in hande, and beyond which whatsoeuer do proceede, we hold it out of controuersie that they be vniust and wicked.

22 The first dutie of subiectes toward their magistrates is, to thinke most honorably of their office, namely which they acknowledge to be a jurisdicion committed of God, and therefore to esteeme them and reverence them as the ministers and deputies of GOD. For a man may finde some, which yeelde them selues very obedient to their magistrates, and woulde not that there were not some whom they should obey, because they so knowe it to be expedient for the common benefit: but the magistrates themselves they thinke
thinke no otherwise than of certaine necessarie evils. But Peter requireth somewhat more of vs, when he commandeth that the king be honoured: & Solomon, when he commandeth God and the king to be feared. For Peter vnder the word of Honoring containeth a larger and well seeming commication: & Solomon joyning the king with God, sheweth that he is full of a certaine holy reverence & dignitie. This is also a notable commendation in Paul, that we obey not only for wrath but for conscience. Whereby he meaneth that subjectes ought to be led, not only with fear of princes & rulers to be holden in their subiection (as they are wont to yield to their armed enimie, which see that vengeance shall redily be taken upon them if they resist) but because the obidences that are shewed to them are shewed to God himselfe, forasmuch as their power is of God. I speake not of the men, as if the visor of dignitie did couer foolishnesse, or sluggisnnesse, or cruelties, or wicked maners & full of mischievous doing: but I say that the degree it selfe is worthie of honor & reverence: that whosoever be rulers may be esteemed with vs, & have reverence, in respect of their being rulers.

23. Of this then also followeth another thing: that with minds bent to the honoring of them, they declare their obedience in proue to them; whether it be to obey their proclamations, or to pay tribute, or to take in hand publike offices and charges that serve for common defence, or to do any other of their commandements. Let every soule (faith Paul) be subject to the hierarchy of powers. For he that resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. The same Paul writeth to Titus: Warne them that they be subject to rulers and powers, that they obey the Magistrates, y they be ready to every good work. And Peter sayth: Bee ye subject to every humane creature (or rather as I render it, Ordinance) for the Lords sake, either to the king as most excellent, or to the rulers that are sent by him, to the punishment in decrees of euill doers, but to the praise of well doers. Moreover y they should resišt that they do not faine subiection, but are sincerely and heartily subject, Paul addeth that they should commend to God the faystic and prosperitie of them vnder whom they live. I exhort (faith he) that ther be made prayets: beseechings, intercessions, thanksgivinges for all men, for kings and for all that be set in superioritie, that wee may live a peaceable and quiete life with all godlinitie and honestie. Neither let any man here deceived himselfe. For sith the Magistrate can not be resistt, but that GOD himselfe must also be resistt: although it may bee thought that an vnarmed magistrate may freely be despised, yet God is armed which will strongly take vengeance on the despising of himselfe. Moreover vnder this obedience I containe moderation, which private men ought to binde themselves to keepe in cases touching the publike state, that they do not of their owne heade entermeddle in publike businesse, or rashly breake into the office of the Magistrate, and enterprize nothing publiquely. If any thing shall be publiquely done, lette not them selves rape vpromes, nor put their handes to the doing of it, which they all ought to have fast bounde in this behalfe: but lette them commit it to the judgement of the magistrate, whose hande alone is herein at libertie. I mean, that they presume to doe nothing uncommanded. For when the commandement of the ruler ruler is adjoyned, then are they also furnished with publike authority. For as they are wont to call the counsellors of a king, his cares and eyes: so not ven-ﬁtly a man may call them the handes of the prince, whom by his command-dement he feteth in authoritie for the doing of things.
24 Now forasmuch as we haue hitherto described a magistrate such as is indeed the same that he is called, namely the father of the country, and (as the Poet calleth him) the pastor of the people, the keeper of peace, the protector of righteousnesse, the revenger of innocence; he is worthy to be judged a mad man, that alloweth not such a gournement. But whereas this is in a manner the experience of all ages, that of princes some being careless of all things to the foreseeing whereof they ought to have beene heedfully bent, do without all care thoughtfully wallow in delites; other some addicted to their gaine, doe set out to sale all lawes, privilegcs, judgements, and grauntes; other some spoile the poore communaltie of monie which they may after waste vpon mad prodigal expendings: other some exercise meere robberies, in pilling of houses, deﬁling of virgins and matrones, murdering of innocentes: many cannot bee perfwaded that such should be acknowledged for princes, whose authoritie they ought to obey so far as they may. For in so greate haunious vnworthinesse among doinges so much contrarie to the ductie not onely for a magistrate, but also of a man, they beholde no forme of the image of God which ought to shine in a magistrate: when they see no toké of that minister of God, which was gien for praise to the good and for vengeance to the cull: so neither doe they also acknowledge such a go-urnour, whose dignitie and authoritie the scripture commendeth unto vs. And truly this feeling of affection hath alway beene naturally planted in the minds of men, no leefe to hate and abhorre tyrants, than to love and honour lawfull kings.
25 But if wee looke to the worde of God, it will leade vs further, that we be subject not only to the gournement of those princes which execute their office towarde vs well and with such faithfullnesse as they ought, but also of all them, which by what meane soever it be, haue the dominion in pos-fection although they performe nothing leefe than that which pertaineath to the dutie of princes. For though the Lord testifieth that the magistrate is a speciall great gift of his liberalitie for preferring of the safetie of men, and appointeth to magistrates themselves their bounds: yet he doth therewith-all declare, that of what sort soever they bee, they haue not their authoritie but from him: that those indeede, which rule for beneﬁte of the common weale, are true examplars and paternes of his bountifulnesse: that they that rule vnjustly and wilfully, are raised vp by him to punishe the wickednes of the people: that all eglely haue that maestie wherewith hee hath furnished a lawfull power. I wil proceed no further, till I haue added some certaine testimonies of that point. Yet wee neede not much to labor to prove that a wicked king is the wrath of God vpon the earth, for as much as I think that no man will lay the contrarie, and otherwise there should bee no more said of a king than of a common robber that violely taketh away thy goods, and of an adulterer that defileth thy bed, of a murtherer that seeketh to kill thee, whereas the scripture reckenheth all such calamities among the curies

To Salvation.  Lib. 4.  50s

Tob. 34. 30.
Ose. 13. 1r.
Esa. 3. 4. 10.
Deut. 28. 29.
26 First I would have the Readers to perceive & diligently mark that prouidence and singular doings of God, which is in the Scripture not without cause so oft rehearsed vnto vs, in distributing of kingdomes and making Kings whome it pleaceth him. In Danniell, it is faide: The Lorde changeth times and courses of times, he casteth away and maketh kings. Againe: That y liuing may know y the Hiift is mightie in the kingdom of men, & he shall giue it to whoso he wil. With which maner of sentence wheras y whole scripture aboundeth, yet y same prophecie of Daniel specially swarmeth full. Now what manner of king was Nabuchadonezar, he that conquered Hierusalem, it is sufficiently knowen, namely a strong inuader and destroyer of other, Yet in Execheil the Lorde affirmeth that hee gaue him the lande of Egypte for the seruice that hee had done to him in wafting it. And Daniel faide to him: Thou king art y king of kinges, to whom the king of heaven hath giuen a mightie, and strong, and glorious kingdome: to thee, I say, he hath giuen it, and all the landes where dwell the children of men, the beasts of y wood and foules of the airc: hee hath deliuered them into thy hande, and hath made thee to beare rule ouer them. Againe hee faide to his fonne Belsafar: The hiift God hath giuen to Nabuchadonezar thy Father kingdome and royaltie, honour and glorye: and by reason of the royaltie that hee gaue him, all peoples, tribes, and languages were trembling and fearfull at his sighte. When we heare that a king is ordeined of God, let vs thereof call to remembrance those heavenly warnings concerning the honor and fearing of a king: then we shall not doubt to accomptee, a most wicked tyrant in the same place wherein in the Lorde hath vouchsaft to set him. Samuel, when he gaue warning to the people of Israel, what manner of thinges they shoulde suffer at the handes of their kinges, faide: This shall be the right of the king that shall reigne ouer you; hee shall take your sonnes and put them to his chariot, to make them his horsemen, and to plowe his land, and reappe his crop, and to make instrumentes of warre. Hee shall take your daughters, that they may be his dressers of ointmentes, his cookees and bakers. Your lands, your vineyards, and your best Olieu plantes hee shall take away and giue to his bondes fervauantes. Hee shall take tithes of your seedes and vineyards, and shall giue them to his eunuches and bondes fervauantes. Hee shall take away your bonde men, your bonde women and your aifes, and set them to his worke. Yea and hee shall take tithes of your flockes: and ye shall be his bond servantes. Verily kinges shoulde not haue done this of right, whome the lawe did verie well instruct to all continence: but it was called a right ouer y people which it behouued them of necessitie to obey, and they might not refus it: as if Samuell had faide. The wilfulnesse of kinges shall runne to such such licentiousnesse, which it shall not be your parte to resift, to whome this only thing shalbe left, to obey their commandementes and harken to their words.

27 But chiefly there is in Ieremie a notable place and worthy to be re-membred, which although it be somewhat long, yet I will be content to reheare, because it most plainly determineth this whole question. I have made the earth and men, saith the Lord, and the living creatures that are on the ouerface of the earth in my great strength and strecthed out arme, and I will delieuer it to him whom it please eth in mine eyes. And nowe therefore I have given all these landes into the hande of Nabuchadnezer my servant, and all nations and great kinges shall serue him, till the time shal come of that land.
And it shalbe as a nation and a kingdome that hath not serued the king of Babel, I will visit that nation in swordes, famine, and pestilence. Wherefore, serue ye the king of Babell and liue. Wee see with howe great obedience the Lorde willed that cruel and proude tyrant to be honored, for no other reason but because he possessed the kingdome. And the same was by the heavenly decree, that he was sette in the throne of the kingdome, and taken up into kingly majestie, which it was unlawful to violate. If wee haue this continually before our mindes and eyes, that euem the worst kinges are ordained by the same decree by which the authoritie of kinges is stablished these seditious thoughtes shal never come into our minde, that a king is to be handled according to his deservings; & that it is not meete that we should shewe ourselfes subiectes to him that doth not on his behalfe shew himselfe a king to vs.

28 In vaine shall any man obiecte that this was a peculiar commandment to the Israelites. For it is to be noted with what reason the Lord confron-meth it. I have given (saith he) the kingdome to Nabuchadnezer. Wherefore serue ye him and liue. To whomsoever therefore it shalbe certaine that the kingdome is giuen, let vs not doute that he is to be obeyed. And so foome as the Lord aduationeth any man to the royall estate, he therein declareth his will to vs that he will haue him reigne. For thereof are general testimonies of the Scripture. Salomon in the xxvij. Chapter, Many Princes are because of the wickednesse of the people. Againe Job in the xij. chap.
He taketh away subiection from kinges, and girdeth them againe with the girdle.
But this being cesseled, there remaineth nothing but that we must serue and liue. There is also in Ieremie the Prophete an other commandement of the Lorde, wherein he commanded his people to seeke the peace of Babylon, whither they had bene ledde away captiue, and to pray to him for it, because in the peace of it shalbe their peace. Behold the Israelites being spoiled of all their goods, plucked out of their houses, led away into exile, and cast into miserable bondage, are commanded to pray for the saftie of the Conqueror: not as in other places we are commanded to pray for our persecutors, but that the kingdome may be preferued to himselfe and quiet, that they themselves may also liue prosperously vnder him. So David being an alreadie appointed king by the ordinance of God, and annoyted with his holy oyle, when he was without any his deservings unworthily persecuteof Saul, yet the head of him that layed wait for his life, he esteemed holy, which
which the Lord hath hallowed with the honour of kingdom. Farre be it from me (saide he) that I should before the Lord doe this thing to my Lord the anointed of the Lord, that I should lay my hand vpon him, because he is the anointed of the Lord. Againe, My soule hath spared thee, and I haue saide, I will not lay my hand vpon my Lord, because he is the anointed of the Lord. Againe, Who shall lay his hande vpon the anointed of the Lord and shal bee innocent? So sure as the Lord lieueth, vnshe the Lord strike him, or his day be come that he die, or he goe downe into battell: farre be it from me that I should lay my hand vpon the anointed of the Lord.

29 Finally wee owe this affectiion of reuerence yea and devotion to all our rulers, of what sort soever they be, which I do therefore the ofter repeate, that we may learne not to search what the men themselves bee, but take this for sufficient, that by the will of the Lord they beare that personage, in which the Lord himselfe hath imprinted and ingraued an inviolable majestie. But (thou wilt say) Rulers owne mutuall duties to their subiectes. That I haue alreadie confessed. But if thou thereupon conclude, that obedience are to be rendered to none but to iust governors, thou art a foolish reaonere. For, husbands also are bounde to their wifes and parents to their children with mutuall duties. Let parentes and husbands depart from their dutie: let parentes shewe themselves so hard and vnpleasable to their children, whom they are forbidden to prouoke to anger, that with their peecuifnes they do vnumeasureable wearie them: let the husbands most despitefully vse their wifes, whom they are commanded to loue, and to pare them as weake vesseles: shall yet therefore either children be leefe obedient to their parents or wifes to their husbands? but they are subiect both to euil parentes and husbandes and such as doe not their dutie. Yea, where as all ought rather to endeauor themselves not to looke behind them to the bagge hanging at their backe, that is, not to enquire one of another duties, but every man set before him that which is his owne dutie; this ought chiefly to haue place among those that are vnder the power of other. Wherefore if we be vmercifully tormented of a cruell prince, if we be rauenously spoiled of a couetous or rictous Prince, if we be neglect of a slothfull prince, finally if wee be vexed for godlinesses sake of a wicked and vngodly Prince: let vs first call to minde the remembrance of our sinnes, which vndoubtedlie are chaftised with such scourges of the Lord. Thereby humilitie shall bridde our impacience. Let vs then also call to minde this thought, that it perteineth not to vs to remedie such euils; but this onely is lefte for vs, that we craue the helpe of the Lorde, in whose hande are the hearts of kings, and the bowings of kingdomes. He is the God that shall stande in the assemblie of gods, and shall in the midst judge the gods, from whose face all kings shall fall, and be broken, and all the judges of the earth that shall have not kissed his anointed, that haue written vniust lawes to oppresse the poore in judgement, and do violence to the cause of the humble, to make widowes a pray, and robre the fatherlesse.

30 And here both his maruellous goodnes, and power, and prouidence sheweth it selfe: for sometime of his servantes he raiseth vp open reuengers, & furnishe them with his commandement, to take vengeance of their vniust
government, and to deliver his people many ways oppressed out of miserable distress: sometime he directed to the fame ende the rage of men that intend and go about another thing. So he delivered the people of Israel out of the tyranny of Pharaoh, by Moses: and out of the violence of Chusam king of Syria, by Othoniell: and out of other thraldomes, by other kings or Judges. So he tamed the pride of Tyrus, by the Egyptians: the insolence of the Egyptians, by the Assyrians: the fierceness of the Assyrians, by the Chaldees: the boldnes of Babylon, by the Medians, and by the Persians when Cyrus had subdued the Medians. And the unthankfulness of the kings of Iuda and Israel, and their wicked obstinacie toward his so many benefits, he did beat down and bring to distress sometime by the Assyrians, sometime by the Babilonians, albeit not al after one manner. For, the first sort of men when they were by the lawfull calling of God sent to doe such acts: in taking armour against kings, they did not violate that majestie which is planted in kings by the ordinance of God: but being armed from heauen they subdued the lesser power with the greater: like as it is lawful for kings to punish their Lords under them. But these latter sort, although they were directed by the hande of God whither it pleased him, and they vnwittingly did his worke, yet purposed in their minde nothing but mischief.

31 But howsoever the very doings of men be judged, yet the Lorde did as well execute his worke by them, when he did break the bloody scepters of proud kings, and overthrowe their intolerable governmentes. Let Princes heare and be afraid. But we in the mean ende must take great heede, that we do not despise or offend the authority of Magistrates full of reuendence, that God hath established with most weightie decrees, although it remaine with most vnworthie men, and which doe with their wickednesse so much as in them is, defeile it. For though the correcting of vnbridled government be the reuengement of the Lord, let vs not by and by think that it is committed to vs, to whom there is given no other commandement but to obey and suffer. I speake alway of private men. For if there be at this time any magistrates for the behalfe of the people, (such as in olde time were the Ephori, that were set against the kings of Lacedaemon, or the Tribunes of the people, against the Roman Consuls: or the Demarchy, against the Senate of Athenes: and the same power also which peraduenture, as things are now, the three estates haue in euery realme, when they hold their principal assemblies) I doe so not forbide them according to their office to withstande the outraging licentiousnesse of kings: that I affirm that if they winke at kings wilfully raging ouer and treading downe the poore communitie, their dissembling is not without wicked breche of faith, because they deceitfully betray the libertie of the people, whereof they knowe themselves to bee appointed protectors by the ordinance of God.

32 But in that obedience which we have determined to bee due to the authorities of Gouernors, this is alway to bee excepted, yea cheefely to bee observed, that it doe not leade vs away from obeying of him, to whose will the desires of all kings ought to be subiect, to whose decrees all their commaundements ought to yeilde, to whose majestie their maces ought to bee submitted. And truely howe vnorderly were it, for the satisfying of men to runne into his displeasure for whom men themselves are obeyed? The Lord therefore is the king of kingses, who, when he hath opened his holy mouth, is to be heard alone for altogether and above all: next to him wee bee subject to those men that are set ouer vs: but no otherwise than in him. If they commaund any thing against him, let it haue no place and let no acompte be made of it: neither let vs herein any thing staye upon al that dignitie where with yu Magistrats excel, to which there is no wrong done, when it is brought into order of subiection in comparison of that singular and truly soueraigne power of God. After this reafon Daniel denieth that he had any thing offended against the king, when he obeyed not his wicked proclamation: because the king had passd his boundes, and had notonly beeene a wrong doer to men, but in lifting vp his horns against God he had taken away power from himselfe. On the other side the Israelites are condemned because they were too much obedient to the wicked commaundement of the king. For when Ierobeam had made golden calues, they forsaking the Temple of God, did for his pleasure turne to newe superstitions. With like lightnesse their postertie inclined themselues to the ordinances of their kingses. With this yu Prophet sharply reprocheth them, that they embraced the commaundements of the king: so farre is it of, that the pretence of humilitie may deferte praise wherewith the flatterers of the court doe couer themselues and deceive the simple, while they say that it is not lawfull for them to refuse any thing that is commaundd them of their Princes: as though God had resigned his right to mortall men, giving them the rule of mankinde: or as though the earthely power were minished, when it is made subject to the author of it, before whom even the heavenny powers doe humble tremble for feare. I know howe great and howe present perill hangeth ouer this constancia, because kings do most displeantly suffer themselves to be despised, whose displeasure (faith Salomon;) is the messenger of death. But sith this decreed is proclaimed by the heavenly harald Peter: That we ought to obey God rather then men, let vs comfort our selues with this thought, that we then performe that obedience which the Lord requireth, when we suffer any thing rather whatsoever it be, than swarue from godlines. And that our courages shoulde not faint. Paul putteth also an other spurre to vs: That we were therefore redeemed of Christ with so great a price as our redemption cost him, y we should not yeilde our selues in thraldome to obey the peruerse desires of men, but much lesse should be bound to vngodlinesse.

Booke. 4. Chapter. 4. Section.

Adams fall.
The fall of Adam proceeded not of incomenrance of gluttony, but of infi-delitie: for he desping the word and truth of God, turned out of the way to the lyes of Sathan: which infidelity opened the gate to ambition & pride, whereunto was adioyned vnthankful-nesse: and ambition was the mother of disobedience.2.1.4.

By the fall of Adam fifth other creatures have been after a sort deformed, it is no maruell, that all mankinde was corrupted, that is to say: Iwarued out of kinde from his first original, & made subject to curse. This the old Doctors called Original sinne, but yet did not so plainly set forth this point of Doctrine as was conuenient. In the meantime it is proved by reason and testimonies of Scripture, y Pelagius fowy erred when he sayd that by imitation only, not by propagation, sinne passed from the first man into all his posteritic.2.1.5,6.

And though the pestilence of sinne doe principally abide in the soule, yet it doeth not therefore pertaine to the discussing of this Doctrine, to dispute whether the soule of the childe commeth of the engendring substance of the father: forasmuch as the cause of the infection is not in the substance of the flesh or of the soule, but because it was ordained of God, that those giftes which he at the first had giuen to man, man shoulde have and loose them for him and his. Finally it maketh notagainst this doctrine, that the children of the faithfull are sanctified.2.1.7.

That by the fall of Adam the natural gifts in man were corrupted and the supernaturall were taken away, is a saying that many haue vnderstood, but few haue vnderstood.2.2.4,16, which saying is expounded.2.2.12, that is to say that the supernaturall giftes, faith, the love of God, charity toward our neighbours, defirous endevour of holinesse and righteousness were taken away, but are restored by Christ: & the natural giftes, namely the vnderstanding mind, and the heart are corrupted, because the soundnes of vnderstanding and the vprightnes of heart were both taken away: Also that reason in man was not vitally blotted out, but partly weakened and partly corrupted: & fo Will, because it can no be leyued fro the nature of man, was not vitally destroyed, but made thrall to corrupt descires.2.2.12.

It is proved by the testimonies of Augustin
Augustine & of the Scripture, y God not only foresaw or suffred, but also by his will disposed the fall of the first man, and in him the vaine of his posteritie. 3.23.7.8.

Angels

Angels are creatures of God although Moles do not expresse them in the history of the creation. 1.14.3.

Of the time or order wherein they were created, it is not expedient to enquire, forasmuch as y Scripture (which we ought to follow for our rule) declareth nothing thereof. 1.14.4.

Why the heavenly Spirits are called Angels, Armies, Vertues, Principalties, powers, Dominios, Thrones, Gods. 1.14.5.

Concerning Angels the Scripture teacheth so much as is available for our comfort and for the confirming of our faith, namely that they are distributers and ministers of Gods bountifulnes towarde vs, and the same by divers wayes. 1.14.6.9.

Not onely one Angel hath severall care of every one of vs, but they all with one consist do watch for our safety: and therefore it is superfluous to enquire whether every man haue his severall Angel assigned to be his keeper. 1.14.7.

Of the number and degrees of Angels, it is curioufnnes to require, & rashnes to determine: And why, whereas they be Spirits, the Scripture painteth them with wings vnder Cherubin and Seraphin. 1.14.8.

Against the Sadduces & such other fantastical men, it is proved by sundry testimonies of the Scripture, that Angels are not qualities or inspirations without substance, but very spirites in deede. 1.14.9.

That superstition is herein to be avoide, and that wee giue not to Angels those thinges that belong only to God and Chrift. 1.14.10.

For avoideing of this peril, we must consider that whereas God veth their service, hee doeth it not of neede, as though he could not beth with them, but for the comfort of our weakenesse 1.14.11. And therefore whatsoever is sayd of the minifterie of Angels, ought to be referred to this ende, that overcomming all distrust, our trust in God should be thereby the more strongly stablished, & not that they should lead vs away from God. 1.14.12.

That the Angels also were created after the likenes of God 1.15.3.

Baptisme.

The definition of Baptisme. The first end thereof is to serue our faith before God, the other ende, to serue our confeffio before men. It bringeth to our our faith three things, first that it is a signe of our cleansing, assuring vs that all our sinnes are done away. 4. 15. 1. which is proved by testimonies of the Scripture, and that it is not the water that cleanseth vs, but the bloud of Christ Sect. 2.

The force of baptisme is not restrai ned to the time past: but we are by it washed and cleansed once for all our life: and yet that we may not heereof take a liberty to sinne frō thence forward. 4. 15. 3.

The power of the keies (as they call it) that is to say, the ministerie of the Church, by which the forgiveness of sinnes is daily preached vnto vs, is not to be seuered from baptisme. 4. 15. 4.

The second fruite of faith by baptisme, is that it sheweth to vs our mortifying in Christ, and a new life in him 4. 15. 5.

The thirde fruite is, that it testifi eth that wee are so united to Christ, that wee are partakers of all his good things. For which cause Christ is called the proper object of baptisme, and the Apostles baptised into the name of Christ, in whome wee do so obteine the matter both of our cleansing & of our regeneration, as wee obteine the cause therof in the father, & the effect in the holy Ghost. 4. 15. 6.

It is proved that the baptisme was allone which was ministred of Iohn and of the Apostles, although some of the olde Doctors thought other wise. 4. 15. 7. and that it maketh not to the contrarie, that more abundant graces of the Spiri te are poured out, since the resurrection of Christ. But yet there is in baptisme a difference to be made of the person of Christ from Iohn, and from the Apostles & other ministers. 4. 15. 8.

Both our mortifying & our cleasing were as by shadowe signified among the people of Israel, by the passinge through the sea, & the comfortable calling of the cloud. 4. 15. 9.

It is false which some have taugh, that by Baptisme wee are restored to the same righteousness & purenesse of nature which Adam had at the beginning. And ther is shewed that in the children of God doe remaine yet some leauings of sinne, although the same reigne not in them: which doth whet therin endeavours, and doeth not give them occasion to flatter themselves. 4. 15. 10, 11, the same is proved by Paul, Sect. 12.

How Baptisme serueth our confession before men. 4. 15. 13.

What is the order to vs Baptisme, both for confirmation of our faith, & for a confession before men. Where it is shewed that the graces of God are not enclosett in the Sacrament, so as they be giuen to vs by the vertue therof. 4. 15. 14, 15.

Baptisme is nothing encreased by the worthinesse of him that doth ministre it, nor diminished by his vnworthinesse: against the Donatistes, and our Catabaptistes which require a rebaptising, because wee have beene baptised in the kingdom of the Pope. 4. 15. 16. their arguments are confuted Sect. 17, 18.

Baptisme is a continuall Sacramet of repentance for all our life, so that we neede no other Sacrament of penance. 4. 19. 17.

Of the conjuring of the water, the waxe candell, the Chresme, the blowing, the spittle, and such other triftles added to the simple cerimonie of Christ: and the order of purely ministtring it in the Church is shewed. 4. 15. 19.

It is shewed that to ministre Baptisme pertaineth to the ministers of y Church.

fancie.4.16.20,21.

Bearing of the croffe.

It behoueth that wee deny ourse-llues, that we may beare the croffe, because it is Gods will to exercise all his vnder the croffe, beginning at Christ his first begotten sonne. Which fellowship with Christ doth already giue vs great ground of patience and comfort.3.8.1.

It is for many causes necessary for vs to leade our life vnder a continually croffe: first to beare downe our arrogance and trust of our owne strengthe.
And this remedie eu'n the most holy do neede, as is proued by the example

The name of Bishop in the olde church was given to some one in every feuerall company of ministers, for politike order, and not that they should bear a lordly rule over other.

C. Calling.

Of the effectual or inward calling, which is a pure testimonie of election, and hangeth upon the only free mercy of God. 3. 24. 1, 2.

Against them, which in predestination doe make men a worker with God. Also against them that hang election upon that which followeth election. 3. 24. 3.

The certentie of our election is to be knowne by the word and calling of God, and we ought not to preache into the eternal council of God. 5. 24. 4.

The father hath chosen us only in Christ, in him therefore let us behold the steadfast ground of our election. 5. 24. 5. and so, that thef of also wee may conceiue a pure confidence of perseverance to the end. 3. 1, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9.

VVV 4 Two
Two kinds of calling universally, & specially. 3.24, 8.

It is proved by diverse examples and testimonies of Scripture, that the elect before their Calling do differ nothing from other men, and that it is false which some men do dream, that there is a certain seed of election planted in their hearts even from their nativity. 3.24, 10, 11.

It is shewed at large that as God doth by the effectualnesse of his Calling towards the elect, make perfect the salvation to which he had by his eballall counsell appointed them: so he hath his judgementes against ye reprobates, whereby he putteth his purpose concerning them in execution, and maketh a way for his predestination. 3.24, 12, 13, 14, &c.

Cardinals.

When the name of Cardinals first began, & howe they haue so suddenly started vp to so great honor. 4.7, 30.

Ceremonies.

The olde Ceremonies are taken away, as touching their use only, but not as touching their effect, for wee haue the same effect at this day most evidently and effectually in Christ. And this doth nothing diminish their holinesse, as it is proved. 2.7, 16. & being wveyed by themselves & without Christ, they are worthyly called of Paul handwritings against vs. 2.7, 17.

The ordinances concerning Ceremonies in the Popes lawe, do commande observation for the most part unprofitable, and sometime also foolish although they have a great seeming of wisedome: moreover they oppose confences with their infinite multitude. 4.10, 11, 12, 13.

The popish Ceremonies can not be executed by this colour, that they be ordained for the instruction of the ignorant, as the Ceremonies of the lawe were: because there appeareth in this point a manifest difference between vs & the people before Christ. 4.10, 14.

The popish ceremonies are beleewed to be Sacrifices cleansing sinnes, & destroying eternall life: they are without doctrine, and are snares to catch money. 4.10, 15.

Charitie toward our neighbour.

It is proved, against the Sorbonists, that Charitie is the love of our neighbour & not of our selues. 2.8, 54.

Vnder the name of neighbour is contained every man, be he neuer so much a stranger to vs, & our enemies. 2.8, 55, and therefore the Schoolmen are condemned of ignorance, which of the commaundements of God, not to desire revenge, & to love our enemies, haue made counsels, to the necessary keeping whereof monkes alone do bind their selues: and it is proved, that the old doctors of the Church, yea & Gregoric himselfse, thought otherwise. 2.8, 56, 57.

We haue need of patience, that we be not weary of doing good to other. And we ought not to haue respect to the unworthinesse or other qualities of men which might withdraue vs, but to God which doth commaundeth vs. 3.7, 6.

To the fulfilling of all the partes of Charitie, it is not enough if wee performe all the dutifull deedes of Charitie, but wee must do it with a sincere affection of heart. Wherein the chiefest point is, that wee take upon our selues the person of him whome wee bee to neede our helpe. So shall we avoid disdainfull pride & other corruptions of Charitie. 3.7, 7.

Christ & ye Apostles in rehearsing the summe of the lawe doe sometime leave out the first table: not for that it more availeth to the summe of righte onines to live innocently with men, than than to honour God with Godliness: but because unsainted Charitie is the proofe of true Godliness. 2.8.52,53.

Wheresoever those signes are, we ought not to depart from that fellowship. 4.8.12.

There may some faulte crepe in, either in doctrine or in ministration of Sacraments, for which yet we ought not to cast of the communion of that Church, & much lesse for the imperfection of life and corruptnesse of manners: And herein the Anabaptistes are reproved. 4.1.12,13,14,15,16.

The Church is none otherwise holy, but that it alway hath many faults, & yet it ceaseth not to be the Church, as is proved by testimonies of Scripture and the experience of all ages. 4.1.17,18,19.

See Ministry of the Church.

Churches power as touching Articles of faith.

It is proved by the example of the Apostles and Prophets, and of Christ himselfe, that whatsoever authoritie the Church hath, is properly not giue to men, but to the word, the ministration whereof is committed to them: And therefore it was neuer lawfull for the Church, to teach any other thing, than which she receueth of the Lord 4.8.1,2,3,4,8,9.

Christ hath euuer taught his Church; and yet he hath vied divers manners of teaching according to the diversitie of times, ere the lawe was written, in the time of the lawe and the Prophets, & last of all since that he himselfe was openly shewed in the flesh. 4.8.5,6,7.

And so did Augustine thinke, if he be diligently wedyed. 3.3.12. and this is proved by many places of his writings. 3.3.13. Confession Auricular.
Concerning Confession, the schole divines do fight against the Canonists, affirming that it is not by the commandement of God. A confusion of the argumentes whereupon the first forte doe stande, first because the Lorde in the Gospel did send the Leprous who hee had cleansed to the Priestes: and there is shewed the true meaning of y doing. 3.4.4.

This tyrannous law was not laide vppon Churches before the time of Innocent the third, about three hundred yeares past, and the foolishnesse and barbaroufnes of that ordinance is declared. 3.4.7.

By a similitude is described howe a great part of the world hath hitherto obeyed such illusions. That it is an impossible law, & maketh men hypocrites And the is shewed a most certain rule of confession according to the example of the publicane. 3.4.18.

A confusion of this article, y sins are not forgiven, & that the gate of paradise is shut, &c. vnes there bee first firmly conceived a vow of confessing, where also their objection is confuted y judgement can not bee pronounced till the cause be heard, that is to say, y absolution can not be given till all the sins be rehearsed. 3.4.19.

It is no maruell y we condemne & abolish auricular confession, & our adueraries do falsly affigne go gret profit vnto it, for somuch as on y other side it armeth me to boldnes of finns. 3.4.19.

They do falsly pretend y they haue the power of y keyes, Sith they are not the succesorres of y Apostles, nor haue y holy ghost, for asmuch as they doe daily without consideration looſe those things which the lord hath commanded to be bound, & bind what he hath commanded to be loosed. 3.4.20.

It is proved falsly y they say that the power of the keyes may sometime be vſed without knowledge, forasmuch as by y meane the abolution should be vn-certaine. Where also is spoken of y abolution or condénation which the ministres of the gospel or the Church do pronounce according to the words, & of the certaine thereof. 3.4.21.

The abolution of the Priestes in y papacie is vn-certaine, as well on the be halfe of him y affoileth as of him y off-foleth; but contrariwise it is in the abolution of the Gospell, which hangeth vpon this onely condition, if the sinner seeks his purging in the onely only sacrifice of Christ, and do yelde to the grace offered vnto him. 3. 4. 22.

The Popish Doctors, when they allege for themselves the power of looking given to ye Apostles, do wrongfully wrest to auricular confession those sayings which Christ spake partly of preaching of the Gospel, and partly of excommunication. True Confession.

What kinde of confession is taught us by the worde of God, namely to confess to God the knowe of our hartes and of all our thoughtes. 3. 4. 9.

Out of this secret confession made to God, followeth a voluntarie confession before men, so oft as it is behoefeful for the glory of God or the humbling of our selues. And of this second kinde there was an ordinary vs in the old Church, & is also in the Church at this day. But yet extraordinarily it ought after a speciall manner to bee vsed, whenceuer it shall happen that the people bee guiltie in any generall offence, or to be plagued with any calamitie. Of the profite of such confession. 3. 4. 10, 11.

Of two other sortes of private confession: of which the first is vsed for our owne cause, when we require comfort of our brethren, because the feeling of sins doth vex and trouble vs; in which case we must chiefly referre to our pastors: and this remedy is warely & moderately to be vsed, that no bondage be brought in. The other sorte is to appease and reconcile our neigbour, if he bee in any thing offended by our fault, vnder which kinde is conteined their Confession which have sinned so farre as to the offence of the whole Church. 3. 4. 12, 13.

Of Counsels.

We must keepe a meane in honou-ring of Counsels, that we take nothing away from Christ, and our doctrine for the most part is confirmed by auncient Counsels. 4. 9. 1.

By the Scripture the Counsels have no authoritie vnlesse they bee assembled in the name of Christ: and what that is. 4. 9. 2.

It is false which the Papists affirme: that truth remaineth not in the Church vnlesse it bee among the pastors, and that the Church it selfe is not vnlesse it remaine to be seen in general Counsels. 4. 9. 3. 4. 5. 6. 7.

For the fame purpose it is rehearsed that GOD ended his worke, not in a moment, but in six dayes: and likewiife the order is set forth, namly that Adam was not created til God had furnifhed the world with al plentie of good things. 1. 14. 2. 22.

It is proved by the Scriptures that y knowledge of God which appeareth in the workmanship of the worlde can not bee alone bring vs into the right way. 1. 15. 13. and yet are we rightful fully without all excuse. Sect. 14.

Although the beholding of heauen and earth and the consideration of the ordering of thinges pertaining to men, doe move vs to worshippe God, yet all these thinges passed away without profit, eu'n from the wiftest Philosophers. 1. 5. 10.

Herupon came the infinite number of gods, and the contrarieties of opinion among the feets of Philosophers concerning God. 1. 5. 11.

The substance of God is incomprehenfible: but in his worke, by engraving certain points of his glory therein he hath after a certaine maner presented himselfe to be seene. 1. 5. 1.

The wisdom of God is testified, not only by those thinges which philosophers & learned men do find by speculation in heauen and earth, but also which common men do perceive by the onely helpe of their eyes. 1. 5. 2.

That wee may with true faith conceive so much as behoueth vs to know concerning God, it is good to leane the the consideration of the works of God, that is to say, of the Creation of all things, ought to be applied to two principal ends: first, that we do not with unthankful neglecting or forgetfulness pass over his virtues which he presented apparently to bee seen in his creatures. 4.4.21. Secondly, we may learn to apply them to ourselves, whereby we may stir up our selves to the true, invocacy, praise, and love of him. 2.14.22.

Death of Christ.

Although Christ hath by the whole course of his obedience, that is to say, by his whole life and all the parts thereof, redeemed vs, yet Scripture to set forth more plainly the manner of our saluation, dolh ascribe the fame as peculiar & proper to the death of Christ. In the which the voluntary yielding of Christ hath the first place, which yet was so voluntarie as hee gane over his owne affection not without stirr. Also his condemnation is to be considered: Wherein two things are to be noted, namely that Christ was reputed among the wicked, and yet that his innocency was oftentimes testified even by the judges owne mouth. 2.1.5.

The manner of his Death is to be marked, yet is to say, the accursed crosse. And it is declared by many testimonies of Esay & the Apostles, that this behaued so to be, that the curse wich was dew to vs being cast vpó him and so overcome and taken away, we should be delivered. And this was figuratively represented in the sacrificies of Moses bye, which at the last was performed in Christ the original truth of all figures. 2.1.6.

Both in the Death and burial of Christ a double benefit is set before vs, that is to say, deliverance from Death wherunto we were in bondage and the mortifying of our flesh. 2.1.6.

Descending of Christ to hell.

The Descending of Christ to Hell conteinieth the mysterie of a greate thing, and is of no small importance to the effect of our redemption. Diverse expositions of this article are rehearsed and confurced. 2.16.8.9.

A true, godly, holy and comfortable exposition thereof out of the word of

of God, which is also confirmed by the testimonies of the old doctors, & Christ did not only suffer a bodily death, but also did feel the rigor of God's vengeance, whereby he might both appease his wrath and satisfy his just judgment: and therefore it behooved that he should, as it were, hand to hand wrestle with the power of hel and with the horror of everlasting death, yet was God nor at any time either his enemy, or angrie with him. But hee did suffer the grievousness of Gods seueritie, in respect that hee being striken and beaten with the hand of God, did feel all the tokens of Gods wrath and punishment. 2.16.10.11.

A confutation of certaine wicked and unlearned men, which at this day doe find fault with this exposition crying out that the sonne of God hath wrong done to him, and that hee is charged with desparation, whiche is contrary to faith. Therefore it is proued against the with manifest testimonies, that these two things do very well stand together, that Christ feared, was troubled in spirit, was afraid, was tempted in every point as we are, and yet he is without sinne. 2.16.12.

Deueller.

Those things that the scripture teacheth concerning deuils, tend commonly to this end, we should be carefull to beware of their deceits, & furnish our selves with those weapons which may be able to beat backe the most mightie enemies. 1.14.13.

That we should be the more stirred vp to doe so, it sheweth vs that there is not one or two deuils, but great armies of deuils spirits, that make war against vs: & in what sense it sometime speakest of the diuils in the singular number. 1.14.14

This ought to enflame vs to a continuall war with the diuell, for that he is every where called enemie to God and vs. 1.14.15.

The deuill is naturally wicked, a murderer, a lyer, and forger of all malitiousnes. 1.14.15. But this enemie of nature is not by creation, but by corruption 1.14.16.

It is curious to enquire of his cause, manner, time & fashion of the fall of the deuill Angels, forasmuch as the scripture leaueth it vnspoken. 1.14.16.

This the deuill hath of himselfe and of his owne naughtiness, desirously and purposely to strive against God, but he can do and performe nothing vnlesse God be willing & grant it. 1.14.17.

God so tempereth this governor, that he giueth Satan no reigne over the soules of the faithfull, forasmuch as in the end they ever obtayne the victorie, although in some particular doinges they bee wounded and beaten downe, but he one lyeth the wickeled to him to governe, and to see his power upon their soules and bodies. 1.14.18.

A confutation of them which say that Deuilles are nothing else but euill affections or perturbations: and it is proued by testimonies of scripture, that they are mindes or Spirits endued with sense and understanding. 1.14.19.

Discipline.

Discipline is a thing most necessary in the Church. 4.12.1.

Of private admonishings, which is the first foundation of the discipline of the Church. 4.12.2.

Of the Ecclesiastical Senate, that is to say, the seniores or elders, which together with the bishops have the oversight of manners. 4.13.8.

Princes as well as the common people ought to bee subiect to the Discipline of the Church, & so was it wont to be in the requereth a full & settled assurednesse: & hereunto are to be referred all those titles of commendation wherewith holy Ghost setteth forth the authoritie of the word of God.3.2.15.

Many do so conceive the mercy of God, that they receive verie little comfort thereof, because they doubt whether he will be mercifull to themselves or no; but there is a farre other feeling of the abundant store of Faith, the chiefest ground whereof is that wee do not thinke the promises to bee true without our felues onely, but rather by inwardly embracing them we may make them our owne: Hereupon is gathered, who may truly be called faithfull.3.2.15,16.

Though the faithfull in reknowledging the goodnesse of God toward them are not onely oftentimes tempted with vnquietnesse, but also are sometime shaken with most grievous terrors: yet this withstandeth not but that faith bringeth assurednesse with it, because howsoever they bee troubled, yet they never fall & depart from sure affiance which they have conceived of the mercie of God, but striving with their owne weaknesses they alway get the upper hand at last; which is prooved by many examples, in Dauid.3.2.17.

A description of the battell of the flesh & the spirite within a faithfull soule.3.2.18.

The assurednesse of Gods good will.3.2.18.

A confutation of the most pestilent subtle reasoning of certaine halfe-papistes, which although they confess that so oft as we looke vpon Christ, we finde plentfull matter to hope well, yet will needes haue vs to wauer and dout in consideration of our owne unworthinesse. And it is prooved that wee ought neuerchelse to looke for salured salvation, forasmuch as Christ by a certaine maruells comuion doth daily growe together more & more into one bodie, with vs.3.2.24.

So soone as wee have any one drop of faith we begin to behold God mercifull vnto vs, although a farre off in deede, yet with so assured sight, as wee knowe we are not deciued: Both these points are prooved by testimonies of Paul.3.2.19,20.

It is shewed by examples, howe Faith armeth and fortifieth it selfe with the worde of God, to beare the violent assaults of tentations, & how the godly minde neuer suffereth the affiance of Gods mercie to bee plucked away from it, although it be affaiiled with many remnantes of unbeliefe and distrust.3.2.21.

In the good wil of God, which faith is said to haue respect vnto, although faith doe chiefly looke vnto the assured expectation of eternall life, yet there are also contained promises of this present life and a perfect suretie of all good things, but the same such as may be gathered of the worde: both these points are confirmed by testimonies of Scripture.3.2.28.

Faith,although it embrace the worde of God in every point, that is to say, in the commandements also and in the prohibitions and threatenings, yet hath her foundation and proper marke whereunto it is directed, in the free promise of mercie; and for this reason the Gospell is called the worde of faith, and is set as contrary to the lawe.3.2.29.

Yet doe we not by this distinction receiue faith in funder as Pygius shamfully cavilleth.3.2.30.

Faith doth no lese neede the worde of God, than the fruit doth neede the loyally rootes of the tree; and with the word must be ibyned a consideration of
of the power of God, without which mens cares will either not willingly hear the word, or not esteeme it worthily. His power is to be considered, in that that it is effectually, that is to say, by the works of God, & by his benefits either particular or auncient, and such as hee hath bestowed uppon the whole Church. 3.2.31.

The faithful oftentimes so behaue themselves, that some errors are mingled with their faith, & they seeme to passe the bounds of the word, but yet so faith hath alway the upper hand: This is proued by the examples of Sara & R checca, whom in the crooked turnings of their minde, God did by a secret bridle hold fast in the obedience of his word. 3.2.31.

By reason of our blindnes & stiffe-neckednes, the worde suffieth not to make vs haue faith, vnlesse the spirit of God do enlighten our minde, and strengthen our heart with his power: & the same spirit is not only the beginner of our faith, but also doeth increase it by degrees. 3.2.33.

Although we be in the most parte of men a most strange doctrine, that no man can beleue in Chri$t, but he to whom it is giuen, yet, it is proued to bee most true by reasons, testimonies of Scripture, & examples. 3.2.34.

Therefore faith is called the Spirit of Faith, the worke and good pleasure of God: and it is a singular gift, which hie giuen by singular privilege to whom he will, as it is proued by notable sentences taken out of Augustin 3.2.35.

It is not enough that the minde be enlightened with understanding of the worde, vnlesse also the assurednes of the worde be poured into the verie heart, both which things the Spirit worketh, which is therefore called the scale, the pledge, & the spirit of promise. 3.2.36.

Although faith bee tossed with divers doutings, yet it alway at the last escapeth out of the gulshe of tentations and receiueth most sweete quietnes. 3.2.37.

A confutation of the damnable doctrine of the Scholemen, which saie we can none otherwise determine of the grace of God toward vs, than by morall conieecture. 3.2.38.

They are proued to bee miserably blinde, in saying that it is rashnes for vs to conceiue an vndoubted knowledge of the will of God: A good comparison of them and Paul in this point of doctrine. 3.2.39.

A confutation of their trifling shift, that although we may take vpon vs to judge of the grace of God according to the present state of righteousnes, yet the knoledge of percuting to vs end abideth in suspense. 3.2.40.

It is proued that the definition of faith taught in this chapter, Sect. 7. agree with the Apothes definition, Heb. cap. 11. And the error of y scholemen, that charitie is before faith and hope, is confuted by the testimonie of Bernard. 3.2.41.

Hope is alway engendred of faith, & is the undeuided companion of faith, so that whosoever lacketh hope, is proued alfo to have no faith. Also faith is nourished & strengthened by hope, & how necessarie are the helps of hope to stablith faith, which is failed with so many sortes of tentations. 3.2.42.

By reaon of this conyoyning and alliance of faith & hope, the scripture doth many times vs those two words without difference, and sometime joyneth them together. A confutation of the error of Peter Lombarde, which maketh two foundations of faith, that Fear.

The faithfull are oftentimes troubled with Fear & distrust by reason of the feeling of their owne weaknesses.3. 2. 17.

Another kinde of Fear conceiued in a godly heart, either by examples of Gods vengeance against the wicked, or by consideration of his owne misery: Such fearce is so much not contrary to faith, yet the faithfull are much exhorted to have it. Neither is it any maruell, if there be in a faithfull soule both fearce & faith, fis on yet other side in yet wicked there are both dullneglicence & carefullness.3. 2. 22. 23.
The fearce of God proceedeth our of a double feeling, namely when wee honor God as our father, & fearce him as our Lord: Neither is it any maruell if one minde haue both those affections.3. 2. 26.

This fearce differeth from the fearce of the vnfaithfull, which they commonly call a servile fearce.3. 2. 27.

Of forsaking of our felues.
The first beginning of framing our life after the rule set forth in the law, is to consider that wee are not at our own libertie, but hallowed & dedicate to God. And therefore wee ought to forsake our felues, & our owne reason (which as the Philosophers thinke, ought alone to be obeyed) to the ende that we may be governed by y words & Spiritue of the Lord.3. 7. 1.

Also that wee ought not to secke those things that are our owne, but those things that are according to the will of the Lorde, & so to use to advaunce his glorie. And that this is the forsaking of our selues, without the which there is a world of vices enclosed in the soule of man, and if there be any seeming of vertue at all, the same is corrupted with wicked desire of glory.3. 7. 2.
The forsaking or mortifying of our selues, is partly in respect of men, & partly, yea, & chiefly in respect of God. Toward other men, the scripture commandeth vs to do two things; namely to preferre them in honour before our selues, & with vnstained truth to employ our selues wholly to procure their commodities. How yet first of these points is to be performed, is taught in the 3. 7. 4. & also how the Scripture lcedeth vs by the hande to the second point is shewed in the 3. 7. 5.

See certaine things pertainning to this purpose.3. 20. 43.

Free will.
Man was endued with Free will in the first estate of his creation. 1. 15. 8, which he lost by his fall. Of this the Phi-Philosophers were ignorant, & fo all such as follow them, giving free will to man, are utterly deceived.

The pliablennesse or weake power of freewill, which was in the first man, doth not excuse his fall.

It is as well for our profit, as for the glory of God, to acknowledge all our strength to bee but a staffe made of a reed, yea, but a smoke. In the meantime we must beware, that while wee take all vprightnesse from man, we do not therefore take occasion of slothfulnesse. But rather wee ought thereby to be stirred vp to feeke in God all the goodnes whereof wee our felues are voide. The defenders of freewill do rather throwe it downe headlong than stablish it.

The Philosophers determine three powers of the soule, Understanding, Sense, & Will or Appetite: and they thinke that the reason of mans understanding sufficeth for his good governance: that will is by sense mov'd to euill, so that it doth hardly yeld to reason, and sometyme is diuersely drawn from the one to the other, but yet that it hath a free election and cannot be stop'd, that it may follow reason her guide in all things: finally that vertues & vices are in our powers.

The Ecclesiastical writers, although they acknowledged the foundnesse of understanding, & the freedom of will to have beene fore wounded by sinne, yet have spoken too much philosophically of this matter. The old writers did it for this purpose, first because they were loth to teache a thing that should be an absurditie in the common judgement of men, & also specially lest they should give a newe occasion of slothfulnesse to the flesh being alreadie to much dul to goodnes, as appeareth by many sayings of Chrysostome & Hierome. The Greeke doctors about all other, & especially Chrysostome, do exceede measure in aduancing free-will. But all the old writers generally, except Augustine, doe so varie & waver in this point of doctrine, I therre can almost no certeintie be gathered of their writings. They which came after the, felone after another to worske & worse. The definitions of freewill out of Origen, Augustin, Bernard, Anseim, Peter Lombard, & Thomas.

In what things they do commonly giue freewill to man, & of the three sorts of mans will.

Also of the common distinction of the three sorts of libertie.

Whether man be wholly depruied of power to do good, or whether hee haue yet some power though it be weake: where it is spoken of the common distinction of grace working & grace working together, & what is miste in the same distinction.

Forasmuch as it cannot otherwife be said that man hath freewill, but because he doth cuill of his owne will, and not by compulsion, it had beene very good for the church if this word freewill had never beene vsed, which had raised vp men to a damnable fruit of the selues. The old writers also do oft declare what they meane by this worde, specially Augustine, out of which there are many places alleaged, where hee weakeneth & mocketh the strength thereof: both when he calleth it Bond-will, & when he expoundeth the thing itselfe as it is at large.

Although the old Ecclesiastical writers do sometime too much aduance freewill, and haue spoken doutfully & diuersely in matter: yet it appeareth by very many of their sayings, they little or nothing esteeming mans power, gave the whole praise of all goodnes to the holy Ghost. Many such sen-

The power of mans will is not to be weyed by the success of things, but by the choice of judgement & the affection of will. 2.4.8.

It is proved against the defenders of freewill that sinne is of necessity, & yet notwithstanding ought to be imputed: also that it is voluntarie, and yet cannot be avoided. 2.5.1.

A solution of another objection of theirs, when they say that unless both virtues & vices proceed of Free election of will, it were no reason that man should either bee punished or rewarded. 2.5.2.

Also another objection, where they say that if this were not the power of our will, to choose good or evil, then of necessity either all men should be good, or all men evil. 2.5.3.

Against the same men also it is proved that exhortations, admonitions & rebukings are not in vain, although it be not in the power of the sinner to obey: and there is shewed what effect the same doe work both in the wicked & in the faithful. 2.5.4.5.

It is not to be gathered by the commandments and lawe of God, that man hath freewill & strength to performe them, for God doth not only command what ought to bee done, but also promises grace to obey. 2.5.6,7,9.

This is proved as well in the commandments which require the first conversion to God, as also in those which speak simply of the observing of the lawe, and those which command men to continue in the received grace of God. For the same God which requireth those things, doth thee the conversion of a sinner, holiness of life, steadfastness of continuance, are his free gifts, and the praise thereof is not to be parted betweene God & man. 2.5.8,9,11.

The conditionall promises, as, if ye wil, if ye heare, and such like, do not prove that there is in man a free power of willing or hearing: yet it is proved that God doth not mocke men in so bargaining with them. Also what is the use of such protestations, both toward the godly & toward the ungodly. 2.5.10.

The reprochings, wherein God faith to his people that they were the cause that they received not all kinds of good things at his hande, doe not prove that it was mans power to escape the evils wherewith they were afflicted. And there is spoken of the use of such reprochings as well towards them, as towards the conformable that are converted to repentance. Also where as the Scripture doth sometime giue to vs the office of doing, it doeth so for no other reason but to awaken thy slothfulness of the flesh. 2.5.11.

The saying of Moses, The commandement is nere to thee, in thy mouth & in thy heart &c. maketh nothing for the defenders of freewill, forasmuch as he there speketh not of the bare commandements, but of the evangelical promises of the law. 1.5.12.

No more do those places make for them, where it is saide that the Lorde looketh and watcheth to see what me will do. 2.5.13.

Also those places where good works are called ours, and we are said to do that which is holy and pleasing to the Lord. And here it is shewed that the only spirit of God worketh all good motions in vs, but yet not as in stocks. 2.5.14,15.

the grace of God do abuse, to establish Freewill.2.5.16,17,18,19.

Gospell.

Christ, although hee were known to the Jewes in time of the law, was yet shewed in deed only by the Gospell: and the holy fathers tasted of his grace, which is now offered to vs with full abundance, they saw the day of Christ albeit with a dim light, the glory whereof now shineth in the Gospell, without any veil between vs and it.2.9.1,2.

In the same place also is shewed, that the Gospell is properly & specially called the publishing of the grace given in Christ, and not the promises that are written by the Prophets concerning the remission of sinnes. Against the doctrine of Serucettus, which taketh away the promises vnder this pretence that by the faith of his Gospell we have the fulfilling of all the promises, it is proved that though Christ offer to vs in the Gospell a present fulnesse of spiritual good things yet the enjoying thereof is hidden vnder the custodia of hope so long as wee live in this world, and therefore we must yet rest upon the promises.2.9.3.

Idols.

The Scripture setteth out our God by certain titles of addition & marks, notto the entent to binde him to one place or to one people, but to put difference betwene his holy Maiestie and Idols. 2. 8. 15.

An exposition of the first commandement: where is shewed that worshipping, trust, invocation, and thanksgiving, belong wholly to GOD, and no whit thereof may be conveyed any otherwhere without great injury to him to whose eyes all things are open. 2. 8. 16.

An exposition of the second commandement: where is spoken of Idols and Images. 2. 8. 17.

The Scripture, to the entent to bring vs to the true God, doth expressly exclude all the gods of the Gentiles. 1. 10 3. & specially all Idols and Images. 1. 11. 1.

God is seperated from Idols, not only that he alone should have the name of God, but that he alone should be wholly worshipped, & nothing that belongeth to the Godhead should be conueied to any other. 1. 12. 1.

The glory of GOD is corrupted with falle lying, when any forme is appointed to it. 1. 11. 1.

It is proved by testes and reaons, that God generally misliketh all Portrayures & Images that are made to express a figure of him, and this prohibition pertained not to the Jews only. 1. 11. 2.

God did in olden time so shewe his presence by visible signes either to the whole people or to certain chosen mee, that y same signes admonished them of the incomprehensible substance of God. 1. 11. 3.

It is proved even of Iuuenals testimony that the Papists are mad, which defend the Images of God & of Saints with the example of the Cherubs covering the propiciator. 1. 11. 3.

The stufte itselfe & also the workmanship which is done with the hands of men, do sheweth that Images are not Gods. 1. 11. 4.

is confuted by the testimonie of Hierome, Habacuc, Laftantius, Eufebius, Augustine, Varro, and the decree of the Elebertine councell. i. 11. 5, 6, 7.

The Papiftes Portraiture of Images whereby they reprent the holy martyrs and virgins, are paternes of most wicked riorious excelle and vnchantnes. i. 11. 7, 12.

The people that learn more much more by the preaching of the word and miniftration of sacramentes, than by a thousand woodden crosses. i. 11. 7.

The antiquitie and beginning of Idolatrie, for that men thinking God not to be neere them, vnlesse hee did fhwew himfelfe carnally prefent, raised vp signes in which they beleued that hee was carnally confueraunt before their eies, 1. 11. 8.

After fuch an intention by and by followeth the worshipping of Image, like as of God or of any other creature in the Image: both which the lawe of God forbiddeth. i. 11. 8, 9.

Against them, which for defence of abominable Idolatrie, doe pretende that they doe not take the images for Gods, it is prooued that neither the Jewes did thinke their calfe to be God nor the heathen when they made to themselves Images did ever thinke the fame to be God, whom yet no man excufe. i. 11. 19.

The Papiftes are fo perswaded as heathen and the Idolatrous Jewes were; that they worchippe God himfelfe under Images. i. 11. 10. Neither can they escape away with their differtation of service and worchippe. i. 11. 11. 16. & i. 11. 12. 2.

When Idolatry is condemned, graving and painting are not vterly reprooued, but there is required a true and right fite of them both, that God be not counterfaite with bodily shape but only those things which our eyes may be hold. i. 11. 12.

Of Images in the temples of Christians. 4. 9, 9.

Even the Idolaters themfelves in all ages, naturally vnderstood, there is one onely God: but this vnderstanding auayled no further than to make them to be vnexecurable. i. 10. 3.

Idolatrie is an evident prooue that the knowledge of GOD is naturally planted in the mindes of all men. i. 3. 1.

Image of God in man.

What it is, that man was create after the Image of God: And here are confuted the fonde expofitions of Oflander and of other: and here is declared that though the Image of God doe appeare also in the outwarde man and doe extende to the whole excellence wherewith the nature of man paifeth all kindes of living creatures, yet the principall feate thereof is 'in the minde and in the heart', or in the foule and the powers thereof. 1. 15. 3. & 2. 2. 1.

The Image of God at the beginning appeared in Adam, in light of minde, vprightneffe of heart, and the soundneffe of all his partes: which is prooued by the repaying of corrupted nature, wherein Chrift newly fationeth vs after the image of GOD, and by other argumentes. i. 15. 4.

Judicial proceedings in Law.

Of the use of judicial proceedings, Magistrates, and Lawes, among Christians. It is lawful for Christians to sue for their right before a Magistrate, so that the same be done without hurting of picture and of the love of our neighbour. 4. 20. 17. 18.

Desire of revenge, is alway to be avoided, whether it bee a common or conviviall action wherein men strive before a Judge. 4. 20. 19.

Iustification of Faith.

Of the justification of faith, & first of the definition of the name, & of the thing itself. 3. 11.

The article of doctrine concerning the justification of faith is of great importance. 3. 11. 11.

It is shewed by the Scripture what it is to be justified by works, and what it is to bee justified by faith. 3. 11. 2.

A confutation of the error of Osanders, concerning essentiall righteousness, which taketh from men, the earnest feeling of true grace of Christ. 3. 11. 5. 6. 7. &c. to the 13.

A confutation of Osanders invention, that whereas Christ is both God and Man, he was made righteousess to vs in respect of his nature of Godhead and not of his Manhood. 3. 11. 8. 9.

Against them which imagine a righteousness compounded of faith & works, it is proued that when the one is stablished, the other must needs be overthrown. 3. 11. 13. 14. 15. 16. 17. 18.

It is proued by Scripture against the Sophister, that this is a sure principle, that we are justified by faith only. 3. 11. 19. 20.

It is proued by testimonies of scripture y the righteousness of faith is reconciliation with God, which confirmeth only vpon y remission of sins. 3. 11. 21. 22.

By the onely intercesion or meane of the righteousness of Christ, we obtayne to be justified before God. 3. 11. 23.

That we may be throughly perswaded of the free justification, wee must lift vp our minde to the judgement state of God; before which, nothing is acceptable but that which is whole & perfect in every behalf, the dreadfull maisterie whereof is described by many places of scripture. 3. 12. 1. 2.

All godly writers do shew that wher men have to doe with God, the only place of refuge for conscience is in the free mercie of God, excluding all trust of works. And this is proued by testimonies of Augustine and Bernarde. 3. 12. 3.

Two things are to bee observed in free justification: the first, that the Lord keepe saitt his glorie vnminished: which is done wher he alone is acknowledged to bee righteous, for they glory against God which glory in themselves. 3. 13. 1. 2. the seconde, that our consciences may haue quietness in the sight of his judgement. 3. 13. 3. 4. 5.

Layes.

The lawe, that is to say the forme of religion set forth by Mo'ses, was not giuen to holde the olde people still in it, but to nourishe in their hearts the hope of salvation in Christ untill his comming: which is proved by this that Mo'ses repeateth the mention of the councnant: and by the order of the ceremonies appointed as well in sacrifices as in washinges, also by the office of priesthood. 6 y tribe of Leui & y honor of kingdome in Dauid & his poñterite. The law also of y ten cõman-dements was giuen to prepare men to secke Christ Christ. 2. 7. 14. and that is done when it maketh vs vnexcusable beeing on euer-y side confuicted of our sins, to moue vs to seeke for pardon of our guiltines 2. 7. 3. 4.

It is provokd by the Scripture and declared that the observing of the law is impossible 2. 7. 5.

There are three vses and offices of the morall law: The first is, that shewing vs the righteousnesse which onely is acceptable vnto God, it may be as a glasse for vs, wherein wee may beholde our weakenesse, and by it our wickednesse, and finally by them both our accursednes: Neither turneth this to any dishonour of the lawe, but maketh for the glorie of the bountifullnes of God, which both with help of grace aideth vs to doe that which wee are commanded, and by mercie putteth away our offences. Neither yet doth this office altogether ceaseth in the pro bates 7. 6. 7. 8. 9.

The second officie is to restraine the reprobate with feare of punishment least they vnbrideledly committe the wickednesse which inwardly they alway nourishe and love; and also to drawe backe the children of God before their regeneration from outward licentiousnesse 2. 7. 10. 11.

The third offiice concerneth the faithfull: for the lawe although it bee alreadie written with the finger of God in their heartes, yet profisteth the two wayes: For by studying vppon it they are more conformed in the understanding of the will of the Lord, and are stirred vp & strengthened to obedience, that they goe not out of kinde by the sluggisheffes of the flesh 2. 7. 12. 13. For as touching the curse of the Lawe, it is taken away from the faithfull, that it can no more extende it selfe against them in damming & destroying them 2. 7. 14.

By the ten commandements of the Lawe we learne the same things which wee but slenderly taft by instruction of the lawe of nature: First that we owe to god reverence, loue, and feare, that righteousnesse please him, and wickednesse displeaseth him: finally, that examining our life by the rule of the Lawe, wee are vnworthie to bee accompted among the creatures of God, and that our power is vnfortunate, yea no power at all to perfome the lawe. Both these pointes engender in vs humility & abacing of our selues, which teacheth vs to flee to y mercie of God, and to craue the helpe of his grace 2. 8. 1. 2. 3.

For as much as God the Lawmaker is spiritual, that is to say, speaketh as well to the soule as to the bodie, therefore the lawe likewise requireth not only an outward honestie, but also an inwarde and spirituall righteousnesse and a verie angelike purenesse 2. 8. 6. which is proued by Christes owne exposition, when hee confurmed the Pharisees wrong interpretation, which required only a certaine outward observation of the Lawe 2. 8. 7.

There is alway more in the com- maundements and prohibitions of the Lawe, than is expressed. Therefore for the right & true expounding of them, it behoueth to wey what is the entent or end of euerie of them: Then from that which is commanded or forbidden, wee must drawe an argument to the contrarie, that wee may vnderstand, that not onely an cuill is forbidden, but also the good is commanded which is contrary to that cuill 2. 8. 8. 9.

An exposition of the commandments of God: Where is declared that the Lorde is the beginning of the law, to stablishe his owne majestie, vtheth three arguments: First by challenging to himselfe the soueraigne power and right of dominion over vs, he doth as it were by necessitie drawe vs to obey him: secondly hee allureth vs with the sweetnes of the promise of grace: thirdly hee moueth vs to obedience with re-hearseth of the benefit that we have receiued. 2.8.13-14.15.

The Law teacheth not only certain introductions and principles of righteousnes, but the very accomplishment thereof, the expressing of the image of God, and the perfection of holinesse: which law is all obtained in two points that is to say, the loue of God & of our neighbour. 2.8.51.

The Law of Nature. 2.2.22. Lawes Politike.

Neither can Lawes be without the Magistrate, nor the Magistrate without Lawes. A confusion of them which say that a common weale is not well ordered, vntlesse it be governed by the politike lawes of Moses. For this purpose is rehearsed a division of the Lawes of Moses into morall Lawes, ceremonies, and judiciale Lawes, and the end of every one of them being diffuseth, it is proved that it is lawefull for every souerain nation to make politike Lawes, 4.20.14,15. So that they agree with that natural equitie, the reason whereof is set forth in the morall Lawes of Moses. Therefore it is shewed by examples, that they may alter the ordinances of penalties according to the diuerfitie of the countrye, time, and other circumstances. 4.20.16.

Lying.

See Christian Libertie.

An exposition of the ninth commandment, wherewith God forbiddeth falsohood, wherewith we by Lying or backebyring, doe hurt any mans good name, or hinder his commodity. 2.8.47.

We many times sinne against this commandment, although we do not Lye. But in this point there must be a difference wisely made betwene the flaundring which is here condemned, and judiciale accusation or rebuking, which is vned vs upon [desire to bring to amendment. 2.8.48.

Life of a Christian man.

The lawe containeth a rule how to frame a mans Life, and divers places also of the Scripture do here and there declare it, and not without an orderly maner of teaching, although not so exquiste and curious as the Philosophers do.3.6.1.

Herein the Scripture doeth two things: it stirreth vs vp to the loue of righteousnesse & teacheth a rule how to followe the same. The first point it worketh by divers argumentes & reasons. 3.6.2, and herein the Scripture layeth much better foundations, than can be founde in all the booke of the Philosophers. 3.6.3.

Against them that pretend a knowledge of Christ, when their life & manners re semble not the doctrine of Christ. 3.6.4.

Though perfection were to be wished in all me, yet we must also acknowledge for christians y most part of men which haue not yet proceeded so farre.
The Table.

We must alway endeavor to forward, and not despare for the smallness of our profiting. 3. 6. 5.

Out of a place of Paul these are gathered to be the parts of a well framed life: consideration of the grace of God, forsaking of wickedness and of worldly lustes, soberness, righteousness, godliness (which signifies true holiness) and the blessed hope of immortalitie. 3. 7. 3.

Life present, and the hope thereof.

The Scripture teacheth the best way how to vie the goods of this life. 3. 10. 4. 5.

Two faults must be avoided: that we do neither bind our confessions with too much rigorousnes nor give loose reigns to the intemperance of men. 3. 10. 1. 3.

God both in clothing and in foode provideth not onely for our necessitie, but also for our delight. 3. 10. 2.

It is most necessarie that every one of us in all the doings of his life do take upon his vocation, that we attempt nothing rashly or with doubfull conscience. 3. 10. 6.

God disdaineth not to provide also for the necessities of our earthly body, and in what sense wee ask of him our daily bread. 3. 20. 44.

Life to come.

God doth by divers mysteries teach vs the contempt of this present life, that wee may earnestly desire Life to come. 3. 9. 12. 4.

Such a contempt of this life is required of vs, y wee neither hate it nor be unthankfull to God, of whose clemency it is a testimony to the faithful. 3. 9. 3.

An admonition to them which are holden with too much fear of death, that Christians ought rather to desire that day which shall make an ende of their continual miseries, and fit them with true joy. 3. 9. 5. 6.

Of the incomprehensible excellency of the eternall felicitie (which is the ende of the resurrection) the taste of the sweetenesse whereof we ought heere continually to take, but yet to avoid curiosity wherupon do arise trifling and noysome questions, yea and hurtful speculations. And there shalbe an equal measure of glory to all the children of God in heaven. 3. 25. 10. 11.

In which place also is an answer to the questions which some men doe make concerning the state of the children of God after the resurrection.

In what sense eternall Life is sometime called a reward of works. 3. 18. 2. 4.

Magistrates

The office of Magistrates is not only holy and lawfull before God, but also the most holy and honorable degree in all the life of men, and this is proved by divers titles wherewith the Scripture doth set it forth, and by the examples of holy men, which have borne civil power. 4. 20. 4.

This consideration is a pricke to godly Magistrates to moue the to the doing of their dutie, and also it is a coftert to ease the hard travailes of their office. 4. 20. 6.

A confusion of them, which sayne that though in the old time under the lawe Kings & Judges ruled over Gods people, yet this servile kind of governement doth not agree with the perfection which Christ hath brought with his gospel. 4. 20. 5. 7.

They err which exclude the Magistrates from the charge of religion, forasmuch as their office extendeth to both the tables of the law: It is proved by Scripture, that they are ordained protectors and defenders as well of the worshipping of GOD as of common peace and honesty, which they can not thorowly performe without the power.
power of the sword. 4.20.9.

A declaration of this question by scripture, howe the magistrates may bee godly, and also drawe their sword, and shed the bloody of men, and it is prooved, that they are so farre from finning in punishing offenders, that this is one of the vertues of a King, and a profe of their godinesse. Here-in the Magistrates must beware of two faultes, namely extreme rigorousnes, & superflitious desire of pitie. 4.20.10.

It is the duty of subjectes towards Magistrates, to thinke honourably of them as of the ministers and deputies of God, forasmuch as concerneth their degree, but not they should esteem the vices of men for vertues. 4.20.12.

It is also their dutie with minds heartily bent to the honoring of the to declare their obedience towards the, whether it bee in following their decrees or in paying of tributes, &c. to pray to God for their saftic & prosperity, to raise not tumults and not to thrust themselves into the office of the Magistrate. 4.20.23.

Euen wicked princes of euill life, and which rule tyrannously (forso- much as pertaineth to publicke obedience) ought to be had in as great ac- currence and honour as wee would giue to the best king that might bee, 4.20.24, 25. because euen they also have the publicke power not without the prouidence and singular power of God. Which is prooved by diuerse testimonies and examples of scripture: and there is shewed with what consideration those subjectes ought to bridle their owne impatience which liue under suche vngodlie and wicked tyrantes. 4.20.26, 27, 28, 29.

It is not lawfull for private men to rise vp against tyrantes, but onely for them which by the lawes of the kings-dome or of the countrie, are the de- fenders of the libertie of the people. 4.20.31.

The Lord by his maruellous good- nesse and prudence, doth sometime raise vp some of his servants to punifh tyrantes, and sometime also hee directly thereunto the rage of wicked men while they intend an other thing. 4.20.30.

In the obedience which is due to the commandements of kings and rulers this is alway to bee excepted, that it drawe vs not away from the ob- bedience of God: Neither is any wrong done to them when we refute to obey them in such things as they command against God: And this is our duty, how great and present peril souer do hang upon such constancie. 4.20.32.

Man.

Man is by knowledge of himselfe not onely moued to seeke God, but also lead as it were by the hande to finde him. 1.1.1.

The creation of man is a notable flewe of the power, wisdome, & good- nesse of God: wherefore Man is by some of the Philosophers called a little world. 1.5.3.

The vnthankfulnes of men,which feeling tokens of the prouidence of God both in their soule and bodie, yet doe not giue GOD prays. 1. 5.4.

Two sortes of knowledge of our felues, y one in our first original estate, the other after Adams fall, and the latter is not to be recived without considering the first. Jeast wee shoule seeme to impute corruption to God the author of nature. 1. 15.1.

The knowledge of himselfe is most necessary for Man, which consisteth in this (as the truth of God pretreibeth), that first considering to what ende he is created, and endued with excellent gifts, giveth, he should hang altogether upon God, of whom he hath all things by gift: then, that weighing his own miserable estate after the fall of Adam, he should truly loth him selfe and conceive anew desire to seeke God, that in him hee may recover these good things, of which he himselfe is found utterly void and emptie. Wherefore we must beware that in this pointe we hearken not to the judgment of the flesh, and to the bookes of Phylosophers, which while they withhold vs in considering only our good things, would carry vs away into a most wicked ignorance of our selues. 2. 1. 1, 2, 3.

Man can never come to the trewe knowledge of himselfe, vnlesse hee haue first beholnde the face of God, that is to say, till hee haue began to knowe and weigh by the word of God what and howe exact is the perfection of his righteousnesse, wisedome, and power, to the which wee ought to bee made of like forme. 1. 1. 3.

Euen the most holy men were stricken with feare and astonishment, when God did extraordinarily shew his presence and glory vnto them. 1. 1. 3.

That whole man is corrupted in both partes of him, (that is to say both in understanding minde, and in heart or will) is prooved by divers titles wherewith the scripture describeth him, specially when it saith that hee is flesh: And there is declared that this worde flesh is not referred only to the sensual part but also to the superiour part of the soule. 2, 3. 1.

That men doe in vaine seek after any good thing in their owne nature, is prooved by Paul, which intertaining of the vniversall kindred of the children of Adam, and not rebuking the corrupted maners of some one age alone, but accusing the perpetuall corruption of nature, taketh from men righteousnesse, that is to say uprightness, & purenesse, and then understanding, & last of all the feare of God. 2, 3, 2.

A corruption of the obiection concerning certaine heathen men, which forasmuch as they were all their life long by the guiding of heathen men, which forasmuch as they were all their life long by the guiding of nature bent to the endeoure of vertue and honestie, doe seeme to warne vs, that we should not esteeme the nature of Man, altogether corrupt. Therefore it is declared that in the vnbeleeuers God doth not inwardly cleanse the corruption of nature wherewith Man is in ecke part defiled, (as he doeth in the elect) but by his providence sometime hee bridleth it in them, that it breake not forth into deedes, and restrayneth it by diverse wayes, so much as he knoweth to be expedient for preferring of the vniversall state of things. 2, 3, 3.

Those vertues which wee readie to haue beene in heathen Men, are not sufficiente proues of the purenesse of nature, forasmuch as their mind was inwardly not upright, seeing corrupted with ambition of some other poision, & not directed with desire to set forth the glory of God: and also forasmuch as those vertues are not the common gifts of nature, but the speciall graces of God, which he diuertly and by a certaine measure giueth to prohphe Men, as oftentimes to kingses, & sometime to private Men. 2, 3, 4.

An exposition of the seventh commandement, wherein the Lord forbiddest fornication & requireth chastitie and cleannesse, which we ought to keepe & preserve both in our mind, and in our eyes, and in the apparell of our bodie, and in our tongue, and in our moderate vse of meate and drinke. 2, 8, 41, 44.
The Table.

Continence is a singular gift of God, which he giveth not to all men, but to some, yea and that sometime for a season: As for them to whom it is not granted, let them alway flee to Marriage, which is ordained by Lord for the remedie of mans necchitie. 8.41.42.43.

Maried persons must beware that they commit nothing vnbeceeming the honestie & temperance of Marriage: Otherwise they seeme to be adulterers of their owne wives, and not husbands.2.8.44.

The papistes doe wrongfully call marriage a sacraiment: And their reasons are confuted.4.19.34. It is proued that the place of Paul, wherwith they feke to cloke themselves, maketh nothing for them.4.19.35.

In the meane they disagree with themselves when they exclude priests from this sacraiment, & do say that it is uncleanesse and desiling of flesh. 4.19.36.

By this false colour of Sacraiment, the Pope with his cleargie haue drawn to thesefles the hearing of caufes of Matrimony, and haue made laws of marriage, which partly are manifestly wicked against God, & partly most vnuit toward men, which laws arc rehearsed.4.19.37.

Mediator Christ.

It behoved that Christ, to the ende that he might performe the office of Mediator, should be made man, forasmuch as God had so ordained, because it was best for vs, Sith none other could bee the meane for restoring of peace betweene God and vs, none other could make vs the children of God, none other could assure vs the inheritance of the heavenly kingdom, none other could for remedie for mans obedience against mans disobedience.2.12.1,2,3.

A consutation of their fantastical conceit, which affirmre that Christ should haue become man, although there had needed no remedie for the redeeming of mankinde. And it is proued by many reasons and textes, that forasmuch as the whole scripture crieth out that hee was cloathed with flesh, to the ende that he might be the redeemer, therefore it is too great rashness to imagine any other cause or purpose.2.12.4.

Neither is it lawfull to searche further concerning Christ, and those that do search further, do with wicked boldnesse runne forward to the faming of a new Christ: And herein Osiander is reproowed, which hath at this time renued this question, and affirmeth that this error is confuted by no testimonie of Scripture.2.12.5.

And the principle is overthrown which he buildeth on, that man was create after y image of God, because hee was formed after the likenesse of Christ to come, that he might resemble him whom the Father had already decreed to clothe with flesh: And there is shewed that the image of god in Adam, was the markes of excellencie wherewith God had garnished him, which doth also shine in the Angels.2.12.6,7.

A solution of other objections or absurdities which the same Osiander seareth: namely, that then Christ was borne & creat after the image of Adam but as it were by chance: & that the Angels shoulde have lacked their head, & men shold have lacked Christ their king.2.12.6,7.

How the two natures do make one person of the mediator in Christ: Which is shewed by a similitude take of the ioyning of the soule and bodie in one man: And then it is proued by diverse places that the scripture doth Y y y. many many times given unto Christ those things which properly belonged to his godhead, and sometime those things which must be referred only to the manhood, and sometime giuen to the one nature that which is proper to the other: which figurative manner of speech is called Communicating of properties, 2. 14. 1, 2, and sometime also giuen to Christ those things which do comprehend both natures together, but doe severally well agree with neither of them. Which last point the most part of the old writers have not sufficiently marked: Yet it is good to be noted, for the disloosing of many doubts, and for a cuyding of the errors of Nestorius and Eutiches. 2. 14. 3, 4.

A confutation of the error of Seruettus, which had put in the flede of the sonne of God, an imagined thing made of the substance of Gods spirit, flesh, & three elements vncreate: His suttletie is disclosed, and there is proved (which thing hee denieth) that Christ was the sonne of God, even before that he was borne in the flesh, because he is that worde begotten of the father before all worldes. 2. 14. 5.

Also it is proved that he is truely & properly the sonne of God in flesh, that is to say in the nature of Man, but yet in respect of his godhead, and not of his flesh, as Seruettus babbleth. 2. 14. 6.

An exposition of certaine places which Seruettus and his disciples do enforce for defence of their error: There is also another caiuation of his disclosed, that Christ before that he appeared in the flesh, is in no place called the sonne of God but under a figure. 2. 14. 7.

Also there is opened the error of all them which doe not acknowledge Christ the sonne of God but in the flesh: And there are briefly rehearsed the grosse suttleties of Seruettus, wherewith he hath bewitched himself and other, overthrowing that which pure faith beleueth concerning the person of the sonne of God: And thereupon is gathered that with the craftie darkes suttleties of that filthie dog, the hope of salvation is ytterly extinguished. 2. 14. 8.

Merit of Christ.

It is truely and properly sayd that Christ merited for vs the grace of god and salvation: Where it is proved that Christ was not onely the instrument or minister of salvation, but also the author and principal doer thereof: And in so laving, the grace of God is not defaced, because the merit of Christ is not set against mercie, but hangeth vpon it. And those things which are Subalterm, fight not as contraries. 2. 17. 1.

The distinction of the Merite of Christ & of the grace of God is proved by many places of Scripture. 2. 17. 2.

There are alleged many testimonies of Scripture, out of which it is certainly and soundly gathered, that Christ by his obedience hath truely purchased & deserved favour for vs with his father. 2. 17. 3, 4, 5.

It is a foolish curiosity to enquire, whether Christ hath deserved any thing for himselfe: and it is rashnes to affirm it. 2. 17. 6.

Merites of Workes.

The boating that are made of the Merites of workes, doe overthrowe as well the praise of God in giving righteousnes, as also the certainite of salvation. 3. 15.

Whosoever first applied the name of Merit to good works in the sight of Gods judgement, he did against the purenes of faith. And though the olde fathers fathers vse that name, yet they so vised it, that they haue in many places shewed that they attribute nothing to workes. 3.15.2.

An exposition of certaine places, wherewith the Sophisters go about to proutie that the name of Merit to-warde God is founde in the Scripture 3.15.4.

It is proued by authoritie of the A-potles & Augustine, that the rewards of righteousnesse doe hang vppon the merie liberalitie of God. 2.5.2.

It is proued that this is a false saying, that Christ Merited for vs onely the first grace, and that afterward we do Merite by our owne workes. 3.15.6,

Pastors are so bound to their Chur-Monkerie.

Monasteries in olde time were the seede plottes of ecclesiasticall orders:
And there is described out of Augustine the forme of the old Monkerie, & how they were wont at y time to get their living with the labour of their hands.
Whereby appeareth that at this day the manner of popish Monkerie is far otherwise. 4.13.8.9.10.

As many as go into Monasteries, do depart from the Church, and they openly affirm that their Monkerie is a forme offecond Baptisme.4.13.14.

The Popish Monkes do in maners much differ from the olde Monkes.4.13.15.

Some things are to be misliked even in the profession of the old Monkerie, and they that were the authors therof brought a perillous example in to the Church 4.13.16.

Monkes with their vowes do consecrate thecclues not to God but to the Deuill.4.13.17.

As all vowes vnlawful & not rightly made, are of no value before God, so they ought to be vowe to vs. 4.13.20.

Therefore they which depart from Monkery to some honest trade of life, are wrongfully accused of faith breaking and perjury.4.13.21.

It is declared by the doctrine and example of Paul who be weak, to whom we must beware that we give no office 3.19.12.

Whereas we are commanded to beware that we Offende not the weake, the same is meant only in thinges indiffrent: Therefore they doe wrongfully abuse this doctrin which say that they heare maffe for the weakes fale.

The orders of Psalmistes, Dorekeepers and Acoluthes, are vaine names among the papistes, forasmuch as they themselues doe not execute the Offices, but some boy, or any layman. 4.19.24.

Of the shewing of the Clergie, and the signification therof by the doctrin of the Papistes.4.19.25:

They doe wrongfullly apply it to Paules example, which shaued his bed: when he tooke a vowe, or to the olde Nazarites.4.19.26.

It is shewed out of Augustin whence it:
it first began. 4.19.27.

Of the three hier orders: and first of Priesthood or sacrificership: where is shewed that the papistes have most wickedly perverted the order appointed by God, and doe wrong to Christ the only & eternal sacrificing priest. 4.19.28.

Of their blowing at the making of popish Priests, and how in that ceremonie they do wrongfully counterfeit Christ: Where is declared, the Lord did many things which he would not have to be examples for vs to follow. 4.19.29.

Original sinne.

A definition and expounding of Original sinne. 4.15.10,11,12.

A true definition of Original and a declaration of the same definition: Wherein is shewed, that not only punishment came from Adam vpon vs, but also that the infection distilled from him remaineth in vs, and how it is the sinne of an other & also our own sinne. Finally, that such infection pierced not onely into the inferior desire, but also into the vrey understanding minde & bottome of the heart, so that there is no part of the soule free from corruption. 2.1.8,9.

A confusion of them that dare charge God with their faultes, because we say that men are naturally faultie: And there is proued, that man is corrupt by natural viciousnesse: (to the ende that no man shoule think it to be gotten by euill custome ) but yet such as proceded not from nature, but is an accidentall qualitie, & not a substantiall propertie from the beginning. 2.1.10,11.

See Swearing.

Patience.

A Part of forfaking of our felues, in respect of God, is contentation of minde and sufferrance: Which we shall persoume, if in seeking the commodite or quietnesse of this present life wee yeeld our selues wholly to the Lorde, and do not desire, hope for, or thinke upon any other meanes of prospering than by his blessing. 3.7.8.

So shal it come to passe that we shall never secke our owne commodites by unlawful meanes or with wronging of our neighbours: also that we shall not burne with unmeasurable desire of richesse or of honors: finally if things prosper well with vs, wee shall yet be holden from pride, & if they happen ill, we shall yet be restraine from impatience. 3.7.9. Which extendeth to all chaunces whereunto our present life is subject, whereof the faithfull doe always acknowledge the hand of God their father, and not fortune, to be the governor. 3.7.10.

The Patience of the faithfull is not such as is without all feeling of sorrow, but such as being vpholden by godly comfort, figheth against the natural feeling of sorrow. Therefore the Patience of the Stoikes is to be rejected: neither is it in itself any fault to weep or scare. 3.8,8,9.

A description of that striving which is engedred in the hearts of the faithfull by the feeling of nature, which feeling cannot be cleane done away, and by the affection of godlinesse where-with that same feeling must bee subdued & tamed. 3.8,10.

There
There is great difference between Philosophical & Christian patience: Forasmuch as philosophers do reach vs to obey because we do so much of necessity: but Christ teacheth it, because it is righteous, and also because it is profitable for vs. 3.8.11.

Pardons.
The so long continuing of pardons declareth in how deep a darkenesse of errors men have been drowned these certain ages past. 3.5.1.

What Pardons are by the papistes doctrine: Whereby is proued they are a dishonoring of the blood of Christ: A comparision of Christ & popish pardons. 3.5.1.

A confutation of the wicked doctrine of pardons, by the notable sayings of Leo bishop of Rome, & of Augustine. And there is shewed that the blood of martyrs is not unlawful, although it have no place in forgiveness of sinnes. 3.5.3.4.

Either the Gospel of God must ly, or pardons must be lying deceits. And there is shewed what seemeth to have beene the beginning of them. 3.5.5.

Penance, the Popish Sacrament.
Of the viage of the olde Church in publicke penance: and of the laying on of handes at reconciliation. Also how in process of time the laying on of hands was vsed in private absolutions. 4.19.14.

The diuerse opinions of the scholmen howe penance is a Sacrament: And there is shewed that the definition of a Sacrament doth not agree with it. 4.19.15.16.

It is a lyce, and a deceitfull error which they have invented concerning the Sacrament of Penance: and it is a wicked and blaspemous title wherewith they have garnished it, a second boorde after shipwracke from Baptisme. 4.19.17.

There is a difference to bee made betwenee policie, and the inwarde government of the soule. Their doctrin is to be reiectted which go about to overthrowe policie as a thing not necessary for Christians, or as a thing which overthroweth the spirituall libertie of the soule. Also those flatterers are to be reiectted, which do giue too much vnto it, & do set it in comparision against the authoritie of God. 4.20.1.2.

Policie is the gift of God, which bringeth great commodities to mankind, & no small helpe to the defence of the state of religion. Policike government hath three partes, the magistrat, the Lawes & the people. 4.20.3.

Of three forms of Civile government, Aristocracie the governmet of the best chosen men, Democratic the government of the people, Monarchie the government of one: it can not simply bee determined which of these is the best: yet it commeth to passe by the fault of men, that it is fater & more tolerable to have many to governe than one to regne. But all these forms are of God, & diuitely disposed by him, therefore it is the duty of private men to obey, & not to make innovation of states after their owne will. 4.20.8.

Of the immunitie that the Romish clergy take to themselves, which was altogether unknown to the Bishops of the old Church.

In matters of Faith, the judgement in the old time pertained to the Church and not to Princes, although sometimes Princes endeavoured to assume authority in ecclesiastical matters, but the same was done to preserve and not to trouble the order of the church.

Of the authority of the sword usurped by the bishops in the papacy, and how they have by little and little from small beginnings grown to so great a measure.

It is proved that the supremacy of the sea of Rome is not by the institution of Christ. Neither had Peter any principality in the Church among the Apostles.

Neither is it profitable nor may be, that one man should bear rule over the whole Church.

Although Peter had a supremacy in the Church, yet it followed not that the seat of that supremacy ought to be at Rome.

It is proved by many arguments that Peter was not bishop of Rome.

The supremacy of the sea of Rome is not according to the vise of the old Church.

Of the beginning & encreasing of the Romish papacy, until it advanced it selfe to that height, whereby both the liberty of the Church is oppressed and all moderate government hath been overthrown.

In the most part of the councils, the Bishop of Rome or his legates had not the chief place, but some other of the bishops had it at the Council of Chalcedon; but yet without order.

Of the title of supremacy and other titles of pride which the Pope boasteth himself, and when and how they crept in.

Gregory pronounceth that the title of universal bishop was denied by the devil, and published by the crier of Antichrist.

It is proved by the vise of the old Church, yea is false which the bishop of Rome boasteth, that he hath jurisdiction over all Churches.

Whether ye consider the ordering of bishops, or ecclesiastical admonitions and censures, or summoning of Councils, or authoritie of higher appeals, etc.

The old Bishops of Rome in the most part of their Epistles did ambitiously set forth the glory of their sea, but those Epistles at that time had no credite: Also they did thrust in certain forged things as though they had been written in the old time by holy men.

Although in the time of Gregory the authority of the bishop of Rome was greatly increased: yet it is proved by his writings that it was then farre from unbridled dominion & tyranny.

There was strife for the supremacy between the bishop of Constantinople and the bishop of Rome. vntill Phocas granted to Boniface the third, that Rome should be the head of all Churches: which afterwardes Pipine confirmed, when hee gaine to the sea of Rome jurisdiction over the Churches of Fraunce.

From thenceforth the tyranny of the sea of Rome increased more and more, partly by ignorance & partly by negligence of Bishops: which destruction of the whole order of the Church Bernarde lamenteth and layeth.

Prayer.

True faith can not be idle from calling upon God. 3. 20. 1.

How necessary & how many ways profitable is the exercise of Praying. 3. 20. 2. although the Lorde will not cease while we craue not, nor needeth any to put him in mind, Sect. 3.

The first rule of well framing our Prayer is that we be no otherwise distanced in heart and mind then becommeth them that enter into talk with God. 3. 20. 45.

The second rule is, that in praying we alwaye seele our owne needes, and that earnestly considering y we want all these things that we aske, wee ioyne with our Prayer an earnest and secret desire to obteine. 3. 20. 6.

We ought to pray at all times, and in the greatest quietnes of our estates, the onely remembrance of our sinne ought to be no small provocation to move vs to that exercize. 3. 20. 7.

The third rule of praying well, is y we forake all confidence of our owne glory, least if we presumpiously take any thing, be it never so little, into our souls, wee with our vaine pride, fall downe from his face. 3. 20. 8.

The beginning of Praying well, is the obtaining of pardons, with an humble and plain confession of offence. 3. 20. 9.

In what sense the Priaters of certain holy men are to be taken, in which to entreate GOD, they seem to allege their owne righteousness. 3. 20. 10.

The fourth rule of Praying well, is that being so ouerthrown and beat downe with true humilitie, wee be nevertheless encouraged to Pray with an auflured hope to obteine: So in our Prayers, faith & repentance do meete together. 3. 20. 11.

Of the certaintie of faith, whereby the faithfull do determine that God is favourable vnto them: And how necessarly the same is in Prayer: Neither is that certaintie weakened, when it is joined with acknowledging of our owne misery. 3. 20. 12.

Predestination.

It is proved that the doctrine of Predestination is a doctrine of most sweet fruit. There are rehearsed three principal profits thereof, and they are admonished which being mowed with a certain curious doe beyond the bounds of Scripture brake into the secrets of the wisdom of God, 5.1,1,2, and also they which would have all mention of Predestination to be buried, Sect. 3.4.

What is Predestination, and what is the foreknowledge of God, and how the one of them is wrongfully set after the other. The example of Predestination in all the offspring of Abraham in respect of other nations, is confirmed by many testimonies of Scripture 3.21,5.

Also there is shewed a special Predestination, whereby even among the Children themselves hee hath made difference between some and other some, Sect. 6,7.

A confirmation of the doctrine of Predestination taken out of testimonies of Scripture, 3.22.

Of them that make a foreknowledge of Merits the cause of Predestination Also of other men, that blame God because he eleceth some and paffeth other, 3.22,1.

God as well in election as in reprobation hath no respect of works neither passed nor to come, but his good pleasure is the cause of both, 3.22,2,3, 4,5,6,7,11.

This is proved by Augustine, Sect. 8, and the trifling little deude of Thomas to his contrary is confuted, Sect. 9.

The promises of salvation are not directed to all, but peculiarly to the elect, 3.22,10.

These two sayings do not disagree, that God by his outward preaching of the word calleth many, & yet he giveth the gift of faith to fewe, 3.22,10.

Against them which to confess election, that yet they deny any to be reprobate of God, 3.23,1.

Against them which say that this doctrine ouerthroweth all exhortations to godly life, it is proved by Augustine, that preaching hath his course, and yet the knowledge of Predestination is not hindered thereby, 3.23,13.

In this point of doctrine we must so temper our maner of teaching, that so farre as we may, we winde reasonably, 3.23,14.

Whereas some obey the preaching of the worde of God, and other some despise it, or bee more blinded and hardened thereby, although this come to passe by their owne malice and unthankfulness, yet wee must therewith also know, that this diversity hangeth
An exposition of certaine places wherein God saith to denie that it commeth to passe by his ordinance that the wicked perish, but inasmuch as against his will they wilfully bring destruction vpon themselves. And there is shewed that those places make nothing against the doctrine of Predestination. 3, 24, 15, 16.

The vnuersalneffe of the promises of salvation, maketh nothing against the doctrine of Predestination of the reprobate: and yet not without cause are they framed vnuersallly. 3, 24, 15.

Here also are confuted certain objections of the which denies this point of doctrine.

Priesthoode, Kingdom, and Propheticall office of Christ.

That we may knowe to what ende Christ was sent of his father, and what he brought vnto vs, three things are chiefly to be considered in him, his Propheticall office, his kingdom, and his Priesthood: and therefore is giuen to him the title of Christ (or Messias which signifieth annointed) although hee be specially so called in respect of his kingdom. Albeit that God alway gaine prophets and teachers to his Church, yet it is proued that all the Godly looked for full light of understanding, onely at the comming of Messias: and that hee when hee appeared was annointed a Prophet, not onely for himselfe, but also for all his body. 2, 15, 12.

As touching his kingdom, first we must note the spiritual nature thereof, whereupon also is gathered the eternall continuance of it, which is of two sorts: the one persciveth to the whole body of the Church, the other is proper to every member: both sortes are declared and plainly set forth by testimonies of scripture. 2, 15, 3.

It is declared that the profit of the kingdom of Christ cannot otherwise be perceived of vs, but when we knowledge it to be spirituall: and the same profit consisteth in two things, namely that it inieth vs with all good things necessarie to eternall salvation, secondly it fortifieth vs with strength and vertue against the devil and all his assaults: And so Christ reigneth for vs rather than for himselfe, whereupon wee are rightfully called Christians: Where it is said that at the last day hee shall yeeld vp his kingdom to God and his father, and such like sayings the same maketh nothing against the eternitie of his kingdom. 2, 15, 4, 5.

As touching his Priesthoode, that the efficacie and profit thereof may come to vs, it is shewed that wee must beginne at the death of Christ. Here-upon it followeth that hee is an everlastinge intercessor, by whose mediation wee obtayne favour, whereby ariseth to Godly confidences both boldnesse to pray, & quietnesse: finally that hee is so a priest, that hee ioy-neth vs in the fellowship of so great an honour, to the ende that the Sacrifices of prayers and praishe which came from vs, may bee acceptable to God. 2, 15, 6.

Promises.

Notwithstanding all the Promises are concluded in Christ: forasmuch as every promise is a testifying of the lawe of God vnto vs, and none of vs is beloved of God without Christ. Neither was Naaman the Syrié, Cornelius the captain, nor the Eunuch to whom Philip was caried, without knowledge of Christ, although they had but a very small tast of him, and faith in some part vnoexpressed. 3.2. 32.

The Lord, to the end to fill our hearts with love of righteousness & hatred of wickedness, was not content to set forth bare commandments only, but addeth promises of blessings both of this present life & of eternall blessedness, & also threatenings both of present miseries, and of eternall death: The threatenings declare the great pureness of GOD: the promises doe shew his great love to righteousness, and his wonderful goodness towards men. 2.8.4.

Providence of God.

Prophane men, by fleshly understanding doe confesse God the creator, otherwise than wee doe by faith: forasmuch as faith teacheth that hee is also the governor of all things not by a certaine vnierfall motion, but by a singular providence which extendeth eu'n to ye least sparrow. 1.16.1.

They which give any thing to fortune, doe burie the Providence of God, by whose secret counsel all successes are governed. 1.16.2.

Things without life, although each of them have their proprietie naturally planted in them, yet doe not put forth their force, but so farre as they bee directed by the present hande of God: which is prooued by the sone, before which hee would both light to bee, and the earth to abounde with all kinde of good things: which also we reade to have stande still by the space of two dayes, and gone backe two de-

The Table.

Chaunce and Fortune are wordes of heathen men: also the saying of Augustine, that hee repented that he had vsed the name of fortune. Yet those things may bee saide to happen by fortune in respect of vs, which being considered in their nature, or wieded according to our knowledge, doe seeme so, although in the secrete counsell of God they be necessarie: Also al things that are to come, may bee saide to bee happening, inasmuch as they bee vncertaine to vs. i.16.8.9.

What things are to be considered, that the doctrine of the Providence of God may bee referred to a right hand, that wee haue the profit thereof: and where the causes of those things that happen, appeare not vnto vs, we must beware that wee doe not thinke, that things are rolled by the way of fortune: but wee must so reverence his secrete judgementes, that we esteeme his will the most just cause of all things 1.17.1.

Against certaine dogges, which at this day doe barke against the Providence of God, it is proued by the Scripture that whereas God hath so revealed his will in the lawe and the gospel that he illuminateth the minds of them that bee his with the spirite of understanding, to perceiue the mysteries therin contained, which otherwise are incomprehensible, yet the order of governing the worldes is called a bottomlesse depth, because whe we knowe not the causes thereof, yet we ought reverently to honour it 1.17.2.

Such prophane men doe foolishly comber them selues, when they alledge that if the doctrine of the Providence of God be true, then the praiers of the faithfull in which they aske any thing for time to come are vayne, no counsell is to bee taken for things to come, and then men which doe any thing against the lawe of God, doe not sinne: These daungerous errors they shall avoide, which in considering the Providence of God, shall frame them selues to true modestie 1.17.3.

As concerning things to come, it is proued that the scripture doth well joyn the aduisementes of men with the Providence of God: because wee are not hindered by his eternall decrees, but that vnder his will, we may both foresee for our selues, and order our owne thinges: For the knowledge of consulting and taking heede, are inspired into men by the Lorde, whereby wee may serve his Providence, in the preferring of our owne life. 1.17.4.

In all successes of time past the will of God doeth governe: and yet the doers of wicked deeds are not excused, because they are accused by their owne conscience, and doe not obey the wil of God, but their owne lust: They are indeede the instruments of God, providence, but so, that they finde the whole euill in themselves, and in God is founde nothing but a lawfull use of their euillnesse. 1.17.5 and 1.18.4.

Where also the same thing is shewed in the election of king Ierobeam, the tenne tribes forsaking the house of David, the slaughtuer of the sonnes of Achab, and in the betraying of the son of God.

A Godly and holy meditation of the Providence of God, which is taught by the rule of godlinesse: first that being certainly perswaded that no thing happeneth by fortune, wee alwaye cast our eyes to God the cheefe cause of all thinges: then that wee doubte not that his singular Providence watcheth for vs, whether wee haue to doe with men as well euill as good, or with his other creatures: To which vs wee must applye the promises of God in the the scripture which testifie the same, the examples whereof are rehearsed. 1.17.6.

Wee must also adjoyne those testimonies of scripture which teach that all men are under the power of God, whether wee neede to get their good wils or restraine the malice of our enemies: which last point God worketh diversely ways, sometime by taking away their wit, sometime when he granteth them wit, he frayeth them that they dare not goe about that which they have conceiued: and sometime also when he suffereth them to goe about it, he breaketh their enterprizes. Upon which knowledge necessarily followeth a thankfulness of minds in so prosperous successe of things. 1.17.7.

In aduersitie when we are hurte by men, is required patience and quiet moderation of mind: Which is shewed in the examples of Iofeph being afflicted of his brethren, Job persecuted of the Chaldees, and David rayled upon of Semei. If wee happen to bee distressed with any misery without the worke of men, this selfe fame doctrine is the best remedie against impatience because the scripture testifieth, ye cuen aduersitie also do come from God.1.17.8.

A Godly man principally regarding the providence of God, yet will not leave inferior causes unmarked. Therefore if hee haue receiued a benefit of any man, he will hardly know and confess he him selfe to bee bounde vnto him. If hee haue taken harme or done harms to any other by his negligence or want of heed, he will impune it vnto himselfe, much lesse will he excuse his owne offences. In things to come chiefly he will haue consideration of inferior causes, but yet so that in determining he will not be carried away with his owne wit, but committed himselfe to the wisdome of God; neither shall his trust so stay vpon outward helpe, that hee will carelesse rest vpon them if hee haue them, not be difmaied for feare if he want them. 1.17.9.

A large description of the inestimable felicite of a godly mind which resteth vpon the Providence of God: & on the other side the miserable carefullnes wherewith we must needs be distressed when the weakness of this earthly corage maketh vs subiect to so manie diseases, with our life and safety is besieged with infinite dangers at home, abroad, vpon the land, in the water, by men, & by deuils.1.17.10.11.

Those places of scripture where it is said that God repented him: make nothing against the doctrine of Providence, forasmuch as therein (like as also when he is sayd to be angry) the scripture applying it selfe to our capaceous describeth him, not such as he is, but such as wee feele him to bee, Like wife, where hee spared the Ninivites, to whom he had threatened destruction within fourtie dayes: whereas hee prolonged the life of Ezechias for many yeares, to whom he had declared preserf death: because such threatenings containe an vnexpressed condition. Which is well proued by a like example in king Abimelech, which was rebuked for Abrahams wife.1.17.12.13.14.

A confutation of them, which co-venting to get a praife of modestie, goe about to maintaine a righteousnesse of God with a lying defence, when they say: ye those things which Satan & al the reprobate do naughtily, are done by ye sufferance of God, & not by his providence and will. And it is proued by the affliction of Job, the deceiving of Achab, the killing of Christ, the incestuous adulterie of Absolon, and many other examples, that men do work nothing thing but that which he hath alreadie decreed with himselfe, and doeth appoint so to be by his secret direction. I.18.1.

And this hath place, not onely in outward doings, but also in secret motions. For it is prooved by the hardening of Pharaoh and other testimonies that God worketh cuen in the minds also and hearts of the wicked. Neither maketh it any thing to the contrary, that oftentimes the worke of Satan is vfed therein: For God worketh nevertheless, but after his owne manner, yielding a just revenge, I.18.2, and therefore God is not thy author of sinnes, Sect. 4.

They are proued guilty of intollerable pride, which refuse this doctrine vnder pretence of Modestie. A confutation of their obstacle whè they say, that if nothing happen but with thy will of God, then hath he in himselfe two contrary wills, forasmuch as hee doeth appoint those things to be done by his secret counsel, which he hath openly forbidden by his lawe. And there is shewed, that God doeth not disagree with himselfe, y the will of God is not chaunged, that he doth not faine himself to nil y which he willeth: but whereas there is in God, but one simple will, that thing to vs appeareth divers, because for the weaknesses of our understandings, we conceive not how he diversely both willeth not, and willeth one selfe thing to be done. Finally it is prooved by Augustine, that man sometime with good will willeth something which God willeth not: & sometime willeth y thing with evil will, which God willeth with good will. I.18.3.

Those things which in the life of men are compted chaunces, as well of prosperitie as adversitie are so many tokens of the heauenly providence, I.5.7. And ought to awaken vs to the hope of the life to come, Sect. 9.

Howe God worketh in the hearts of them that bee his, and Satan in thee that be his, but yet so, that they are not excused, 2.4.1.

God worketh also in the wicked, & cuen in the same worke wherein Satan worketh, and yet is not God so laid to bee the author of sinne, neither is Satan or the wicked excused, but there is difference betweene the one and the other, both in the end and manner of doing, 2.4.2.5.

The olde writers oftentimes referred these things, not to the working of God, but to his foreknowledge or sufferance, leaving the wicked shoulder thereby take occasion to speake irrationally of the worke of God. But the Scripture, when it saith that God blindeth, hardeneth, and fuch like, declareth somewhat more than a sufferance: although God doth worketh two ways in the reprobate, namely by forsaking them, and taking his spirit from them, and also by delivering them to Satan the minister of his wrath, 2.4.3.4.

The ministrerie of Satan is vfed to stirre forward the reprobate, when the Lord by his providence directs them hither or thither. 2.4.5.6.

Purgatorio.

Wee ought not to winke at the doctrine of Purgatorio, forasmuch as it is a damnable invention of Satan which maketh voide the cross of Christ, &c. 3.5.6.

wrongfully writ to the confirmation of their Purgatorio. 3.5.7.8.9.

An answer was to the objection of the papistes, that it hath beene an ancient vlag of the Church that prayers should be made for the deade. Where is shewed that this was done by them in the olde time, without the worde of God, by a certaine wrongfull imitation, leaft Christians if they were slow in having care of funerals & the dead, should seeme worse than heathen me. Yet therein was a great difference betweene this flippine of these old men; and the obstinate error of the papists.

R.

Redeemer Christ.

The knowledge of God the Creator is unprofitable vnto vs, vnlesse faith do also follow setting him forth in Christ a father and Redeemer to vs, and this doctrine from the beginning of the worlde in all ages hath beene holden among the Children of God. 2.6.1.

It is proued by diuerse arguments and testimonies of scripture, that the happie stature of the Church hath alway beene grounded vpon the person of Christ. For both the first adoption of the chosen people, and the preserving of the Church, the deliuernce of them in perils, and the restoring after their disippation, did alway hang vpon the grace of the mediator. And the hope of all the Godly was never repose with any other where than in Christ. 2.6.2.3.4.

It is to be diligently considered how Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, that we may finde in him all things necessarie for vs; sith (as Bernard of faith) hee is to vs light, meate, oyle, salt, &c. 2.1.6.1.

An exposition how we should say that God was our enimie vntill he was reconciled to vs by Christ, whereas to give Christ to vs, and to prevent vs with mercie, were signes of the love wherewith hee before embraced vs. And there is shewed that the scripture veth this speach and such other, to apply it selfe to our capacitie: and yet it doth not the same falsely. And all this is proued by the authority of scripture and the testimonie of Augustine. 2.16. 2.3.

Regeneration.

Against certain Anabaptists which invent a phrenetike intemperance instead of spiritual Regeneration, namely that the Children of GOD being nowe restored into the state of innocencie, ought no more to bee careful to bridle the lust of the flesh, but one ly to followe the spirit for their guide. 3.3.14.

The rest pertaining to this matter, see in the title of Repentance.

Religion.

Of remission of sinnes: and in what sense sinnes are called dettes, and how we are sayde to forgive other he hath offended against vs. 3. 20. 45.

Of the distinction of fault & peine, where where with most strong testimonies of Scripture, the doting error of the papists is confuted, namely \u2018when the fault is forgiven yet God retaineth the paine, \nwhich remaineth to be redeemed with satisfactions; 3. 4. 29, 30. and there also is shewed \ny they can not escape away with their distinction between everlasting paine & temporal paines.

Of certaine places of Scripture wherewith they go about to confirm their error: where is declared \u2018there are two kindes of the judgement of God: the one of vengeance, the other of chastisement, which are wisely to be distinguished alandra. 3. 4. 31.

The first of these, that is to saye, vengeance, the faithfull haue alway earnestly prayed to escape: the other that is to saye chastisement, they have received with quiet minde, because it hath a testimonie of love. And where it is saide that God is angrie with his Saints, the same is not meant of his purpose or affection to punish them, but is spoken of the vehement feeling of sorowe wherewith they are striken so soone as they bear any parte of his feueritie: and this is profitable for them. On the other side the reprobate, when they are striken with the scourges of God, do already after a certaine manner beginne to feel the peines of his judgement. All which things are provoked by testimonies of the Scripture, and also by the expositions of Chrysoftome & Augustine. 3. 4. 32, 33.

God when hee had forgiv en the adulterie of David, chastised him both for common example, and also to humble him: and for this reason hee daily makesthe faithfull (to whom he is mercifull) subject to the common miseries of this life. 3. 4. 35.

This doctrine is proved by testimonies of Scripture against the Notnians and certaine of the Anabaptites, which faie that the people of God are by baptism reGENERATE INTO AN ANGELIKE LIFE, AND AFTERWARDE THERE REMAINETH NO PARDON FOR THEM THAT FALL. 4. 1. 23, 24, 25, 26, 27.

A confutation of them which make a voluntary tranfgression of the lawe a sinne unpardonable. 4. 1. 28.

Repentance

Repentance commeth of faith, & goeth not before it. 3. 3. 1.

A confutation of their reasons which thinke otherwise, but hereby is not signified any space of time wherein faith breedeth repentance: but only is shewed that no man can earnestly endeavour himselfe to RePENTANCE UNLEFFE HE KNOWE HIMSELFE TO BEE GODS. Of that error of certaine Anabaptists, Iesuits, & such other which appoint to their noices, certaine days for repentance 3. 3. 2.

Certaine learned men long before this time, made two partes of Repentance, namely Mortification, which they commonly call contri-tion, & Viutiication, which they wrong fully expounde to be comfort by the feeling of the mercie of God, whereas it rather signifies a desire to lute wel. 3. 3. 3.

They do also make two other sorts of Repentance, the one of the lawe, the other of the Gospel: where also are shewed examples of either sorte out of the Scripture. 3. 3. 4.

Zzz. A true
A true definition of Repentance taken out of the Scripture, and how Repentance though it cannot be secured, yet ought to be distinguished from faith. 3.3.5.

A plainer declaration of the definition of Repentance: where first is shewed that there is requiring a turning to God, that is to say, an alteration, not only in outward works, but also in the soul itself; 3.3.6. then that it proceedeth of an earnest fear of God: Where also is entreated of the sorrowfulness that is according to God 3.3.7.

Thirdly, that saying is declared of Repentance consisting of two parts, the mortification of the flesh, & the quickening of the Spirit. 3.3.8.

Both these things do we obtain by partaking of Christ, the first by communicating of his death, the second of his resurrection. Therefore Repentance is a newe forming of the image of God in us, and a restoring into the righteousness of God by the benefit of Christ: And this restoring is not fulfilled in vs in one moment. 3.3.9.

But there remaineth in all saints, while they live in mortal body, matter of strife with their flesh, and so thought all the ecclesiastical writers that have beene of sounde judgement: & specially Augustine, which calleth this nourishment of euill and disease of lustful in the elect, weakenesse, and sometime sinne: And in deed it is sinne 3.3.10.

This is confirmed by the testimony of Paul, and by the summe of the commandements. Whereas it is said that God cleanseth his church from all sinne, the same is spoken rather of the gultiness of sinne than of matter of sinne itselfe, which causeth not to dwell in ye regenerate (but causeth to reign in them) though it be not imputed. 3.3.11.

A declaration of the seven causes or effects, or partes or affections of Repentance, which Paul reheareth: Thofe be studie or carefullnesse, exercising displeasure, fear, desire, zeal, revenge. Whereunto also is added out of Paul, and declared by an excellent admonition of Bernard, that in such revenge we must keep a measure. 3.3.15.

The fruits of Repentance are, devotion towards God, charitie toward men, holines and purines in all our life:but all these ought to begin at the inward affection of the heart, from whence outward testimonies may afterward spring forth: Where also is spoken of certaine outward exercises of Repentance, which the old writers seeming to enforce somewhat too much. 3.3.16.

Turning of the heart to God, is the chiefe point of Repentance: sackcloth and ashes, weeping and fasting, were vied of them in the olde time before Christ, as tokens of publick repentance: of which the two laft may yet be vied to appease the wrath of God in the miserable times of the Church. 3.3.17.

The name of Repentance or penance is unproperly drawn from his natural sense to this outerward profession. Publick confession is not alway necessary in sinnes: but private confession to God may never be omitted, wherein wee ought to confess, not only those things that we have lately committed, but the displeasure of our grievous fall ought also to call vs back to remembrance of our past offences. Of speciall penance which is required of haynous offenders and certain others: and of the ordinary penance which ye childre of God, even the

...the most perfect, ought to devise all their life long. 3.3.18.

God doth therefore freely justify the that be his, that he may also with the sanctification of his spirit restore them into true righteousnes: therefore John, Christ & the Apostles preached repentance and remission of sins. The effect of which saying is declared, 3.3.19.

Christians ought to exercise themselves in a continual repentance, and he hath most profited, that hath learned most to mistake himself. 3.3.20.

Repentance is a singular gift of God, vnto which he calleth all men, which he giueth to all them whom he purposeth to save, and which the Apostle pronounceth that it shall never be giuen to wilful apostates whose wickednesse is unpardonable, y is to say, such as haue sinned against the holy ghost 3.5.1.

Although sinned repentance doth not please God, yet he sometime for a sea of sparing hypocrites which make a shew of some conversion, which he doth not for their fakes, but for common example, that we may learn more charily to give our minde to vnfained repentance: And this is proued by the examples of Achab, Esau, and the Israelites. 3.3.25.

The Schoole sophisters do foully er in those definitions which they make of repentance, and no better doe they divide it, when they part it into contrition of heart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke: Where is entreated of certaine questions which they move: whereupon is easely gatherd, that they babble of things which they knowe not, when they speake of repentance. 3.4.1.

When they require those three things in repentance, they must neded bind their unarto forgiveness of sinnes: And if it be so, the are we most miserable, forasmuch as we can never have quietnes of conscience: which is proued first in that contrition of heart such as they require. 3.4.2.

There is great difference betwene the doctrine of such contrition, & that contrition which the Scripture requireth of sinners, y they truly hunger and thirst for the mercy of God. 3.4.3.

In what sense old wryters thought that solemn penance, which was then required for haynous offences, might no more be effected than done beyond baptism. 4.1.29.

Reason of Man.

Mans vnderstanding is not so to be condemned of perpetual blindness, that wee leave it no whit of understanding in any kind of thing: but it hath some knowledge inasmuch as he is naturally carried with desire to search out truth. And yet this desire by and by falleth into vanitie, because the minde of man can not for dulness, keep the right way to search out truth, and for the most part he discerneth not of what things it is behouefull for him to secke the true knowledge. 2.1.2.

As touching earthly things, it is proued by examples, y the minde of man hath a sharp vnderstanding, as first of all in civill policy and in governance of households, sith every man vnderstandeth that the fellowships of men must be held together by lawes, and comprehended in minde the principles of those lawes. 2.2.13.

Also in liberal arts & handy crafts for learning whereof, yea for amplifying and garnishing of the same, there is in man a certaine aptness, although some bee more apt than other. But the light of Reason and understanding in men is too a general good qualitie in all men, that yet it is a free gift gift of Gods liberalitie towards euerie man: which thing God sheweth when he createth some Idiotes and dull witted: also when he maketh one man to excell in sharpe inuention, an other in judgement, an other in quicknesse of mind, againe when he powreth into men singuler motions according to euery mans calling, and according to the time & matter that is to bee done 2.2.14,17.

The inuention of artes, the orderly teaching or deepe & excellent knowlidge thereof, which appeareth to haue bin in the old Lawyers, Philosophers, Phisitians, being prophanne men, doe declare vaultovs that the mind of men howe much souer it bee fallen from his first vprightnesse, is yet still garnished with excellent gifts of God. 2.2.15.

They are the gifts of the holy Ghost which the Lorde giveth to whom hee will, euuen to the vngodye for the publike benefit of mankind. Therfore we ought to vse them although they bee communicate vaultovs by the ministery of the wicked, to whom they are but transitory and fleeting, because they are without the founde foundation of truth. 2.2.16.

It is shewed in the first two pointes, that mans Reason feeth nothing that concerneth the kingdome of God and heavenly matters, which are contained in three things, that is to say, to knowe God, his fatherly fauour toward vs, and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his law. 2.2.18. and to that purpose are alleaged diverse testimonies of Scripture. Sect. 19, 20, 21. In the third it seemeth that he hath some more understanding than in the other, forasmuch as man is instructed by the lawe of nature to a right rule of life. But such knowledge is vnperfect in the vndeceeeuers, and awayleth to no other ende, but to make them vneexcutable: neither doe they by that natural light, see the truthe in euerie thing. And here is expounded the sayng of Themistius, that vnderstanding in the vniuerfall definition is seldom deceived, but the error is when it descendeth to particular causes, and there is shewed, that mans vniuersall judgement in the difference of good and euill, is not alway found and vpright. For it attaineth not thosc which are the chiefe things in the first table of the lawe, namely of confidence in God, &c. In the second table, although it haue some more vnderstanding, yet it appeareth that it sometyme errith, as when it judgeth that it is an absurditie to suffer too imperious government, and not to revenge wronges: also it knoweth not the deuice of desire in the whole obseruation of the lawe. 2.2.22, 23, 24.

It is proued by the Scripture, that the sharpenesse of our reason in all the partes of our life, is nothing before the Lord: and our mindes do read the grace of enlightning, not onely at the beginning, or for one day, but at euery moment. 2.2.25.

Resurrection of Christ.

Without the Resurrection of Christ allis vnperfecte that we beleue concerning his crose, Death, and Burial. Thereof wee receive three profites: forasmuch as it hath both purchas'd vs rightouesnesse before God, and is to vs a pledge of the Resurrection to come, and by his life, we are now regenerate into newenes of life. 2.16.13.

Last Resurrection.

Forasmuch as the faithful, do chiefly need hope & patience, least they should faint in the course of their calling: they hath soundly profited in the Gospel, which is accustomed to a continual meditation of the blessed Resurrection 3, 25, 1.

The article concerning the last Resurrection, containeth a doctrine of great weight, grace & hard to believe: for the overcoming of which hardness by faith, the Scripture giveth two helps, the example of Christ, and the almighty of God. 3. 25, 3, 4.

A confusion of the Sadduces, which deny the Resurrection: and of the Millenarians, which appoint the kingdom of Christ to endure but a thousand years. 3, 25, 5.

A confusion of their error, which imagine that souls at the last day shall not receive againe the bodies wherewith they are now clothed, but shall have newe and other bodies. 3, 25, 7, 8.

Of the manner of the last Resurrection. 3, 25, 8.

By what reason the last Resurrection, which is a singular benefit of Christ, is common also to the wicked and the accursed of God. 3, 25, 9.

Sabbath.

A n exposition of the fourth commandment, the end thereof, & the three causes whereupon we must note that it consisteth. 2, 8, 28.

The first cause is a shadowing of spiritual rest; that is to say, of our sanctification: This is proved by diverse places to have beene the chiefest thing in the Sabbath. 2, 8, 29.

Why the Lord appointed the seventh day. 2, 8, 30, 31.

This part, forasmuch as it was recommissioned, is taken away by the death of Christ, 2, 8, 31.

The two later causes, that is to say, that there should be certaine days appointed for assemblies in Church, and that there should be given to servants a rest from their labor, doe serve for all ages. 2, 8, 32.

Of days of meeting in the church to heare the worde of God & common prayers, where is spoken of observing of the Sundry 2, 8, 32, 33, and of superstition to be avoided in this behalf. 2, 8, 34.

Sacraments.

What is a Sacrament. 4, 14, 1.

For what reason the old writers did this word in that sense. 4, 14, 2, 13.

A Sacrament is never without a promise going before, which the Lord saileth by that means, wherein hee provereth help for our ignorance & dulness, & also for our weaknesses. 4, 14, 3, 5, 6, 12.

A Sacrament consisteth of word & the outward signe: But the Sacramentall worde is to be taken otherwise than the papists thinke. 4, 14, 4.

Sacramentes ceaseth not to become testimonies of the grace of God, although they bee giuen also to the wicked, which doe gather to themselfes more grievous damnation thereby. 4, 14, 7.

Our faith is so confirmed by sacraments, that yet it hangeth upon inward effectual working of the Spirit, 4, 14, 9, 10, 11, and no virtue is to bee put in the creatures. Sect. 12.

What the name of a sacrifice properly signifieth: and of the divers kindes of sacrifices under the lawe: which may be deuided into two forts, whereof some may be called of thanksgiving, and other some propitiatorie or of cleansing.4.18.13.

Our only propitiatorie sacrifice, is the death of Christ. Sacrifices of thanksgiving we hace many, as all the dutie of charitable, prayers, prayers, giving of thankes, and all that we do to the worshipp of God. 4. 18. 13,16,17.

This manner of Sacrificing is daily vsed in the church, & in the supper of the Lord: And thereupon all Christians are sacrificing Priests.

Satisfaction Papistical.

Of satisfaction, which they make the thirde thing in penance, of retaining the paine, the fault being forgiven, and such lykes, which all are overthrown, by setting against the free forgiuenes of sinnes, by the name of Christ.3.4.25.

A contravert of the blasphemous error of the Schoolemen, that forgiuenes of sinnes, and reconciliation is once done in baptism, but after baptism, we must rise againe by satisfaction.3.4.26.

By such error, Christ is spoyled of his honor, & the peace of consciences is troubled, forasmuch as they can never certainely determine, that their sinnes are forgiuen them.3.4.27.
In Daniell, when Nabuchadnezzar is commanded to redeem his sinnes with righteousness, that same redeeming is referred to God, rather than to men, and the cause of pardon is not there set forth, but rather the manner of true conversion. The same is to be sayd of certaine other places of Scripture. 3. 4. 36.

An exposition of that place in the Gospell, Many sinnes are forgiven her, because she hath loved much: Meaning that love is not the cause, but the proofe of forgiveness. 3. 4. 37.

The olde writers of the church did not speake of satisfactions in such sense as the papists do: for they understood that the penitent do make Satisfaction to the Church, and not to God. 3. 4. 38. 39.

Scripture, the Word of God, and the authoritie thereof.

Men do not sufficiently know God the creator, and discern him from fained goddes, by consideration of his creatures, vnlesse they be also holpen by the light of his Worde. And God hath kept this order in teaching them that be his, not only since that hee chose the Jewes for his peculiar people, but also from the beginning, even towards Adam, Noe, and the other fathers. 1. 5.

Either by oracles, or by visions, or by the ministery of other the fathers had the word which they were certainly perswaded to be the worde of God, whereby they knew the true GOD the creator and governor of all things: which Worde afterwaide, that hee might provide for men in all ages, he causeth to be written in the law and the Prophets, as it were in publicke registers, 1. 6. 2. 3. in which place also is proved by testimonies of Scripture, that the doctrine of the Worde, must bee joynd to the consideration of creatures, lest we conceive a fickle knowledge of God.

Of them which say that the authoritie of Scripture hangeth vpon the judgement of the church, & in how ill case we should be, if it were so. 1. 7. 1.

This error is well confuted by the place of Paul in the second chapter to the Ephesians, where he sayth that the faithfull are builded vpon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets. 1. 7. 2.

In what sense Augustine sayth, that he would not haue beleued the Gospell, vnlesse the authoritie of scripture did movie him: which place they doe caufelie vnto the confirmation of their error. 1. 7. 3.

Although there be many other argumets, which do prove, yea, do enforce the wicked to confess, that the Scripture came from God: yet by none other meanes, than by the secrete testimonies of the holy Ghost, our hearts are truly perswaded that it is GOD, which speaketh in the lawe, in the prophets, and in the gospell: And this is proued by many places of Esay. 1. 7. 4. 5.

The orderly disposition of the wisdom of God, the doctrine sauing nothing of earthlineffe, the goodly acquaintance of all the partes amongtheselues, and specially that balanciue of contemptible worde, uttering the hie mysteries of the heavenly kingdom, are secondely helpe to establish the credit of Scripture. 1. 8. 1. 2. 11.

Against them that vnder the colour of Nature doe deny the providence and governance of God vterring itselfe in the marvellous and in a maner innumerable powers of soule

Concerning the immortalitie of the soule, in a maner none of the Philosophers hath certainly spoken: but they doe binde the power thereof to this present life, whereas the scripture doth so giue to it the chief rule in governance of life, that it also stirreth vp man to the worshipping of God. Also of the divinitie of soules, and of the division of the powers of the soule according to the Philosophers. i. 15. 6.

Supper of the Lorde.

Of the bread and wine the signes in the holy supper: and it is declared by his owne words at his Supper, why the Lorde willed that wee should vse them. 4. 17. 1.

Wee gather a great fruit of confidence & sweetnesse out of this sacrament, which testifieth that wee are grown together into one body with Christ, that whatsoever is his, we may lawfully call it ours. 4. 17. 2.

This is declared by the wordes of the Supper. 4. 17. 3.
The chief office of the sacraments is not to give unto vs the body of Christ, without any hier consideration, but rather to feale that promise wherein he testified that his flesh is verily meat.

The supper maketh not Christ then first to beginne to be the bread of life, but that we should feel the force of bread. He once gave his flesh for the life of the world, and daily giueth it to them that bee his. Wee must beware that we do not too much abace or advance the signes. The eating of the flesh of Christ is not faith, but rather the effect of faith.

So thought Chrysofomone and Augustine, and in what sense Augustine saide, that in believing we eat the flesh of Christ.

They doe not say enough, which passing over the mention of flesh and blood, doe thinke that we are made partakers onely of the spirit of Christ. The mysterie of the supper is so great, that neither the tongue can express, nor the heart comprehend with thinking the greatnes there of.

Howe farre the perfect communicating of Christ extendeth. Where is declared that Christ, which from beginning was the life giving word of the father, made the flesh, which hee rooke vppon him to be also life giving to vs.

The faithful do truly care of the same flesh howe great distance of places foruer there be betweene them & it.

The mysterie of the Supper consisteth of two things, the bodily signes, and the spiritual truth: Which spiritual truth containeth three things, sgnification, matter, and effect.

Of the transubstantiation of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, which the craftesmen of the court of Rome haue forged. They are without testimonie of antiquity. And in what sense the old writers saide that in the consecration is made a secrete turning. Also the signification of the Supper agreeith not, unless the substance of the outward signes remaineth.

The breade is a sacrament to none but to men to whome the wordes are directed. And here are confuted certain arguments of the teachers of transubstantiation.

Of some men, which though they doe at one word grant that the substance of the signes remaineth, yet placing the body of Christ in bread and under bread, they fall backe into the locall presence, and saie a being every where.

A confutation of their objections.

It is proved that this doctrine is not maintained, neither by testimonies of Augustine, nor by authority of scripture.

A confutation of certaine other of their objections, and cheesesly of this that they lay, that whatsoever wee teach of spirituall eating, is agaynst the true and reall eating: Where also is declared that the body of Christ is in the Supper offered to the infidels, but they receiue it not.

Neither can the saying of Augustine bee drawn to this purpose, that the sacraments are nothing appayred by the infidelicie of men. Which is proved by divers other testimonies of the same man.

The mysterie of the Supper ought to stirre vp to gueeing of thankes, to exercise vs in remembrance of Chrift, to kindle vs to holynesse of life, and chiefly to charitie. 4,17,37,38.

In the papacie the Supper (the true ministration whereof is not without the worde) is turned into a dumme action. And here is spoken of the laying vp of the Sacrament to be extraordina\-rily distributed to sickemen. 4,17,39.

The doctrine of the papistes, wh\-e they goe about to prepare men to the worthinesse of eating the bodie of Chrift, doeth in cruel wife torment conscience: And the deuill could not by any reader way destroy men. Of the best remedie to auoyde this destuction. They erre which in the supper doe require of the faithfull perfor\-mation of faith. 4,17,41,42.

It is proved by authoritie of the Scripture and by the vidence of the olde Church, four hundred yeares before the death of Gregorie, and by many other arguments, that the constitution which take away from lay men the cup of the Lorde, came out of the de\uils workshop. 4,17,47,48,49,50.

Swearing.

An expostion of the third com\-mandement, in which these three things are conteined, that we neither think nor speake any thing of God, nor of his word and honorable mysteries, nor yet of any of his workes, other\-wise than reverently. 2,8,22.

A definition of Swearing: where is declared that it is a kinde of worship\-ping of God: And therefore we must beware that our othes conteine not any dishonour to the name of God, which is done in For\u2019swearing: or any count\-empt of it, which is done in super\-fluous othes, or in which the name of any other than God is v\u2019ed. 2,8,23,24,25.

It is proved by Scripture against the Anabaptistes: that all othes are not forbidden vs, y Chrift in the Gospell changed nothing as touching the rul\-e of Swearing, let forth in the lawe. 2,8,26. Which is proved by his owne example: and not only publike, but also priuate othes are permitted, keeping the moderation which the lawe com\-mandeth. 2,8,27.

Temptations.

Of divers kindes of Temptations: and in what sense it is sayde that God tempteth vs, 3.20.46.

Testament, old, and newe.

Of the likenesse of the olde, & new Testament: Where is declared, that they are all one in substance and matter, but onely do differ in ministration. The likenesse standeth chiefly in three points, 2.10.1,2.

The first point is, that the old Testament did not holde the fathers in earthly felicitation, but had chief respect to the life to come. Which is proved by Paul, which sayth that the promises of the Gosple are containid under it, 2.10.3.

The same also is proved by the law and the Prophetic: First, by confidering the words of the covenant: I am your God, 2.10.7,8.

A conclusion of this point with rehearsing certain testimonies out of the new Testament, Sect. 23.

The second point is that the olde Testament did not stand vpon the merites of men, but vpon the free merice of God. The third point is that the covenant of the fathers with God, did then stand vpon like knowledge of Christ, the mediator, 2.10.4.

Also in signification of Sacraments the Israelites vnder the lawe were equal with the Christian people, 2.10.5,6.

There are foure differences of the olde Testament from the newe, wherunto we may add a fift. The fift is, that although in the olde time also the Lords will was to direct the souls of his people to the heavenly inheritance: Yet to the ende that they might be the better nourisht in the hope thereof, he gaue it them to be beholden, and after a certain manner taistid vnder earthly benefites: But nowe the grace of the life to come, being more clearly receiued by the Gospe, he directeth our minds the straight way to the meditation thereof, leaving the inferior manner of exercising which hee vsed among the Israelites, 2.11.1.

Therefore the olde Church is compared to an heire vnder age, which is governed by Gardians, 2.11.2.

For this reason, the fathers so much esteemed this life, and the blessings thereof, 2.11.3.

The second difference is in figures where-
The first difference is, that the old testament did shew forth the image and shadowe of spiritual good things: The new testament giveth the present truth and perfect body. There is also a reason shewed why the Lord kept this order: And a definition of the olde testament. 2.11.11.12.

In this sense it is sayde, that the Iewes were by the introduction or schooling of the lawe led vnto Christ before that he was deliuere in \( \tilde{y} \) flesh: 2.11.5. which appeared in the most excellent Prophets that were endued with singular grace of the Spirit. Sect 6.

The third difference is, taken out off one and thirtie chapter of Jeremy, and the third chapter of the second Epistle to the Corinthians, that the old testament is literall, and the newe testament is spiritual: the olde bringeth death, the new is the instrument of life 2.11.7,8.

The fourth difference is, that the scripture calleth the olde testament, the testament of bondage, because it engendreth feare in mens minde: but the new is called the Testament of liberty, because it raiseth them vp to confidence and quietie. The three latter difference are comparisons of the law and the Gospel. The first, containeth also the promisses made before the law. The fathers liued vnder the law and the olde testament, \( \tilde{y} \) they stayed not there, but always aspired to the new, yea and embraced a certayne communicateth thereof. 2.11.9,10.

The fifth difference is, that before the comming of Christ, the Lord had seuered one nation, in which he would keepe the covenat of his grace, in the meane time neglecting all other nations. So the calling of the Gentiles is a certayne signe, wherewith the excellencie of the newe testament is set forth above the olde: a thing so incredible, that it seemed yet new to the Apostles themselues, being exercised in reading of the Prophets, and endued with the holy Ghost. 2.11.11,12.

A conclusion of this matter, and an aunfwer to duarye objections of some men, which say that this variety in the Church, this divers maner of teaching, so great change of vfrages and ceremonies, is a great absurdity. Where is declared that the constancy of God appeareth in this chaunging, and he hath done nothing but wisely, righteously, & for mercy, when he governeth his Church, after one sort in childhod and after another sort in riper age, & also when he did keepe cloofe in one people the shewing forth of his grace before the comning of Christ, which afterward he poureth forth vpon all nations. 2.11.13,14.

Theft.

What wee ought to doe, that wee may obey this commandement, is shewed by divers examples according to the diversitie of persons & offices. 2.8.46.

Traditions.

Forasmuch as the Lord, willing to teache a rule of true righteousness, hath drawn all the partes thereof to his owne will, thereby it appeareth, that all the good worke which men define of their own wittes, are nothing worth before him: But the true worshipping standeth vpon obedience only, which is the beginning, mother, and of traditions of men, that is to say, ordinances proceeding from men, concerning the worshipping of God: And of the vngodlinesse and necessitie of them. 4.10.1. 6.

A division of papistical constitutions, where they call Traditions of the Church, into such as conteine ceremonies, and other which are saide to pertaine to discipline. The wickednesse of both forte, because they place the worshippe of God in them, and conscience are bounde with precise necessitie of them. 4.10.9.

For them the commaundement of God is made voide. 4.10.10.

A true marke of mens traditions, which ought to bee rejected of the Church, and of all Godly men. 4.10.16.

A confutation of pretence which some men vs that defende papistic Traditions to be of God, because the Church cannot erre, and is governed by the holy Ghost. 4.10.17.

It is a meere mockerie to say, that the Apostles were authors of the Traditions, wherewith the Church hath heretofore beeene oppressed. 4.10.18, 19. 10.

The example of the Apostles, whiche they commaundde the Gentiles to abstaine from thunges offered vnto Idols, from strangled, and from blood, is salfely alladged to excuse the tyrannie of the Popes lawes. 4.10.21, 22.

The Lords kinegdomes is taken from him, when hee is worshipped with the lawes of mens Traditions: which is prooued by examples and testimonies of scripture, to have alwayes beeene a most hainous offence in the sight of God. 4.10.23, 14.

The inventions of men cannot be defended by the example of Meno-ha, which being a private man offered sacrifice, nor of Samuel, which sacrificed in Ramath, 4.10.25, nor of Christ which willed men to beare the burdens that the Scribes and Pharis- ees did binde together. 4.10.16.

Of holy and profitable ordinances of the Church, and the ende that they tend vnto. 4.10.1.

Of such ordinances of the church as ought to be accounted holy, namely those which serue for commoditie, or doe preferue order and peace in the Church. 4.10.27, 28. 29. Wee must wisely consider, which bee of that fort 4.10.30.

It is the dutie of Christian people, to observe such ordinances: And what errors herein are to bee taken heed of: And howe in the meane time, the libertie of conscientes may still bee preferred safe. 4.10.31, 32.

Warres are lawfull, when Magistrates are driven of necelssitie to take weapon in hande, to execute publike vengeance vpon those that trouble the peace of their dominion, whether they be ciuile or foreigne enemies. 4. 20. 11.

It maketh not to the contrary herof, which many allege, that there is not in the newe Testament any testimonie or example which poueth that Warre is a thing lawfull for Christians. But Magistrates ought to take great heed, that in taking of weapon in hande, they nothing at all followe their owne lustes. As Warre, so garrisons also, leaues and ciuile fortifications are things lawfull for Christians to vse. 4. 20. 12.

Will of God.

Of the secret Will of God, Also of an other Will, wherunto aunswere the Willing obedience. 3. 20. 43. and 3. 24. 1, 7.

Will of Man.

Whether the Will of man be euery part through defiled and corrupted so that it bringeth forth nothing but euill: Or whether it yet retaineth some libertie of choise. Where is declared the common saying taken out of the Philosophers, that all things by naturall disposition couet y which is good. And there is shewed that the libertie of will cannot bee prooued thereby. 2. 2. 26.

The soule hath not onely a weake power but no power at all of it selfe to aspire to goodnesse. And sith y whole man is subiect to the dominion of finne, it is prooued by testimonies of Scripture & of Augustine, that the wil of man is bounde with moste streit bondes. 2. 2. 27.

Man by his fall lost not his will, but the foundnesse of his Will, so that hee cannot moue, much lesse apply himselfe to goodnesse, but is necessarly drawn or led into euill, howbeit not by compulsio but voluntarie. Which is prooued by Augustine and Bernard. A large declaration of the difference betweene compulsion and necessitie. 2. 3. 5.

Sith the Lorde both beginneth & perficeth good in our heartes, sith he worketh in vs to will, that is to say the good will, sith hee createth a newe heart, taketh away the stony heart & giuen a fleshly heart, it followeth, that the Will of man is ytterly corrupted and hath no goodnesse at all. 2. 3. 6.

It is clerely prooued by reasons and diverse testimonies of Scripture, that God worketh good will in them that be his, not only in preparing or turning them from the beginning so as it may afterward do some good of itself. But because it is his only worke that will conceive a love of goodness, that it is inclined to this study thereof, that it is stirred and moved to an endeav'or to follow it, & againe that the choice, studie, and endeav'or doth not faint, but proceed t' effect, finally, that man goeth constantly forwaerd in them and continueth to the ende.

Therefore it is proved by the authoritie of scripture and of Augustin that this which hath bin taught these many ages, that God doth moueth our will, that it is afterwa- rds in our owne choice, to obey or disobey his motion & other like sayings are utterly false.

Also in doings, which of these seules are neither righteous nor unright- eous, and belong rather to the bodily than the spiritual life, the will of man is not free, but by the speciall motion of God is inclined toelemencie, mercie, wrath, feare, and other diverse affections, when it pleaseth him to make way for his prudence, Which is pro- ued by scripture, by daily experience, and by the authoritie of Augustin.

A comparison of the pureness of God with all the righteousnes of men.

All the offspring of Adam being deuised into foure kindes of men, it is proved that they have no holiness or righteousness. First in them which are endued with no knowledge of God, in whom although there doe sometime appeare excellent qualities (which are the gifts of God) yet there is in them nothing pure.

The same is shewed in them which being professed by Sacraments, are Christians only in name, denying God in their deeds. Also in hypocrites which with vain fable colours do hide the wickednesse of their heart.

Finally, it is proved that even the children of God truly regenerated by his Spirit, can not stand by any righteousnes of their owne works before the judgement of God, because they can bring forth no good worke that is not sprinkled with some vncleanenes of the flesh, and therefore damnable. Moreover although they could bring forth any fuch worke, yet one sinne is enough to blot out the remembrance of all former righteousnes.

A confutation of the papistes shifts concerning the righteousnesse of works; and specially of the same horrible monster of worke of supererogation.

When wee entreate of worke, wee must thrust two pretences out of our minde: that wee put no trust in the righteousnesse of our owne worke, and that we ascribe no glory unto them.

The Scripture setteth out and declares four kindes of causes in sta- blishing our saluation: And it is proved that in them all there is no regard of worke.

Where sometimes the saints do bolden themselves with remembrance of their owne innocence & vpright- nesse; how the same is to be taken and how it doth in no wise abate anything from the free righteousnes in Christ.

Where the scripture saith that the good worke of the faithfull do move God to doe them good, the order is there.

Why the Lord in the scripture calleth good works ours, & promiseth reward to them. 3.15.3.

A confutation of the Sophisters invention, concerning mortal works, whereby men be made acceptable to God, before that they bee grafted in Christ. 3.15.6 & 17.4.

Those rewards are given to the works of the faithfull, which the Lord in his law hath promised to the followers of righteousness: but thereof there are three causes to be considered. 3.17.3.

Wee may note in the scripture two acceptances of man w God, of which the latter although it have respect to the good works of the faithfull, yet is also the free mercy of God. 3.17.4 & 5.

When it is said that God doth good to them that love him, here is not rehearsed a cause why he should do them good, but rather the manner of what force they bee by his grace. 3.17.6.

An exposition of certaine places wherein the scripture gueth to good works the name of righteousness. And there is shewed y those places are not against the doctrine of justification of faith. 3.17.7.

One good worke or many doe not suffice for righteousnes before God, although one sufficient to condemn. And here the principle hath no place. the contraries have all one rule. 3.18.10.

Why the Lorde said that hee ren-dreth to workes that which hee had freely given before Worke. 3.18.3.

The End of the Table.

To the Christian and Studios Reader of this Book, Augustine Marlorate wisheth health.

No so ever shall reade and peruse these two Tables following, and especially the latter, may maruell what I mean (after so many impressions and corrections of this worke to collect and gather at the places of holy Scripture therein allledged, and a great part of the authorities therein expounded, whereas if any fruit in or profit thereof were to bee had, the same long before might have beene done and especially about three yeares past, when the auteur himselfe was so diligent therein, who besides the many and profitable addicions (which is contained) hee himselfe setting the same in order, with his owne hands, and reducing it to a most exact perfection did them se; and publisheth it forth, in such sorte that in foure bookees being divided into chapters and diverse sections hee hath right worshiply and in familiar manner comprised the summary of the whole Christian religion. And certainly I cannot desire but it would have been very good and commodious, if that any one man would have taken the pains faithfully and truly to have collected those places which thing I thought once to have done by the advice of the imprinter, seeing that my charge and office did else where call me to when I had perused and set it in another order than it was before, and had even finished it, I was compelled to omit it, or at the least, so sumptuously for the time. And after that this book being put forth both in Latin and French, was set to sale in every place, because I sawe no man, who then did take the pains to reduce the places of Scripture to a Table, and understanding how profitable the same would be to all men; I could not choose but after my power, and as the wise servant in those troublesome times, so employ my whole care and travail therein. And because all things should be done and cause more certain and in better order; I would not give credence nor trust to the numbers which the imprinter had before set and made: for when I had diligently conferred them all, I found many false, many omitted, and some disorderly set: And surely that happeneth very some to such as are not itself skilled in examining and perusing the places of holy scripture to be some deceived. Wherefore all things diligently restored, and that supplied which seemed to want, I did so order the places of Scripture collected out of the old and new testament that if there were any, through forgetfulness, or by any other means omitted or overskipped: (as it cannot be but that in a great harvest some one care of corn shall escape the reaper's hand.) I doubt warrant so few shall be found that this Table being brought to trial you shall not finde one much more plentiful or larger. Nevertheless I do pray and request the reader, that if they do finde any, they will advertise the imprinter, where by the same may better be examined and corrected. And this is to bee noted, that such whole verses as I have comprised in this Table, they were not wholly but in part alleged, much less expounded in the Institutions, which thing I did upon good consideration. For often times it happeneth that in diverse places of the Institutions, some authorities are alleged, which are proved but by some part of the verse. And because in noting the places and numbers, we must use repetitions (which for the most part bring a loss and waste to the reader,) I thought it better so put in the whole verse, than by often divisions, to use vain and superfluous repetitions. And as concerning the commodity which the reader may gather by this my travell: (besides that which by use and experience I am taught by those Tables, which for mine own private study and exercise I wrote upon the Institutions here before set forth,) I do not affirm this much, that they which are not exercised in it, may except: whereas the Church of God do diligently endeavour themselves thereby, they shall finde a large and a plain way, both with dexterity to expound the writings of the Prophets and Apostles; as also aptly to apply the authorities here alleged, and such like to the edifying of the Church, which is the very end of the whole. And although we want not good Commentaries to discourse unto us the natural sense of the Scripture, which we do none study and apply: yet because they who wrote the same, and who with good success have travelled therein, were contented with the plain and concise exposition of the text: none could tell by the wise of the said Commentaries only (unless they were well practised in the principles of religion) home and to what common place they ought to apply the argument then in hand. But who can so be contented to use this Table, whenever he shall finde the places which hee entreateth, hee shall see home and to what end the same is to bee applied, whether to the confirmation of the doctrine, or to the convulsing of the adversaries, or to the reconciling of such places as seeme to be repugnant.

The Preface.

And this shall be very commodious and profitable, not only for the amplifying of any argument, but also to satisfy them, which are desirous to be confirmed in the principal points of Christian Religion. For it is manifest, how simple and slender is their oration and speech, which bring and allege nothing else, but as they read in the Commentaries; where the authors themselves (being most worshipful and well learned) do chiefly desire brevity, because the readers should use and study the common places themselves, to the end they should the more largely be applied to those things which in the Commentaries are but briefly expounded. Again, forasmuch as we have not always in readiness, what good authors have written upon the scriptures; and vere fewe Commentaries upon some books, and namely upon this Institution, are so to be found or had. This Table expounding the obscure and hard authorities, shall greatly further and help the reader. For they shall either finde some readie interpretation, or some entrance whereby to search and finde out the true sentence. And as touching the translation, I trust it shall not seeme strange to the reader, in that I have rather followed the same words, as they be in the Bible, than as they be alleged by Calvin in this his Institution: For he being a man most excellently well learned, and of great reading (as by his works it doth appeare, how readie & familiar the Scriptures were to him) had not always the books in readiness, or lying open before him, when he wrote: neither was it necessarie that whatsoever he did expound out of the old or new Testament, he should express or write it in the selfsame words: for it is sufficient, that the sense be faithfully retained, and the true propriety of the words observ'd, and so to effecthe the meanings of all men, sauing such as will finde faults in that, which in the leas part cannot be followed nor observed. Being therefore persuaded, that neither he him selfe will be offended, nor the reader dislike, if the sentences in the Bible be translated according to the Hebrew, as concerning the old Testament, and according to the Greeke, as touching the newe Testament: I have adventured to advance the authorities of the Scriptures in another order (as concerning the words) than they are alleged in this booke of Institutions. And therefore sometimes that which is recited in the third person, this Table doth expressit in the second, and so conversewise: but yet so, that the sense and meaning is always referred which thing every man shall easily perceive, if diligently and without hasty judgement, be done conforme every thing together; for else curious heads do lose that fruit, which by advised reading they might have and receive. And as concerning the names and numbers of the books, and of the Chapters of the old Testament, we have not followed the common translation, but that which is most agreeable to the Hebrew. And therefore we do advise the reader, that they do not take the first booke of the Kings, for the first of Samuel; nor the second of Kings, for the second of the same Prophets: which is so done by them, who heretofore have cited the Chapters in this imprinted book, because they followed the Concordances of the Bible, called the great Concordances, which is collected according to the common translation: and by that means, as it may evidently appear to all men, some booke of the elde Testaments are not rightly intituled: and the Psalms otherwise and in another order deuized, than did the Hebrewes. And forasmuch as all the principal points of religion, are in this booke copiously and faithfully expounded, we may easily refute the false opinions of the adversaries. Who otherwise shall come to the reading thereof, either with a minde to learn, or a desire to profite: there is no doue, but he shall verie much profite him selfe, and heole others whose consciences he may so strengthen and assuine, as they need not so quarel in any point, because they be assiured, that their faith is grounded upon the same foundation of the Prophets and Apostles, who wrote and spake, being inspired by the holy ghost, who

If ye shall keep my commandments ye shall abide in my love, even as I have kept my Father's commandments and abide in his love.

But I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit remaine, &c.

If ye were of the world, the world would love his owne: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hath hated you.

Euen the spirit of truth, which proceedeth of the Father, &c.

They shall excommunicate you, &c.

Of judgement, because the prince of the world is judged.

When hee is come which is the spirit of truth, he will lead you into all truth: for he shall not speake of himselfe, but what heareth of him shall heare, that shall he speake, &c.

Verily, verily, I say vnto you, that ye shall weep and lament, and the world shall rejoyce: and ye shall sorrow, but your sorrow shall be turned to joy.

Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name: ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full.

In that day shall ye ask in my name, &c.

I am come out from my father, and came into the world: again, I leaue the world, and goe to my father.

And this is life eternal, that they knowe thee to bee the onely verie God, and whome thou hast sent Jesus Christ.

And nowe glorifie mee, thou father, with thine owne selfe, with the glory which I had with thee, before the world was.

I have declared thy name vnto the men which thou gauest me out of the world: then they were, and thou gauest them me.

I pray for them: I pray not for the world but for them which thou hast given me, for they are thine.

While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name: those that thou gauest mee, I kept, and none of them is loste, but the child of perdition, that thy Scripture might be fulfilled.

I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world: but thou shalt keep them from evil.

And for their sakes sanctifie me my selfe, that they also may be sanctified through thy truth.

That they all may be one, as thou art in me, and I in thee, even that they may be also one in vs: that the world may believe, that thou hast haft sent mee. 3.2.24.

for God hath shewed it vnto the.

21. Because that when they knewe God,they glorified him not as god neither were thankful,but became vaine in their imaginations, &c. 1.5.15

22. When they professed themselues to bee wife, they becamefooles. 4.1

23. For as they regarded not to know God, euen so God delivered them vp vnto a reprobate minde, to doe those things which are not conuenient. 1.18.2

2.6. Who will rewarde every man according to his workes. 3.16.3.

II. For there is no respect of persons with God. 3.23.10

12. For as many as haue sinned without the lawe, shall perish also without the lawe,& as many as haue sinned in the law, shalbe judged by the lawe. 2.2.22

13. For the hearers of the law are not righteous before God, but the doers of the law shalbe justified. 3.11.

15. & 3.17.13

14. For when y Gentiles which haue not the law, do by nature y things contained in the law, they haue not the lawe, &c. 2.2.22

15. Which shew the effect of the law written in their harts, their conscience also bearing them witness, and thoughtes accusing one another, &c. 3.19.15. & 4.10.3

25. If thou be a transgrevior of the law, thy circumcision is made vncircumcision. 4.14.24

3.4. Yea, let God be true, & every man a liar, &c. 4.15.17

9. What then? are we more excellent? no, in no wife, for we haue alreadie proved, that all both Jewes & Gentiles are vnder sinne. 3.4.6

10. As it is written: there is none righteous, no not one. 2.1.5. & 2.3. 2. & 2.5.3

12. There is none that doth good, no not one. 2.3.3

15. Their fecte are swift to shed bloud, &c. 2.3.3

19. Now we know, that whatfoever the law faith, it saith it to them y be vnder the law, that euery mouth may be stopped, & all the world be culpable before God. 2.7.8. & 2.10. 3. & 3.4.6

20. Therefore by the workes of the law, shall no flesh be justified in his sight: For by the law commeth the knowledge of sinne. 2.5.6. & 2.7.7. & 3.11.19

21. But now is the righteousnesse of God made manifest without the law, hauing witness of the lawe, & of the Prophets. 2.9.4. & 2.10.3. & 3.11.19

24. And are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Iesus. 2.5.3. & 2.16.5. & 2.17 5. & 3.4.30. & 3.11.4.19. & 3.15.6. & 3.20.45

25. Whom God hath set forth to be a reconciliation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousnesse, by the forgivnesse of the sinnes that are passed through the patience of God. 4.15.3

26. To shew at this time his righteousnesse, that he might be iust, and a justifier of him which is of y faith of Iesus. 3.11.12. & 3.13.1. & 3.13.2. & 3.14.17

27. Where is then thy rejoicing? It is excluded. By what law? of worke? nay, but by the law of faith. 3.11.13 & 3.13.2.

4.2. For if Abraham were iustified by worke, hee hath wherein to rejoicke, but not with God. 3.11.13. & 3.15.18

H h h. 3 Abra-
3. Abraham beleeued God, & it was counted to him for righteounesse. 3.17.8.10
4. Now to him that worketh, the wages is not counted by favour, but by det. 3.11.20
5. But to him that worketh not, but beleeueth in him that iustifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteounesse. 3.11 3.6
6. Even as Dauid declareth the blessednesse of the man, vnto whom God imputeth righteounesse without workes, sayinge: 2.17.5. & 3.11.4. 20.22
7. Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiuen, and whose sinnes are couered. 3.11.11
8. How was it then imputed when he was circumcised, or vncircumcised? &c. 4.16.3
9. After he received the signe of circumcision, as the scale of the righteounesse of faith which he had, when he was vncircumcised, &c. 4.14.5, 21, 23. & 4.16.20
10. And the father of circumcision, not vnto them only which are of his circumcision, &c. 4.16.12
11. For the promise he shoulde bee the heire of the world, was not giuen to Abraham, or to his seed, through the lawe, but through the righteounesse of faith. 3.14.11
12. For if they which are of his lawe, bee heires, faith is made voide, and the promise is made of none effect. 3.11.11. & 3.13.3
13. For the lawe causeth wrath: for where no lawe is, there is no transgression. 3.7.7. & 3.11.19
14. As it is written: I have made thee a father of many nations, euen before God whome he beleeued, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were. 2.10.11. & 3.
21. And being full certified that what he had promised he was able also to performe. 3.2.31
25. Who was deliuered to death for our sinnes, and is risen againe for our justification. 2.16.5. & 2.16.13
5.1. Then being justified by faith, we haue peace towarde God through our Lorde Iesus Chrift. 3.2.16. &
3.13.5
5. Knowing that tribulation bringeth forth pacience, &c. 3.8.3
5. And hope maketh not ashamed, because the loue of God is shed abroad in our heartes by the holy Ghost, which is giuen vnto vs. 3.1.2. & 3.2.12
8. But God setteth out his loue toward vs, seeing that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for vs. 2.12. 4.8.2.16.4. & 3.4.25
9. Much more then, being now justified by his bloud, we shalbe saued from wrath through him. 2.16.5
10. For if when we be enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his sonne, much more being reconciled, we shalbe saued by his life. 2.16.2, 4.5. & 2.17.3, 6. & 3.11 21. & 3.14.6
12. As by one man sinne entred into the world, and death by sinne, and so death went ouer all men, for as much as al men have sinned. 2.1, 6. 8. & 2.13.4
15. But yet the gift is not so, as is the offence: for if through the offence of one many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which by one man Iesus Chrift, &c. 3.5.4
16. Neither is the gift so, as it which entred in by one that sinned: for the fault came of one offence vnto con-condemnation, but the gift is of many offences to justification. 2. 17. 3 29 For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many also be made righteous. 2. 1. 4. & 2. 16. 5. & 2. 17. 3. and 3. 11. 4. 9. 12. 23. and 4. 1. 4.
21 Moreover, the law entered there-upon, that sin offence should abound: nevertheless where sin abounded, there grace abounded much more. 2. 5. 6. & 2. 7. 7
6.3 Know we not, that all we which have been baptized into Jesus Christ, have been baptized into his death? 4. 1. 5. 5

4.4 Wee are buried then with him in baptism into his death, that as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the father, so we also should walk in newness of life. 2. 8 3. 1. & 2. 16. 7. 13. & 3. 3. 5. & 4. 16. 16. 21 & 4. 19. 8 6 Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sinne might be destroy'd, that hence forth we should not serve sin.
3. 3. 9. 11
12 Let not sinne therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lustes thereof. 3. 3. 13 14 For sinne shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace. 3. 19. 6. & 4. 15.
28 Being then made free from sinne, ye are made the servants of righteousness.
3. 6. 3. & 3. 16. 2
19 I speake after the manner of men, because of your infirmity of your flesh for as ye have given your members servants to uncleanness, and to iniquity, to commit iniquity, &c. 3. 24 10. & 3. 25. 8
23 For the wages of sinne is death: but the gift of God is eternall life through Jesus Christ our Lord. 2. 8 58. 59. & 3. 4. 28. & 3. 14. 21
7.1 Know wee ye not brethren, for I speake to them that knowe the lawe, that the lawe hath dominion over a man as long as he liueth? 4. 15. 12 7 What shall we say then? is the law sinne? God forbid. Nay I know not sinne but by the lawe: &c. 2. 5. 6. & 2.
12 Wherefore the lawe is holy, and the commandement is holy, and just, and good.
2. 9. 4
14 For we knowe that the law is spiritually, &c.
15 For I allowe not that which I do: for what I would that I do not, but what I hate that do I. 2. 2. 27
18 For I knowe, that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me, &c. 2. 1. 9 19 For I do not the good thing, which I would, but the evil, which I would not, that do I. 1. 2. 27. & 3. 3.
20 Nowe if I doe that I would not, it is no more I that doe it, but the sin that dwelleth in me.
2. 2. 27
23 But I see an other lawe in my members, rebelling against the lawe of my minde, and leading me captiue into the law of sinne, which is in my members.
3. 3. 14
24 O wretched man that I am, who shall deliever me from the body of this death? 3. 9. 4. & 3. 11. 11. & 4.
15. 12
8.1 Nowe then there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, which walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit. 3. 4. 28. & 4

For the wisedome of the flesh is death: but the wisedome of the spirit is life and peace. 2.3.1

Because the wisedome of the flesh is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the lawe of God, neither in deed can be. 2.1.9. & 3.3.8. & 3.20

Nowe yee are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, because the spirit of God dwelleth in you: but if any mans hath not the spirit of Christ, the same is not his. 3.12 & 3.2.39. & 4.17.12

And if Christ be in you, the bodie is dead because of sinne: but the spirit is life for righteousnes sake. 2.1.6 & 3.1.3. & 3.2.24. & 3.25.3. & 4.17.12

But if the spirit of him that raised vpp Jesus from the dead, dwell in you, he that raised vp Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies, because that his spirit dwelleth in you. 1.13.18 & 3.1.2. & 3.2.39 & 3.25.3.8. & 4.17.12

For as many as are led by the spirit of God, they are the sons of God. 3.2.39

For yee have not received the spirit of bondage, to fear againe: but ye have received the spirit of adoption, &c. 2.11.9. & 2.14.5. & 3.1.3. & 3.2.11. & 3.13.5. & 3.20.1. & 3.24.1. & 4.19.22.

The same spirit beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God. 3.2.39

If yee be children, yee are also heirs, even the heirs of God, and heirs annexed with Christ, &c. 2.12.2.

For the fervent desire of the creature, waiteth when the sons of God shall be raiied, 3.9.5. & 3.25.

20 Because the creature is subject to vanity, not of it owne will, &c. 2.1.

22 For we know that every creature groweth with vs also, & travaileth in paine together unto this present 2.1.5. & 3.25.2.

23 And not only the creature, but we also which haue the first fruits of the spirit, even wee doe fighe in our soules, waiting for the adoption, even the redemption of our body, 3.18.3. & 3.25.11.

24 For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen, is no hope, &c. 2.9.

25 But if we hope for that we see not, we do with patience abide for it. 3.2.4.42. & 3.25.1.

26 Likewise the spirit also helpeth our invertis: for we knowe not what to pray as we ought, &c. 3.20.

27 But he that searcheth the heartes knoweth what is the meaning of the spirit, for he maketh request for the sainetes &c. 3.10.5.34.

28 For those which hee knewe before, he also predestinate to be made like to the image of his sonne, that he might be the first borne among many brethren. 2.13.2. & 3.1.1.3. & 3.8.1. & 3.15.8. & 3.18.7. & 3.24.

30 Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them also he called: And who he called, them also hee justified: And whom he justified, &c. 2.5.2. & 3.14. 21. & 3.18.4. & 3.24.6.

18. Then after three yeare I came againe to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and toke with me Titus also. 4.6.14

8. For the Scriptures foreseeing, that God woulde justifie the Gentiles through faith, preached before the Gospell vnto Abraham, &c. 3.11.3

10. For
10 For as many as are of the workes of the lawe, are vnder the curse: for it is written, cursed is euery man that continueth not in all things, &c. 2.7.5. & 2.7.17. & 2.16.2. & 3.11.

16 Now to Abraham, and to his seed were ye promises made, &c. 2.6.2. & 2.13.3. & 4.14.21

17 And this I say, that the law which was foure hundreth and thyrtic yeares after, can not diuallue the covenant that was confirmed aforfe of God in respect of Christ, that it should make the promises of no effect.

18 For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more by the promise, but God gave it vnto Abraham by promise.

19. Wherefore then serueth the lawe? It was added because of the transgression, &c. 1.14.9. & 2.5.6. & 2.

22 But the Scripture hath concluded all vnder sinne, that the promise by the faith of Iesus Christ shoulde be giuen to them that beleue. 3.4.6

41. Then this I say, that the heire as long as he is a childe, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be Lorde of all. 2.11.2. & 2.11.5. & 2.11.

2 But is vnder tutors & governours, vs till the time appointed of the father.

3 Even so wee, when wee were childe, were in bondage vnder the un Dimitentes of the world.

4 But when the fulnesse of time was come, God sent forth his son, borne of a woman, &c. 2.16.5. & 2.7.15. & 2.11.11. & 2.12.7. & 2.13.1. & 2.13.5. & 2.17.5. & 4.20.1

5 That he might redeeme the which were vnder the lawe, ye might receive the adoption, &c. 2.7.15. & 3.

6 And because ye are the sonnes of God, God hath sent forth the spirite of his son into your heartes, which crieth, Abba, that is, father. 2.14.5. & 3.13.

8 But even then, when ye knewe not God, ye did serve vnto the which by nature are not Gods. 1.4.3. & 1.

8.3

8 But nowe, seeing ye knowe God, ye are rather knowne of God, &c. 4.

10 Ye obserue daies, & monethes, and time, & yeares. 2.3.3

11 I am in feare of you, least I haue bestowed on you labour in vaine. 2.

8.33

22 For it is written that Abraham had two sonnes, one by a servant, an other by a free woman. 2.11.9. & 4.2.3

2.3
By the which things, an other thing is ment; for these mothers, are the two Testamentes, &c. 2.11.9

For Agar or Sina is a mountain in Arabia, and it answereth to Jerusalem that nowe is, &c. 3.2.6

But Jerusalem, which is above, is free: and is the mother of vs all. 4.11

We are after the manner of Isaac, children of the promises. 4.16.12

Put out the servant and her sonne, &c. 3.18.2

Stand fast in the libertie therefore wherewith Christ hath made vs free &c. 3.19.2. & 3.19.4. & 4.10.8. & 4.

Who so ever are justified by the lawe, ye are fallen from grace. 3.19.14

For in Christ Jesus, neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, &c. 4.14.24

From henceforth let no man pere to businesse: for I beare in my body the marks, &c. 3.18.7. & 3.25.
